As I have before stated, I cannot remember positively where I encamped on the night of the 9th, whether at Crawford Spring or whether I moved farther out and went across to Harlan's with two of my divisions. One division encamped on or near the road from Perryville to Danville. I cannot state whether I got the orders from General Buell or from General Thomas to move from these camps. I cannot state precisely on what day I did move up to the Danville and Harrodsburg road, nor can I state with any certainty the day when I marched from Danville. My command moved from Danville to Stanford somewhere about the middle of October, from Stanford to Crab Orchard, and from there to Mount Vernon and Wild Cat, with the skirmishing that I have already mentioned. I think that we commenced the retrograde movement about the 22d or 23d from Wild Cat or about that time.

Question. How many miles per day were made in the pursuit of Bragg from Perryville?

We marched from Harlan's to Danville and the Harrodsburg road, which I suppose is not more than 6 or 7 miles. I marched from Danville to a little beyond Stanford, which is somewhere about 10 or 12 miles; I do not remember precisely. From Stanford we marched to beyond Crab Orchard, some 5 or 6 miles I think, and from there to Mount Vernon with a portion of the command, and a portion of it went beyond Mount Vernon. I cannot remember precisely whether we went from this point to Wild Cat in one day or not; I rather think we did, as the roads were more obstructed between Mount Vernon and Wild Cat by the felling of trees than at any other point; it was a more favorable country for the enemy to resist our advance. After leaving Danville we did not halt any day. These marches were made on consecutive days, and I think we moved as rapidly as we could have done.

Question. Please look at the map and state the points by and through which Bragg's army retreated from Perryville and out of Kentucky.

From Harrodsburg Bragg passed to Camp Dick Robinson, as I understood; marched through Lancaster, Crab Orchard, Mount Vernon, and London; after leaving London I do not remember what points he passed through. Bragg's entire force did not all go back by that road, so I understood; some of them I know got out by the road leading from Richmond to London.

Question. Your command led the advance in the pursuit of the rebel army toward London; please give your opinion whether the rebel army, as estimated by some officers from 55,000 to 65,000 men, was driven out of Kentucky, baffled and disappointed, or did it, in your judgment, march out at its ease, with all its transportation?

I think the army of the Confederates was driven from Kentucky, baffled and defeated in all its purposes, except perhaps that of carrying away some subsistence and some clothing.

Question. Are you personally acquainted with Brigadier-General Fry; if so, how far, in your estimation, would his statement of facts be affected by personal differences?

I am personally acquainted with General Fry, and consider him a man of the very strictest integrity and honor, a man of piety. I consider him a good man, and I do not believe that he would state anything that he did not believe was true.

Question. I wish to ask you, from your personal knowledge of General Fry, how far his temperament would affect and color his knowledge of truth or what he thought to be true?

I cannot say how far General Fry would be influenced by his prejudices. I think he is a man of very strong prejudices. I am quite sure, as I have stated before, that no prejudices would make him state what he did not believe, but as to how far the prejudices of any man would affect his opinions or his judgment is impossible for me to say. I can only say that I think he is a man of strong prejudices.

The following question is asked by the judge-advocate at the request of General Buell:

Question. With reference to the operations of an army and the conduct of a campaign, where there is always so much ignorance or at least so much lack of information with all officers who have not fully the confidence of the commander and where at any rate there may be so wide a diversity of opinion, do you or do you not believe that the prejudices of almost any man would warp his judgment against the commander toward whom these prejudices exist?

I think that to say a man is a man of prejudices is equivalent to saying that where his prejudices operate his judgment is warped already. I would say also that the case cited in question is a case in which I think the judgment of any one who was prejudiced would be more likely to warp his judgment than almost any other cause of which I can think.

By General TYLER:

Question. General, if the Army of the Ohio had been massed at Lebanon or Sparta would not Bragg by a movement on McMinnville or Nashville or into Kentucky have exposed his flank to an attack from the Army of the Ohio?

Undoubtedly an army attempting to move in the presence of another army as near as those two armies were might expose its flank to an attack, but it would altogether depend upon the nature of the country and the direction of the roads how great the danger of such an exposure would be.

Question. Suppose General Buell had massed his army at Sparta to meet Bragg there, and Bragg, advised of the fact, had turned toward McMinnville, as you supposed, would not General Buell with his army concentrated at Sparta have been in a better position to oppose Bragg's advance than he would have been had Bragg debouched at Sparta and General Buell's army been still near McMinnville?

I think not, sir. General Buell would have been nearer to his line of communications and to his supplies, nearer to Nashville I should think, and in a better and more feasible country to march over. I think, moreover, that at that time, with the Army of the Ohio at Sparta, it might have incurred another risk, for I thought there was a very considerable force at Knoxville, Tenn., and that that force might be coming into Tennessee at the same time that Bragg was moving up from Chattanooga. It was not known, at least I did not know, that Kirby Smith had gone into Kentucky. I did not know that he was not going down the Cumberland River from Knoxville to McMinnville to make his junction with Bragg there.

Question. Why, then, did it happen that Bragg, starting from Sparta at the same time General Buell started from McMinnville, should hold the advance clear to Munfordville?

I presume because General Buell had to divine the movements of Bragg, to watch his movements, and he could not tell to what point Bragg had actually moved or what direction he would take. This necessarily gave Bragg the start on the march.

Question. It is assumed in your direct testimony that the Army of the Ohio was scattered at the time Bragg crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga. What necessity existed for the army being scattered at that time and how far were they scattered?

I do not know precisely what the necessity was for the different portions of the army being in their various positions. I infer that it was necessary to keep the army somewhat scattered at that time in order to procure forage and subsistence; and this might not have been one of the reasons; there might have been other and better ones. I have stated already the points where I think the troops were located.

The Commission adjourned to meet March 5, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Thursday, March 5, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

By General TYLER:

Question. General, who was your immediate commander and to whom did you make your report? I have reference to the battle of Perryville and about that time.

I never made but one written report; that was addressed to General Buell. General Thomas was the second in command of that army and was with my command. All verbal reports I made to him. General Buell was the commander of the army and General Thomas the second in command. I received verbal orders from General Thomas alone to the best of my knowledge. I am not sure that my orders did not all come from General Thomas. I think there was an order from General Buell addressed both to General Thomas and to me. Whether I received it first or received it from General Thomas I cannot now testify.

Question. Did you stand in the same relation to General Thomas that a brigade commander stands to his division commander?

I consider myself in my relation to General Thomas as a subordinate officer. I was entirely under his command as much as I was under General Buell's, and I see no difference between the relation in which I stood to General Thomas and the relation a brigade commander stands to his own division commander.

By General DANA:

Question. With the rebel army under Bragg approaching Sparta from the direction of Pikeville and with the Army of the Ohio approaching Sparta from the direction of McMinnville would either of them expose his flank to the other?

I should think not. Perhaps when very near to Sparta, as the roads converge, the nature of the country and the roads, for aught I know, might expose the flank of either army.

Question. You stated that the rebel army in its march would necessarily have to approach McMinnville within the distance of a few miles before it could be decided whether it would approach McMinnville or approach Sparta from that point. Now, with the rebel army at this point, when it became decided that it would go to Sparta, and the Army of the Ohio at McMinnville in observation of the rebel army, would the flank of either army in approaching Sparta have been exposed to the other?

The rebel army having approached to within a few miles of McMinnville and the Army of the Ohio being in possession at McMinnville would expose its rear undoubtedly in an attempt to move on Sparta, because it would have to go back to Spencer in order to march to Sparta; but I cannot say that its flank would have been exposed at all. As I have said, when it approached very near to Sparta, where, if the country would admit of the passage of troops and the distance from the road by which our army would have necessarily had to go toward the enemy from the road by which the enemy would go, as the distance would be quite short, it might have exposed its flank there. But as I understand the road which approaches to McMinnville and the roads to Sparta, I do not see how the flank of Bragg's army would have been exposed except as I have stated.

Question. Is Spencer the nearest point to McMinnville and Sparta from which roads diverge to those two places, and what is the distance of Spencer from those two places?

I cannot say that it is the nearest point from which roads diverge to the two points. It is a point I had noticed frequently on the military maps we had, the only point, I believe, which I have noticed where roads were laid down. I have no other knowledge of the country than that. The distance, I suppose, would be from 14 to 20 miles, but it is a mere guess as to the relative distance from McMinnville and from Sparta. I presume there is no great difference in the distance, though I would not undertake to say positively.

Question. I understood you to say in your direct examination that there was some point within about 10 miles of McMinnville to which the rebel army might advance before it could be absolutely determined whether they were on the road to Sparta or on the road to McMinnville; what point is that?

I have no doubt I referred to Spencer. Spencer may not be more than 10 miles, though, as I have said, it might be 14 to 20.

Question. Is there no road that connects that road from Spencer to McMinnville with Sparta?

The only road I know connecting the McMinnville and Spencer road is the road that runs directly from Spencer a little east of north of Sparta. I know there is a direct road from McMinnville to Sparta.

Question. With the rebel army, then, arrived at Spencer and threatening an attack on the Army of the Ohio at McMinnville, was it practicable for it to move and take possession of Sparta before the Army of the Ohio could be advised of it?

That is my opinion.

Question. And in McMinnville was that movement threatened with a flank attack from the Army of the Ohio?

I think not, sir.

Question. The Army of the Ohio having discovered its movement in progress and attempting to make a rapid movement to Sparta would its right flank have been exposed to the rebel army or not?

When it approached near to Sparta, as I have already said, its right flank might have been exposed. If there were no natural obstacles through the country that would have made it impracticable for troops it would have exposed its flank, the other army being there in position.

Question. Now reverse the positions of the army. Suppose the Army of the Ohio to have taken position at Sparta, with a view to prevent Bragg from marching into Kentucky, having given up its line from McMinnville to Murfreesborough; suppose the rebel army to have elected an advance on Nashville and to have arrived at McMinnville; then the Army of the Ohio, in an effort to relieve Nashville, starts at the same time for that place with the rebel army from McMinnville—which, if either, would expose its flank to the other?

I do not know sufficient of the roads from Sparta by which the Army of the Ohio would have marched to relieve Nashville to say how much, or if at all, its flank would have been exposed or if it would have threatened the flank of the rebel army. I should think that with the rebel army, however, at McMinnville and the Army of the Ohio at Sparta the flank of neither army would be exposed. I should consider one army as considerably in rear of the other when marching for the same point, the army at McMinnville having the best roads and I should think the shortest distance to march.

Question. Had the Army of the Ohio taken its position at that time at Sparta with Bragg at McMinnville in how many days would it have been driven from there by want of supplies ?

It would be impossible for me to state with what quantity of supplies the Army of the Ohio could have been placed at Sparta. I only know that supplies were very scarce, that we were required most of that time to live on half rations, and that the railroads were broken by which our supplies came. My impression is that the Army of the Ohio could not have been placed at Sparta with supplies that would have enabled them to remain there many days. It must necessarily have been a very short time they could have remained at Sparta with Bragg at McMinnville.

Question. With the Army of the Ohio at Sparta and its supplies exhausted was it possible for it to have reached its base of supplies at Nashville without fighting a battle with the rebel army ?

I think not, sir. The rebel army at McMinnville, as I have stated, if I am correct in my judgment on the subject, had a better and shorter route to Nashville than the Army of the Ohio would have had in starting from Sparta; they would have had to fight on the way or at Nashville if General Bragg had so chosen. That is my belief.

Question. Then was it not at Bragg's option to make a flank attack on the Army of the Ohio during their retrograde movement ?

I cannot state that it was at Bragg's option to make a flank attack. I can only say, as I stated before, that I considered him in the advance. He could have reached Nashville first, and it would depend entirely on the roads, with which I am not acquainted and the direction of the roads by which the two armies marched, whether he could have made a flank attack or not. I am not prepared to say. I think, being nearer to Nashville and having the best roads, we would have had to fight there or before if the nature of the country would have admitted of a flank attack.

Question. When both armies started north from the Cumberland River were they either of them exposed in their flanks to the other during that march ?

I think not, sir.

Question. With the rebel army at Glasgow and the Army of the Ohio arriving by divisions at Bowling Green would it have been exposed in its flank from that point onward and just before reaching that point to an attack of the rebel army ?

From Bowling Green onward perhaps to Munfordville, as well as I recollect the distance, the roads, and the country, with the rebel army at Glasgow and the Army of the Ohio moving on the road by which it marched, I think it was exposed to a flank attack from Glasgow. I thought of that when I answered that on the march neither army was exposed in its flank, but I did not refer to it, because when we moved from Bowling Green it was known that a considerable portion of Bragg's army had already left Glasgow about that time, which made me think that the flank of neither army was exposed.

Question. With the armies of about equal strength and enterprise, traveling over a considerable distance of country in the same direction on roads pretty nearly parallel and with cross-roads connecting those roads and a country practicable for infantry between the roads, at what distance do you consider it necessary those roads should be apart to make either army safe from a flank attack from the other ?

It would depend entirely, in my judgment, upon the relative position of the two armies. If one was considerably in advance of the other it might cover its movements and have the time to march a very considerable distance. To attack an army in flank as it passed, with two armies marching with the heads of their columns nearly parallel, I should think that anything over a day's march (the distance of a day's march) would make either army secure in its flank.

Question. What is the distance from Carthage to Gallatin ?

It seems to be about 28 miles in a direct line by the scale on the map; I do not know the distance by any roads; my impression was that it was considerably farther than that.

Question. Would the army which is in advance of the other on parallel roads—a day's march in advance of the other—always have it at its option to make a flank attack on the one which is in the rear?

I think not, sir, the distance separating not allowing such an attack.

Question. With two armies, with the conditions supposed, operating over a large extent of country and within a day's march of each other, may it not be very frequently necessary for both armies to expose their flanks to each other and use extra precautions to protect those flanks?

Undoubtedly. In such cases accidents will occur which will lose a march to one army and so gain one for another. This in such a case would expose the flank of the one and render extraordinary precautions necessary.

Question. On the day of the battle of Perryville whose fault was it that you did not know that McCook's corps was being beaten by the enemy?

I do not know, sir, that I ever ascribed it to the fault of any one. I have not a sufficient knowledge of the conduct of that battle, of its inception and progress, to know who should be blamed. I have sometimes found that I was blamed myself because I could not hear the guns and did not know that a fight was going on. It was an extraordinary affair. I had 20,000 men there, and no officer or man ever knew, or, if they did know, ever reported to General Thomas or myself, that a battle was going on. I should be altogether unwilling and I should consider myself unjust, with my knowledge of the facts, to undertake to lay the blame to any one.

Question. Is it your opinion that there was a criminal blame to be attached to somebody among the number of men who did know that the fight was going on because you were not called on for support with that large number of troops under your command?

I cannot say that there was blame to be attached to any one even on that account. I do not know at what hour the battle began. I do not know for what space of time it was fought. I do not know that I could have rendered more assistance than was actually rendered. I had one, perhaps two, brigades that participated in that fight late in the evening, but I believe, without any knowledge of the extent of the fight on the extreme left, they had but little to do with the fight. I remember that General Wood thought it necessary to make some report in reference to the conduct of a portion of his command which was on the extreme left of my line. I must say, however, that somebody was to blame, if there was time to notify General Thomas or myself of the very serious nature of the fight which was going on, that it was not done.

Question. Do you know that the commanding general of the army was equally unaware of the serious nature of the fight that was going on?

I remember that the commanding general of the army told me that he was never more astonished in his life than when he was informed of the character of the fight that had already taken place when he got his information. I cannot be positive about the time he stated to me that he had received this information. My best impression is that he told me it was after 4 o'clock. That conversation occurred between the commanding general and myself shortly after the battle, perhaps the next day.

Question. Do you know whose fault it was that General Buell did not know that General McCook was being beaten?

I do not, indeed, sir.

Question. Have you ever known that General Buell has cast censure upon anybody for this dereliction previously spoken of, or that he has made such criticisms upon the conduct of anybody as would imply that censure for that neglect?

I do not remember to have heard General Buell censure any one in this conversation to which I have just referred. I thought that by implication General Buell censured some one because he had not received earlier information of this fight. I did not know nor do I know now whether General Buell meant such an implication or not, whether he was cognizant of the fact that information had been started to him; whether such information was ever started to him or not I do not know; and still I thought he did mean to censure somebody. It was a mere inference of mine from the fact that he told me he had not received this information until I suppose the most disastrous part of the battle was over.

Question. From the impression made upon your mind immediately after that conversation who, in your opinion, was censurable for that neglect?

I cannot say that in my opinion any one was censurable. I do not know the facts. Everything might have been done to give such information that a prudent man could do. I have no facts which would enable me to say that any one was censurable for neglect.

Question. Do you know of the existence in the army of the Ohio among colonels and general officers of such a feeling as would amount to a general belief as to who the person or persons are who were to be censured for the neglect?

I do not know, sir. As far as I know the opinions in the army have been as various almost as the officers on the subject. I scarcely know a man of any prominence in the army upon whom I have not heard censure cast for that fight. I know of no general opinion in the army attaching even the principal blame to any individual.

Question. How long after the battle did you become convinced that Bragg had retreated by way of Harrodsburg to Camp Dick Robinson?

I am somewhat in doubt as to the date when we moved from Perryville or when I knew that Bragg had moved to Camp Dick Robinson. I did not know it until one of my brigades had gone to Harrodsburg. After the battle, I think next day, my opinion was that Kirby Smith was in line of battle with his command near to Harrodsburg and on the Harrodsburg and Perryville road some mile or two outside of Harrodsburg.

Question. The question is intended to ascertain how long a time elapsed after the battle before you became convinced in your mind that Bragg's strategic operations had degenerated into a decided retreat by that particular route?

I saw the object of the question and stated my difficulty about the date as my reason for not being able to give a very satisfactory answer. The time when I first knew he was gone I can only fix by ascertaining the day on which I sent a brigade to Harrodsburg. It was then I first learned that the rebels had retreated from Harrodsburg in the direction of Camp Dick Robinson. I think it could not have occurred sooner than the 11th; it might have been the 12th. I am quite sure it was not later that my brigade went to Harrodsburg.

Question. Do you know why you did not know this before?

I do not know why I did not have the information earlier. I suppose it was because we had had a very severe battle. It was not considered at that time the victory that it has since been denominated. The general impression in my part of the command was that we had suffered a considerable disaster. The fact that Kirby Smith had reached Harrodsburg and the impression that Bragg had received re-enforcements was that we should have another battle. The general confusion, too, that ensues in any army after a battle made some delay necessary. I suppose that these were the reasons why we did not advance at once upon Harrodsburg and ascertain whether the rebels were flying or not; but this is my supposition only.

Question. Why did not the Army of the Ohio go right after General Bragg as soon as he left Perryville?

It was nearly night when Bragg left Perryville. I suppose night would have stopped us from any immediate pursuit, and suppose we did not follow up to Harrodsburg on the next day for the reasons that I have just stated. Kirby Smith was said to be in line of battle at Harrodsburg, and I suppose the commanding general thought it important to rest his army after the battle, and see what its condition really was before he advanced upon this army, which at that time was believed to have inflicted a disaster upon us and not to have been defeated. When it had been re-enforced by the army under General Kirby Smith he was only some 6 or 8 miles in front of us.

Question. Was it positively known on the 9th whether Bragg had gone to Harrodsburg or Danville or to any intermediate place between the two?

My best impression is that it was known; that was my information.

Question. With regard to the retreat of Bragg from Harrodsburg by way of Camp Dick Robinson and other places beyond there, is it to this day positively known what particular routes all the divisions of Bragg's army took?

I certainly do not know myself and I cannot say that it is positively known.

By General ORD:

Question. You were asked whether you are sufficiently acquainted with the details of the Army of the Ohio to know whether General Buell could not concentrate 50,000 men at some point to oppose the advance of General Bragg's army, and you stated in your answer that there was no such force there. Supposing such force had been there, does it or does it not necessarily follow that the best use of them would have been to concentrate them at some point in the mountains or elsewhere in front of or on such lines as General Bragg chose to pursue with his army?

I do not think it necessarily follows that if there had been such a force there it would have been the best use they could have been put to to place them or concentrate them in front of General Bragg. My opinion is that the best use to which the army could have been put at that time and under the circumstances was to cover and protect the line by which it received its supplies and to watch Bragg's army.

Question. Would or would not the movements for the concentration of such a force probably have been known beforehand and in time to have enabled the enemy to take another route?

I think so. The enemy always had information of our movements in that country.

Question. Is the nature of the country and the disposition of the people where General Buell and Bragg were operating at that time such that a movement might have been caused by feints or demonstrations or partly made before the concentration to meet it (where such concentration was desirable) could have been effected?

I think so.

Question. If General Buell could have concentrated 50,000 men in front of Bragg on the route he took to Tennessee or any route east of it, would or would he not have been compelled to draw in his detachments from guarding bridges, roads, depots, or strategic points.

Undoubtedly to have concentrated anything like such a force in front of General Bragg General Buell must have drawn in, in my opinion, not only all the troops he had on detached service in Tennessee, but he would have had to bring troops from Kentucky to make up 50,000 men. This is my opinion of the external position of the command.

Question. Were these troops guarding depots, bridges, roads, and important strategic points or not?

At the time that General Bragg crossed the Tennessee River to that time General Buell was guarding the road from Decatur to Nashville, the road from Decatur to Stevenson, the road from Stevenson to Nashville, some 300 miles of railroad. This shows that they were guarding bridges, roads, depots, that were of vital importance to the different portions of the army. General Buell was also, I suppose, guarding the road from Nashville to Louisville and from Cincinnati to Cumberland Gap, which would make some 300 or 400 miles more of roads that his entire army in Kentucky and Tennessee had to guard when keeping open their lines of communication, making in all some 600 or 700 miles.

Question. In case this detachment had been drawn in from these important points what do you think General Bragg would have done; gone and attacked the army of 50,000 men in its defensive position, or have sent cavalry and light troops to attack these depots, bridges, &c.?

I do not think General Bragg would have attacked 50,000 men. I think General Bragg might, if he had desired it, have got a fight out of 30,000 men at any time, and as he avoided that I am quite sure he would have avoided the 50,000. I think he unquestionably would have sent cavalry and light troops to break up these depots and railroads, seize these bridges, and that the effect of such a course would necessarily have been to force our army to retreat or to fight General Bragg where we could find him.

Question. Was the nature of the country such that you would probably have found him in a very strong and difficult position or not?

Certainly; he might have availed himself of strong positions almost anywhere in that country.

Question. Suppose either army to have received notice of the approach of the other, and to have occupied a defensive position, in such a country with which would the advantage be, the attacking party or the party on the defensive?

I hardly know whether I am competent to answer that question or not. There are supposed to be certain advantages always accompanying an attacking force, but I scarcely think there are many positions which would more than counterbalance any advantages growing out of the enthusiasm which an attack inspires in soldiers. It would depend upon the strength of the position and somewhat upon the strength of the two armies as to with which the advantage would be.

Question. Was there any similarity between the battle of Perryville and Murfreesborough in respect to the number and kinds of troops engaged on either side, in results, commanders of corps, manner of attack, or other important points? And, if so, please state the points of resemblance and in what the battles differed.

There were undoubtedly some points of resemblance in the two battles. Our troops in both battles approached the enemy to attack them; in both battles the enemy attacked our troops. There was also this other point of resemblance: that the enemy were successful in their attacks. At Perryville they drove back our left wing. At Stone River, or Murfreesborough (I think you call it), they drove back our right wing and our center. Very many of the same troops that composed both armies at Stone River composed the two armies that were at the battle of Perryville. As to the strength of the two armies, I cannot state the strength of the rebel army at Perryville nor the strength of either army at Stone River. At Stone River we fought with some 42,000 or 43,000 men. I believe at Perryville the troops engaged on our side were not so numerous, though we had a larger army there. We had different commanders. General Buell was in command at Perryville; General Rosecrans was in command at Stone River. I think there was another resemblance between the two battles: they were both very bloody and both very fruitless; no army was destroyed; nothing was accomplished at either place except to show the valor of our troops. There was also this similarity in the two battles: that we were suddenly and unexpectedly attacked. General McCook commanded the portions of the army which received the attack at both battles, at Perryville and at Stone River.

Question. Was the corps that received the attack in either instance routed; if so, in which?

I did not see any of the corps that received the attack at Perryville. I did not understand that they were routed. I saw a considerable portion of General McCook's corps at Stone River that received the attack. I did not consider them routed, although they were driven back with very considerable confusion and over a considerable distance. I remember that I was encouraged considerably at night on the 31st, after the battle, by the recollection which I had of the continual firing of our troops as they fell back. With some portions I suppose it might almost be called a rout, but most of them continued to fight as they retreated until the enemy were checked; at least so I inferred from the sounds of the musketry. They were covered from my view by the woods, and I had no other means of knowing in what condition they retreated except the one referred to—that they were fighting as they fell back.

Question. Have you seen the published report of that battle by General Rosecrans; if so, do you remember whether he states that that corps was routed?

General TYLER. I object to the question, Mr. President, simply on the ground that it relates entirely to the battle of Stone River, and has no connection with the campaign of General Buell in 1862. I have no objection except that it is encumbering our record with matters in no way submitted to the consideration of this Commission.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

The WITNESS. I have seen and read the published report of General Rosecrans, but I did not remember nor do I now remember that the expression "rout" was used. General Rosecrans' report that that corps was routed would not alter my opinion. As I stated before, I do not consider a corps as routed that, when support is brought to it, can be stopped in retreat and reformed in a short space of time. They were in considerable confusion and had been very roughly handled by the enemy, but I do not consider that the corps was routed.

Question. What was the relative condition of the two armies after these two battles with regard to their fitness and ability to pursue the enemy?

At Perryville the enemy retreated immediately after the battle; at Stone River the question was whether we should retreat. The great question to be decided on the 31st (Stone River) was as to whether we could maintain our position or whether we would not have to fall back. The enemy remained for three days and attacked us frequently during that time at Murfreesborough. The condition of the army at Perryville was unquestionably far better for the pursuit of an enemy than was the condition of our army at Stone River.

Question. Upon the retreat of the enemy being known in these two instances after each battle were they first pursued when at Perryville or at Stone River by the whole of our army?

They have never been pursued at Stone River, to my knowledge, at all. They were pursued very shortly after the battle of Perryville, to a certain extent, the next day.

Question. In regard to the damage suffered by the whole army, at which of these two battles—at Perryville and Murfreesborough—do you consider that it was greatest in proportion to the injury inflicted upon the enemy?

It is a very difficult question for me to answer, because I lost a number of esteemed friends at the battle of Perryville and a considerable number of valuable officers were lost to the country. And perhaps an equal number of officers were lost at Perryville as at Stone River, but I do not happen to know them so well and could not appreciate them as I did my own friends. With reference to the damage done to our whole army in proportion to the damage inflicted upon the rebels at the two battles I cannot answer certainly, for I do not know the loss of the enemy at either of the battles. If the enemy were as numerous at Stone River as General Rosecrans supposes, my impression would be that the rebels had suffered, in proportion to their numbers, more at Perryville than at Stone River; but I do not think the rebels had so large a force at Stone River, and I am inclined to the opinion that they suffered more damage, in proportion to the numbers engaged, at Stone River than they did at Perryville. It was a much longer fight, and they were repulsed in several very fierce and bloody attacks which they made on portions of our lines. I think the damage inflicted upon our army, in proportion to the numbers engaged, was greater than the damage inflicted upon our army at Perryville.

Question. Was or was not the movement of the Army of the Ohio, when concentrated, upon learning that General Bragg had gone up the Sequatchie Valley and afterward followed it, a retreat?

No, sir; as soon as we found we were concentrating, the general opinion undoubtedly was that it was for the purpose of fighting General Bragg's army at some point.

Question. What was the extent of the straggling and desertion by the absenting of the soldiers visiting their homes previous to the arrival of the army at Louisville in proportion to what occurred after the army arrived at Louisville?

The straggling and desertion at Louisville and after the arrival of the army at Louisville was very much greater than at any time previous.

Question. Under the military laws of our service and the habits of the people were such absentings to be expected or not in any army of volunteers on arriving near home?

In any army of volunteers such absenteeism I think cannot be prevented by our laws of discipline. They always have occurred in similar cases since I have had any experience in the army.

Question. Were they milder or less in the army at that time than they would have been in any other army under similar circumstances?

I always considered that army one of the best disciplined armies of the country. It might perhaps be my partiality for that army which formed the opinion that they were less in that army than they would have been in any other.

Question. You refer in one part of your examination to the discipline instilled by General Buell having shown itself in that army from the battle of Shiloh to that of Stone River; what had General Buell's discipline to do with the battle of Stone River?

In my judgment a great deal. No one had had a part in disciplining that army before General Buell. General Rosecrans took command of it on the march; he never had it together except at Nashville. His time there was occupied necessarily in preparing an advance upon Murfreesborough. The entire discipline of that army I ascribe to General Buell. Up to that time perhaps it is reasonable to say that the entire discipline of the army is to be ascribed to General Buell. He had command of it for a year. General Sherman had preceded General Buell I believe in the command of that army. General Anderson had preceded him. A portion of the army had been somewhat disciplined by these two commanders; but I think it is only just to ascribe the discipline of that army to General Buell.

Question. In what manner were the effects of that discipline shown at Stone River?

It was shown, certainly in my command, by the steadiness with which the men met and repulsed the enemy under extraordinary circumstances. When their flank was turned, the right and center of our army driven away from them, when a fight was actually going on in their rear, the steadiness with which the troops still fought and maintained their ground was the very highest evidence of extraordinary discipline. I think that even with the troops who were driven back in considerable confusion the fact that the officers were enabled to stop them on the field to get them ready for another fight was a high evidence of their good discipline.

Question. Do you think that discipline had anything to do with saving the army at that fight?

I am sure it had everything to do with it.

Question. With Louisville as our base of supplies and the railroad north of Louisville interrupted and effectually broken up, as you stated in your testimony, could or could not the Army of the Ohio have been safe long at McMinnville as regards supplies even though communication was open to Nashville?

I should have considered it very unsafe.

The Commission adjourned to meet March 6, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Friday, March 6, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BUELL. Before the examination commences this morning, Mr. President, I want to call your attention to some inaccuracies in the map which I see has been prepared. They are calculated to mislead the Commission and witnesses that may refer to the map.

The first I see is a road represented directly from Chattanooga to Dunlap, and that is represented as the route pursued by the rebel army. There is no such road. The only road across the mountain at that point is called the Anderson road; it is a continuation of the Therman road, and that is the road on which the principal part of the rebel army marched.

The map does not represent correctly the roads across the mountain north of Dunlap. The road which is represented to pass from Pikeville ascends the mountain on the road 7 miles south of Pikeville; it forks on the top of the mountain, one fork going directly to McMinnville, another fork striking the road from McMinnville across the mountain by way of Spencer. That road also continues in the direction of Sparta, either passing through Spencer or leaving Spencer somewhat to the left in going toward Sparta.

The map does not represent correctly the routes pursued by the Army of the Ohio in its various movements. It does not represent the movement up the Sequatchie Valley at all, nor does it represent the march pursued by the divisions of General McCook and General Crittenden across the mountain from the Sequatchie Valley to Pelham.

It does not represent correctly the movements of troops from Altamont, Pelham, Decherd, and in that region toward Murfreesborough.

It does not represent the Glasgow and Bardstown turnpike, by which the rebel army when advancing into Central Kentucky moved a considerable portion of its wagon train.

It does not show the Lebanon and Danville turnpike, which is an important road in connection with the operations of the army in Kentucky.

It does not represent correctly the movements of the army at Perryville after the rebel army retired from that place.

It does not represent correctly the road from Harrodsburg to Camp Dick Robinson, which passes first to Bryantsville a mile north of Camp Dick Robinson.

It represents but one road from Camp Dick Robinson and Bryantsville to Lancaster, whereas there is one from each of these places.

It does not represent the movement of a portion of the Army of the Ohio from Danville to Lancaster and thence on to Crab Orchard.

It does not represent correctly the roads from Louisville to Salt River by which the army moved, though that perhaps is not very important; it is, however, as easy to be accurate as to be inaccurate in that matter. Those are the only material errors I observe now, though I have not examined the map very carefully.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. After our troops took possession of Corinth how long was it before the Army of the Ohio moved in the direction of Chattanooga?

My impression is that it was from eight to ten days after the evacuation of Corinth until I moved up toward Baldwyn and from there marched on in the direction of Chattanooga; that I consider the commencement of our march toward Chattanooga, because two divisions that went up there went on from that point.

Question. What was the object of the movement on Chattanooga?

As I understood it the object was to free East Tennessee from the rebel troops.

Question. It embraced, I suppose, the capture of Chattanooga?

Yes, sir; of course.

Question. After the movement began, if General Buell had moved directly on Chattanooga what was there to prevent its capture?

I have this difficulty in answering the question: My own opinion is that General Buell advanced upon Chattanooga as rapidly as he could, and that the occupation of Chattanooga by the rebel army was the obstacle in addition to General Buell's want of supplies. The difficulty in getting supplies for the army in consequence of breaks made in the roads by the rebels delayed a portion of his command I know at several points on the march toward Chattanooga. If General Buell could have marched his entire army without any delay to Chattanooga, and if by a rapid march he could have reached there before any greater force of the enemy had been concentrated there, I should think he would have had no difficulty in taking Chattanooga, my impression being that at that time there was not a sufficient force of rebels there to resist General Buell's army.

Question. Why was Chattanooga considered a point of so much importance?

Chiefly, I suppose, because of the different railroads that center there and of the river that passes by it.

Question. With General Buell at Chattanooga and General Morgan at Cumberland Gap was not East Tennessee, including the railroad through it to Virginia, in General Buell's power?

I think so, sir.

Question. With Chattanooga in General Buell's possession, with his supplies collected from East Tennessee and all the region commanded by Chattanooga, could not the Army of the Ohio have been subsisted long enough at that point to have covered expeditions and detachments sent to destroy that railroad as far east as Jonesborough?

I know but little of the resources of the country commanded by Chattanooga, except in a limited portion along the Sequatchie Valley. My impression is that it is a barren country, and I suppose from the fact of the rebels having occupied Chattanooga for a considerable time that the country around was somewhat exhausted of its supplies. I suppose also that the force which General Buell would have driven from Chattanooga would have had it in their power to destroy any railroads that he could have used. But I do not believe that he could have subsisted his army upon the country around Chattanooga. General Buell must have reached Chattanooga with but a very limited quantity of supplies, and I think he must have relied for supplies upon the usual road, that is the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. A few days perhaps an army could have lived upon the country, but my impression is not longer than that. I do not think General Buell could have remained at Chattanooga until an expedition could have been sent to Jonesborough. There would have had to be concert and understanding between the forces of General Buell and those at Cumberland Gap. He would have had to remain until the news of his occupation of that place was known at Cumberland Gap and to be apprised that an expedition had started to Knoxville, all of which would have occupied time, and I do not think it would have been practicable for him to have subsisted his army at Chattanooga until that could have been accomplished. General Bragg, we understood, derived his supplies while at Chattanooga from a depot at Atlanta, so far as he did not or could not supply himself from the country around Chattanooga.

Question. Was not the country or any portion of it along your line of march from Corinth to Chattanooga productive and capable of yielding supplies if energy had been used for that purpose?

From the time we got down into the valley perhaps until we reached Tusculumbia the country was a fertile one; the corn fields had been planted and the crops promised to be fine, but the corn was green and not fit for use for our animals. I do not think we passed through any country that would have subsisted such an army if the army had to rely upon the country for its supplies for any length of time. The cotton plantations do not raise much grain ordinarily, and our impression was that they had turned their cotton fields into corn fields, expecting to have great difficulty in getting subsistence for themselves. The old corn was not to be had in any great abundance anywhere on the march. It was a good enough country for meat. I suppose we could have gathered considerable quantities of beef.

Question. Was not the country at least capable of subsisting the army while on its march, without any reference to supplies ahead, supposing you had gleaned it thoroughly, making everything bend to the subsistence of your army?

It is possible that by moving slowly and gathering everything for a considerable distance along the route of the army it could have been subsisted through this valley in Alabama, which I have mentioned as a fertile valley, as far as Tusculumbia. My impression from what I saw of the country was that from there on its subsistence would have been meager if it had to be gathered in the country. The army might have gathered cattle enough, I am inclined to think; if they could have lived on meat alone it might have been done; but the army must necessarily have moved very slowly.

Question. What opposition did the enemy offer to your advance as far as Battle Creek going slowly as it did?

I encountered scarcely anything to be called opposition. I had a few men captured, perhaps a man or two killed, between Huntsville and Stevenson, which was done by small bodies of guerrillas. I saw no enemy.

Question. Was not East Tennessee at that time considered and represented as to a great extent loyal?

It certainly had been represented as loyal. My own experience in Tennessee prevented me from considering any portion of Tennessee as loyal. My impression was that the loyal men in East Tennessee had at that time generally left the State. This, however, is only my impression of what I saw of Tennessees generally. I have no doubt that in their hearts there are still great numbers of Tennessees all over the State who would prefer to be back in the Union, but they are overawed.

Question. Is there any question about the fertility and productiveness of East Tennessee, particularly the valleys?

I know nothing of East Tennessee; it is a portion of the State into which I have never been. I suppose my opinion on that subject is worth nothing.

Question. What is your general information on the subject?

My impression from general information is that it is a good country; not equal at all to the best portions of Tennessee, but a pretty good country.

Question. At what time and place on its march was it ascertained or did it come to be considered that the Army of the Ohio was not equal to the task of taking Chattanooga?

My own opinion is that the idea was never abandoned until Bragg crossed the Tennessee River. I supposed that we were endeavoring to repair the roads, to gather sufficient supplies, that we might go on to Chattanooga. This is my opinion, because we did not move back at once after the roads were broken, and because I understood that boats were being prepared to bridge the Tennessee at Bridgeport, and because I never received any orders that indicated anything else than a movement on Chattanooga. We were seeking information all the time from Chattanooga, and were directed by every possible means to obtain information as to the strength of the enemy there, their movements, and their resources.

Question. If General Buell believed his army unequal to that enterprise, what was his object in distributing it, as he did, over 400 or 500 miles of lines; mainly distributing it, however, with his right on Stevenson and his left at or about McMinnville?

I was never apprised of the object which General Buell had in view by this disposition of his forces. I infer that they were scattered somewhat with a view of having them supplied. Some were sent beyond the breaks. The roads were broken, and we were living on half rations for a great while. I suppose that the object with which he held on at Stevenson was with the hope that he could repair the roads and still take Chattanooga.

Question. Supposing Bragg's army at Chattanooga could have whipped the Army of the Ohio at any time it was so disposed, was not that a very unwise disposition of General Buell's forces, exposing them constantly to attack before they could have time to concentrate to repel it?

I do not see that by that disposition of General Buell's army it was in the power of Bragg to force General Buell into a fight before he could concentrate his army on the road or near his line of communication. Any disposition of his army that would have enabled Bragg to force him into a fight, supposing that Bragg could have whipped General Buell's army, would have been bad. But it seems to me in the case supposed, and as the troops were disposed, that those most advanced in General Buell's army might have retired, and that he could have concentrated his army as he actually did.

Question. If the Army of the Ohio had been fairly concentrated at any point convenient for action, and such as might have been selected by General Buell at his leisure, between Chattanooga and Nashville or between Chattanooga and the Cumberland River on the road to Kentucky, do you believe that Bragg could have whipped that army?

I do not, sir. I believe that that army could have whipped Bragg. I think that's a great army.

Question. If such was your belief, what necessity was there for General Buell's falling back on the defensive at any time?

I do not consider that General Buell did fall back on the defensive at any time, except in so far as he was defending his line of communication, already cut. I consider that General Buell was forced to protect that line of communication, because by that he derived all his supplies; and that he was moving back on his line of communication, ready at any time to fight Bragg if he came to that line; and that he could not go in pursuit of Bragg to force him into a fight, because of his want of supplies. That is my impression.

Question. With his line of communication reaching from Louisville to Nashville and from Nashville to Murfreesborough and from there to Stevenson, his army being distributed on a line from Stevenson to McMinnville, was not that line of communication constantly and continually exposed to precisely the kind of attack that Morgan, Kirby Smith, and Bragg afterward made upon him?

It is a very long line, and I think was always very much exposed, necessarily so. With that disposition of troops from Stevenson to McMinnville I do not think the line was exposed to an attack from Bragg; that is to say, it would be very difficult for General Bragg to get at the line without encountering General Buell. It was certainly exposed to Morgan before that disposition of the troops was made. The troops I believe were on the march, before they reached Stevenson, when Morgan had cut the road. I am not sure about the dates. At all events the upper part of the line was exposed to Kirby Smith and to light troops or cavalry that moved rapidly.

Question. Except such cover as was afforded by General Morgan at Cumberland Gap, was it not known to every intelligent man in the Army of the Ohio, and of course to General Buell, that Kentucky was left almost naked of troops?

I do not know myself what number of troops were in Kentucky, but supposed very few. I cannot say what the opinion of the intelligent officers in the army was with reference to that; but intelligent officers in the army generally acquaint themselves with the locality of any considerable bodies of troops, and I dare say many of them were better posted in regard to the forces in Kentucky than I was myself. I supposed there were but few there, though I did not know. I was very anxious about Kentucky, and feared that she was going to have a very hard time when I heard that Kirby Smith was there; but that was not until I reached Murfreesborough.

Question. If General Buell believed that the Army of the Ohio could not take Chattanooga, distributed as it was, did it not become a mere army of observation?

I cannot say that. General Buell might have undertaken some other enterprise that he considered feasible if he thought he could not take Chattanooga. If the army had remained in that position and undertaken no other enterprise, I should have considered it posted just to watch the movements of Bragg.

Question. Supposing it to have degenerated into an army of observation, to prevent, if possible, the foray into Kentucky or a march of the enemy against Nashville, where, in your judgment, was its true point of observation?

If General Buell had been simply undertaking to cover Kentucky and Nashville, I should think that a portion of his army, disposed as it was, would be somewhat out of place. I was not sufficiently acquainted with all the roads to say where perhaps would have been the true point of observation, but perhaps from McMinnville or from Sparta even to McMinnville and Murfreesborough. This is from a general recollection of the roads on the map. I suppose in those positions he would be enabled to throw himself between Bragg and either one of the points at his option. This is supposing Bragg to be at Chattanooga.

Question. Can you state with any certainty, general, how far Bragg's army had progressed en route for Kentucky before General Buell commenced his concentration of troops at Murfreesborough for the purpose of retiring to Nashville?

I cannot tell for a certainty. My impression is when I received orders to march to Pelham and on to Murfreesborough—which I now suppose was for the purpose of concentrating the army at Murfreesborough—General Bragg was either in the Sequatchie Valley or was coming down into the valley. I will not be positive about the date, but I think I got the order to move about the 24th or 25th of August.

Question. If the Army of the Ohio, instead of being posted from Stevenson to McMinnville, had been posted on the line between McMinnville and Sparta, with Collins Creek and Cahey Fork for its front, would it not have effectually covered Nashville and at the same time been in position, if it could have whipped Bragg's army, to have pursued and overtaken Bragg's army before it crossed the Cumberland River; that is, supposing that army could have got by its flank?

I suppose, with the army posted at that point, that Bragg passing anywhere near to the army he could have been forced to fight before he crossed the Cumberland River; but I could not say, unless some point were designated showing the distance between the armies when it did pass the flank, whether they would have had to fight on the south side of the Cumberland or whether he would have had time to cross it. It would have been in a position I think to cover Nashville, and in a position to whip Bragg's army, supposing Bragg's army to have come near enough to that position to enable General Buell to force him into a fight.

Question. If the purpose was simply to hold Bragg with his army in Chattanooga what is the objection to taking up a position with the Army of the Ohio concentrated close to the Tennessee River on the north bank in front of Chattanooga; and in that event and with that disposition would not the Tennessee have been a very serious obstacle to Bragg's front and a very great advantage to our army?

The objection would be the want of supplies and the difficulty of getting them into that position. I think the Tennessee River would have been a very considerable obstacle.

Question. You see no objection to it, then, except the difficulty of getting supplies to the army at such a point?

I can think of no other objection.

Question. At any time after 4 o'clock on the day of the battle of Perryville what was there to have prevented you from cutting off the enemy's retreat while they were engaged driving McCook's corps and how long would such a movement on your part have required; that is, could you have accomplished it before night, supposing this driving of McCook's corps of which you speak to have been between 2 and 4 o'clock?

My command was posted some $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles on the side of Perryville opposite to the side which was occupied by the enemy when they made that attack upon McCook. How far they were from the road by which they retreated to Harrodsburg after the fight I cannot say. If we had started simultaneously, my impression is I could have marched to the point where they probably came down into the road almost as soon as they overcame the natural obstacles. I would probably have encountered some resistance in Perryville. I have no doubt, in fact I know, they covered their flank by a considerable force in Perryville, and I suppose it would have been night by the time I could have reached the point near which they must have turned in the road, starting at 4 o'clock, and it would have been a pretty rapid movement then if resisted at all. I do not now remember at what time it was dark. I think I could have accomplished the distance in two hours.

Question. As I understand you, general, you make that answer upon the supposition that the enemy would have contested your advance into Perryville?

Yes, sir.

Question. But suppose that advance had not been contested; suppose a brigade from General Gilbert's corps had already marched through Perryville and reached a point in the enemy's rear on the other side of the town?

In that case I could have moved more rapidly, and supposing the distance would have been 5 miles, I could have done it in one and a half hours in an emergency.

Question. Would the movement of your corps that distance have been any way complicated?

Not at all, sir.

Question. What would have been your movement?

If I supposed I should have been resisted in Perryville I should have moved in line; but if I had known that there would have been no resistance and no enemy in Perryville, that they had retreated, I would have moved in column along the road; or if I could have moved more rapidly the different divisions through the woods where they were posted and through the fields I should have done so. I do not remember precisely the natural obstacles I might possibly have had to avoid; there were some perhaps on the extreme right; but I rather think I could have moved the three divisions in column right straight through the town of Perryville.

Question. If a council of officers composed of such men as Thomas, Wood, Negley, with all the facts that could be brought before them at the time, had determined that it was better to make a stand at Sparta or McMinnville against Bragg coming from Chattanooga, would you have concurred in that proposition?

I should be very loath to have taken a position antagonistic to officers of such attainments with my little experience and want of military knowledge; yet still I think it would depend entirely on my conviction and the strength of my conviction what course I would take if I were responsible for the movement. I think if the country had made me responsible that I should have relied upon my own convictions where they were firm and decided.

By General SCHOEPP:

Question. Was not Rockcastle River, Kentucky, a very serious obstacle in the pursuit of Bragg's army?

I cannot say that it was a serious obstacle; we soon crossed the river. We encountered very little resistance, and that was from a force of cavalry along there. The resistance was more by the felling of trees obstructing the road. It might have been made a very serious obstacle.

Question. Will you please give your opinion in regard to the means of crossing the river; also a description of the river itself, and the number of troops and the amount of transportation you had with you and the time it took you to cross?

The river is a narrow stream, running through a very mountainous, broken country, sometimes with very precipitous hills for its banks. It is a stream full of very deep pools, but at that season of the year there was little water in running over shoals. I cannot state what transportation I had; I do not remember. I am not sure what portion of my command crossed Rockcastle River. One division, I think, did not cross the river. I rather think two divisions did. As to means of crossing the river, I required none; I do not suppose there were 4 inches of water on the ford. We had no difficulty in crossing, and no more time was occupied in crossing, or very little more, than at any other portion of the march. It was up hill and down merely. The time we lost was not produced by any difficulty we encountered at the ford. I do not now remember certainly whether we were stopped at all by the rebel cavalry there. They planted their guns and resisted us a little at every advantageous place, but my recollection is that just at that ford we were not delayed, though I cannot be positive about that.

Question. Did not Major-General McCook, in failing to make the reconnaissance ordered by General Buell and reporting the same to headquarters, as he was directed to do, on the 8th of October, really bring on the disaster of that day and keep the general in command in ignorance of it until too late to remedy the disaster—supposing the fact is before you?

Even supposing the fact that he failed to make the reconnaissance which he was ordered to make, I cannot say what effect that neglect or failure of General McCook had upon the events of the day. I cannot say, therefore, that such failure brought on the disaster. I do not know precisely the object of the reconnaissance and I cannot say that General McCook kept the general in command in ignorance; but if he did keep the general in ignorance of so important a fact as the repulse of that day until it was too late for the general to remedy the disaster then undoubtedly he was greatly to blame in my judgment.

Question. As General Gilbert with two divisions was in close proximity to General McCook's army corps, was it not his duty to be in front instead of in the rear with the reserve division, and had he been so is it possible that he would have been ignorant of the battle?

My idea of the proper position for the general commanding an army corps is that it should be at some central point most accessible to all his command and that it should be in the rear. As to whether he should have been with the two front divisions or with the reserve division I cannot say. If the reserve division was near enough really to support his two divisions in front and occupied a central position, I should say that that was his proper position. I was not on the ground occupied by General Gilbert or any portion of his command, and I cannot say whether he would possibly have been ignorant of the battle had he been with his two front divisions. I was not very far from General Gilbert, I presume not over 2 miles, and I certainly was ignorant of it; but I do not know that the 2 miles which separated me from General Gilbert would have enabled me or him to go up to the front to have heard the battle.

Question. Do you know that Captain Gilbert, quartermaster or assistant quartermaster, disguised himself in a major-general's uniform and reported himself as such to General Buell?

I do not, sir; nor do I believe that such is the fact.

Question. Have you not seen him wearing two stars on a major-general's uniform?

Frequently.

Question. Is he a major-general now?

I understand he is not.

Question. Do you think an officer educated at West Point would have known that no one but the President had the right to appoint a major-general?

Yes, sir; I suppose no officer educated at West Point is ignorant of the appointing power in this Government.

By General TYLER :

Question. You were a corps commander at the battles of Perryville and Stone River, were you not ?

No, sir; I was a corps commander at the battle of Perryville, and at Stone River I commanded what was known as the left wing.

Question. What number of men did your command consist of respectively in these two battles ?

At Perryville I suppose my command was somewhere near 23,000 men, and I believe, though my memory is bad about such things, that I commanded at the battle of Stone River somewhere about 13,000 men on the field.

Question. Did you, as corps or wing commander, receive in advance, from the commanders-in-chief respectively, plans of the battles of Perryville and Stone River, and was the part your command was to take in these battles pointed out to you by special instructions ?

My testimony has shown that I had little to do with the battle of Perryville. The only instructions I received in advance of the battle are contained in an order which I believe has been submitted by General Buell to the Commission during my examination. I received no other instructions or orders in advance of the battle at Perryville. At Stone River I received no instructions except to advance upon Murfreesborough by the Murfreesborough and Nashville road. At one time the general supposed that the enemy were evacuating Murfreesborough, and I received a dispatch by the signal corps to occupy Murfreesborough with one division on the night of the 29th.

Question. Excuse me, general, you are getting away from the object of this question. The question is whether you received any specific orders as to what your corps was to perform in the battles of Perryville and Stone River ?

I never did.

Question. In answer to a question yesterday you ran a parallel between the movements of the two armies of Perryville and Stone River respectively, and contrasted the conduct of the troops engaged in those battles. Please continue the parallel, and inform the Commission what you saw and heard as to the conduct of the two commanders of those armies on the battle field in directing the movements and leading the troops.

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I must object to the question, Mr. President. The subject was introduced yesterday, but it is going entirely out of the proper course of our investigation, and if it is allowed it is impossible to say where it will end. What has a parallel between those two battles to do with the operations of the army in the campaign of Tennessee and Kentucky ? We might as well attempt to run a parallel between the battle of Bunker Hill and Bull Run defeat. It may be my ignorance, but I cannot see the pertinency of the question to the investigation we have on hand.

General BUELL. I request that the witness may be permitted to answer the question.

General TYLER. I foresaw the difficulty in introducing the course of testimony by General Ord and voted against it.

General DANA. I call the general to order. He has no right to expose the votes of this court.

General TYLER. The general is correct.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

THE WITNESS. I will state that in running the parallel between the two battles yesterday I was answering the questions which were propounded to me by the Commission. As to the conduct of General Buell at the battle of Perryville I can say nothing. During the day on which that battle was fought I do not think I saw General Buell. I remained with my command all day and I do not think he was there. At Stone River I saw General Rosecrans very frequently during the battle. I do not think that I contrasted the conduct of the troops in the two battles. As to my opinion about the two commanders it is a very decided one.

General TYLER. It is not a matter of opinion, general; it is as to what you saw and heard of the conduct of the two commanders on the battle-field.

As I said, I did not see General Buell at Perryville, nor do I now remember to have heard of him on the battle-field at any place except at headquarters. Since the battle undoubtedly I have heard General Buell's conduct criticised. I have heard it spoken of as a most extraordinary thing that he permitted a portion of his army to be engaged and repulsed by the enemy when he had a large force there that was not engaged at all. I have heard many other officers say that General Buell was not to blame at all for the matter. I stated that I saw General Rosecrans frequently on the battle-field at Stone River. I saw him galloping about the field in many directions. I have heard him censured by a great many officers for his impetuosity, for his great excitement during the battle. I have heard him censured by commanders because they said they could not turn their backs on their commands without his ordering portions of them away.

General DANA. Would there be a manifest propriety or impropriety in the commanding general of an army of 40,000 men habitually exposing himself to a dangerous fire?

I do not think a commander who habitually exposes himself to a dangerous fire is qualified to command any large army.

By General DANA:

Question. In proportion as the size of this army and the importance of this command increases, say up to 65,000 or 70,000 men, would the disqualification be more or less apparent if he habitually exposed himself to danger?

In my judgment more dangerous. It would be a decided disqualification.

Question. Would there be propriety in the commanding general of an army, with less than half of his troops engaged, and with his reserves entirely fresh and out of action, to head an assault or to appear in the midst of a murderous fire?

There would be great impropriety in such conduct in my judgment.

Question. As a general rule is the sudden death or the sudden disabling of the commanding general of a large army among the worst disasters that can befall it?

As a general rule, yes.

Question. Do you or do you not consider it of doubtful propriety for the commanding general of a large army to lead a charge under any circumstances, except when his last reserves are being brought into action, his situation becoming desperate, and an absolute necessity exists for the moral courage of his troops to be restored by the impetuosity of daring and the encouragement which is inspired by the immediate presence of the commanding general?

I think that a commanding general of a large army ought never to expose himself by leading a charge so long as there is any place left for his judgment and coolness and discretion, and that he ought to remain out of the confusion of battle, where he could control and direct the movements of his entire army, and that only in the last resort, when everything depended upon the valor of his troops, only then could he be justified or excused by putting himself at the head of his men and leading a charge.

Question. Do you know of any other instance in the life of Napoleon than the desperate charges at Arcola and Lodi and the last desperate effort at Waterloo where he led charges, and did you ever hear of his conduct being impeached on the field of battle?

I remember no other charges led by Napoleon, and I think there are few military men bold enough to criticise the conduct of Napoleon as a commander.

Question. Do you remember whether General Scott, in throwing himself with 10,000 men in the heart of the enemy's country in the valley of Mexico, with an organized army in front of him of 30,000 men, a hostile country all around him, his line of communication gone entirely, ever headed a charge?

I do not remember any such instance and I think there was no such instance.

Question. Do you remember whether at the most desperate battle that General Zachary Taylor fought, at Buena Vista, where with 5,000 Union troops he successfully resisted after three days' fighting 25,000 Mexicans, in any of the assaults there he ever headed a charge?

I know that he never headed a charge at all at that battle.

Question. Did you ever know of General Grant heading a charge since he has been in the Army?

I never did, sir.

Question. Did you ever hear of General McClellan, when he was in command of an army of 120,000 men, heading a charge?

I never did, sir.

Question. Or did you ever hear that General Burnside at Fredericksburg headed the assault of his troops, or did he remain on his own side of the river?

The information I have had in reference to that is that he remained on his own side of the river.

Question. Did you ever hear of General Butler, in all his campaign in Louisiana, heading a charge?

I never did.

General DANA here offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in consideration of the unusual length at which the members of the Commission have examined the present witness an opportunity be now offered General Buell to question him again, making this case an exception to our rule."

Carried.

General SCHOEPPF, in explanation of his vote in the negative, desired the following stand upon the record:

"The reason I vote no is because I think the resolution unnecessary, as whenever General Buell has desired to ask questions the members of the Commission have shown themselves willing to adopt them."

The Commission adjourned to meet March 7, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, March 7, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members resent; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General CRITTENDEN concluded.

By General BUELL:

Question. State, if you please, when the enemy commenced his formidable cavalry operations in Kentucky against the line of communication of the army in Kentucky and Tennessee.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I shall have to object to that question, Mr. President. I understand that the resolution passed last evening turned General Crittenden over to General Buell for examination simply upon such new matter as the Commission in its examination may have brought out. This certainly is not that new matter.

General DANA. It certainly is a great stretch of imagination on the part of the judge-advocate in supposing that any resolution was necessary to be introduced for the purpose of confining General Buell to an examination on the new matter introduced by the Commission. The resolution is to turn the witness over to General Buell in consideration of the witness having been put through such an extraordinary examination by the Commission.

General BUELL. I should like to know how the judge-advocate knows that the question I have asked has not reference to the matter introduced in the examination of yesterday. I do not know how he can be sure of it.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I only judge, Mr. President, from the question itself. This matter of cutting the lines of communication had been gone into in the examination-in-chief, was cross-examined upon by myself and afterward by the Commission. It certainly forms no part of the new matter introduced by the Commission yesterday or the day before. If General Dana's explanation of the resolution is correct, then the witness has to be turned over to General Buell as if he had not been examined at all. The resolution itself does not express what was the intention.

The court was cleared; when, after the passage of a resolution introduced by the president, it was decided that the question should be put.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would ask General Buell to state to what matter this question has reference, because it evidently does not refer to the new matter introduced by the Commission.

General BUELL. The question refers to questions which were asked yesterday with reference to the force that was left in Kentucky to guard against inroads into the State and operations against communications of the Army in Tennessee. The object of the question is to explain that matter.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I withdraw my objection.

The WITNESS. I cannot state precisely the date. I think the first formidable array of the enemy against our lines of communications in Kentucky was after we left Corinth and while we were on the Tennessee River, but I cannot remember the date. My impression is that it must have occurred in July. It might have been as early as the latter part of June.

By General BUELL :

Question. What force do you suppose would have been necessary in Kentucky to prevent such incursions ?

I really would find great difficulty in stating what force would be necessary to prevent such incursions. I think it would have required a very large force. I would say that from 20,000 to 25,000 might possibly have guarded the State against such incursions.

Question. Would it have been possible, do you suppose, to spare a force for that purpose from the forces under my command and at the same time maintain the advanced positions which we occupied in Tennessee ?

I think not, sir.

Question. Do you recognize any difference between the nature and objects of all military operations in this rebellion and the nature and objects of military operations against a foreign foe under ordinary circumstances?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President, on the same ground that I objected to the other. It is not based upon any new matter introduced by the Commission.

General BUELL. The new matter which this question has reference to is the plan put forward in a portion of the examination of yesterday of a temporary advance into East Tennessee for the purpose of destroying the railroads, which it was supposed might be accomplished in a short time and with the supplies the army had last summer.

The court was cleared, and after discussion it was decided that the objection should be sustained.

General BUELL. The only object I had in the re-examination of General Crittenden was to throw light upon certain theories for a campaign which were started in the examination of yesterday. The question which has just been objected to and the objection to which has been sustained has reference to one of these theories, so that I suppose the same action would be had upon any further questions I would ask of General Crittenden, at all events the more material of them, and therefore I have no more questions to put.

The PRESIDENT. I think, general, you misapprehended the effect of this vote. If you have any questions with reference to new theories which were certainly introduced there would be no objection. The question of yours, general, as it stands upon the record, does not seem to come within the rule.

General BUELL. This question had reference to such theories, one in particular. I would rather not commence the examination at all than be restricted to any specific form of questions. In fact, sir, I am not particularly anxious to examine the witness at all. I do not see anything in the examination of yesterday that I think very important, and therefore, and for the reason already stated, I forego the re-examination of the witness.

General DANA. I have quite a number of questions to ask.

The question being raised whether it would be in accordance with the rule established, the court was cleared; and, on the question being put whether the witness should be recalled for further examination by the Commission, it was decided in the negative.

General DANA. I wish to state that there were certain questions put to this witness—

General TYLER. I moved that the court be cleared.

General DANA. I object to it.

On the order of the president the court was cleared.

On the opening of the court, by permission of the Commission, General Crittenden made the following explanation:

It was, I think, in answer to a question of yours, general (president), as to whether if I had received an order at 4 o'clock, how long it would have taken me to march to the enemy, or where I expected to encounter the enemy, on the road to Harrodsburg. Upon reflection, sir, I think I answered too hastily. The distance being about 5 miles, I could not have issued orders to my command and have moved that distance in the time stated. I do not remember precisely how the question was put, but I supposed myself at the time to be in motion with my command at 4 o'clock, and that in an emergency I could have accomplished it in the time stated. But to have issued the order at 4 o'clock, with a line 2 miles long and either to have marched in line or to have thrown that line into column and marched that distance, would have required much more time. It would have taken from half to three-quarters of an hour to have started. That is the correction I wish to make to the court.

Maj. C. S. COTTER (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States.

C. S. Cotter; major of the First Regiment Ohio Artillery, and chief of artillery on Major-General McCook's staff.

Question. Were you on duty with the Army of the Ohio at the battle of Perryville?

I was.

Question. Were you taken prisoner by the enemy in that battle? If so, state where you were taken to afterward and when you were released?

I was taken prisoner on the 8th of October, on the Mackville road, about 50 yards on the left of the road, in rear of Russell's house. I was taken by Major-General Polk, and was taken to the rear as far as Harrodsburg. I was there released on parole on the 10th of October.

Question. Did you observe the movements of the enemy about Harrodsburg on the 10th of October?

I did, sir.

Question. What time did you return to the Army of the Ohio and did you report yourself at my headquarters?

I returned to the Army of the Ohio and was at your headquarters between 5 and 6 o'clock on the morning of the 11th of October.

Question. Did you visit my tent at that time for a particular object?

I did. Having observed the movements of the enemy, I thought it was necessary you should be prepared for them. I made for your headquarters the first thing I did on being released.

Question. Please state what report you made to me in regard to the movements of the enemy on that occasion.

I told you that on the morning of the 10th Kirby Smith had joined Generals Bragg, Buckner, Cheatham, and Hardee, and that he was moving with his whole force upon what I supposed was the Perryville road. General Smith was moving with his force of from 15,000 to 18,000, and while watching their movements I heard some little firing at the front, and couriers came back, riding very rapidly, and taking the direction to Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. Are you stating the report you made to me?

Yes, sir; and that I thought they were massing their troops on that road and that we should probably be attacked.

Question. What road do you refer to as the road on which the enemy was massing his troops?

The road running from Harrodsburg to Perryville.

Question. Did you state that the road on which they were moving was the Perryville road or one you supposed was the Perryville road?

The one I supposed to be the Perryville road.

Question. Was your report such as to leave any doubt upon that point or did you state distinctly that the enemy was moving and forming in our front?

I stated to you that they were forming on our front and that they had a heavy force of cavalry upon the Danville road and every indication that I could see or learn of was an indication of a movement to attack you.

Question. Had you at the time you made that report any doubt that that was the intention of the enemy or at least that he was forming in front of us to give battle?

I had no doubt in my own mind in regard to it. Of course I had no opportunity of knowing except from the information I could get or see or judge from, and I felt it my duty, although I had given my parole of honor, to inform you of the fact.

Question. Do you know what time the forces under Kirby Smith commenced passing through Harrodsburg to take their position?

On the morning of the 10th, about 7 or 8 o'clock; the advance guard of Kirby Smith came in about 6 o'clock.

Question. How long did they continue passing through the town or how long did you observe them?

They made a halt in the town for a few moments. General Kirby Smith rode up to General Bragg's headquarters. I saw him and watched the movements as close as I could, being under guard and having the liberty of the town at the time. They were passing from 8 to 12 o'clock.

Question. You say you were under guard when you obtained this information?

Yes, sir.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. How did you come by the information you carried to General Buell?

I saw movement of troops and had conversation with some staff officers belonging to the different generals. I also had conversation with some Union men.

Question. Were the movements you saw in and about Harrodsburg?

They were.

Question. By what road did they come into Harrodsburg and by what route did they go out?

I could not tell you the name of the road by which they came into Harrodsburg. I do not recollect that point. They went out on the Perryville road. It must have been the Perryville road I came in on.

Question. Between what hours were they moving out on the Perryville road?

I judge from 8 to 12 o'clock in the morning; it might have been earlier and it might have been a little later; I did not notice the hour at the time.

Question. In what manner did they move out on that Perryville road—closed up, and was it a continuous column of men?

It was. It moved up with men in columns of fours, and with artillery. I paid more attention to the artillery, being in that branch of service, than to the infantry.

Question. Was that the morning of the 9th?

It was the morning of the 10th.

Question. What conversation had you with staff officers in reference to these movements that you reported to General Buell?

I had no conversation with them in regard to the movements.

Question. At what time were you paroled?

I was paroled at 9 o'clock. I refused to take the parole at first, because I thought I could be exchanged sooner by not taking the parole. I did take the parole on the evening of the 9th.

Question. How did it happen that you remained there till the afternoon of the 10th after being liberated?

They refused to let me go at first until they could send us out from their lines with an escort.

Question. Who do you mean by "we"?

The whole of the prisoners who were taken.

Question. There was no restraint placed upon your observation about that time, was there?

No, sir; they gave us the liberty of the town, but we had a guard following us all the time.

Question. Now state, if you please, what troops they were that were sent out on the Perryville road between 8 and 12 o'clock on the morning of the 10th.

The forces under Kirby Smith. I do not know the troops except by their battle-flags. There were troops moving in every direction. There were troops moving on the road leading from Camp Dick Robinson; also on the Perryville road. Cavalry was constantly going and couriers going and coming all the time. The troops of Kirby Smith did not go out by the road to Camp Dick Robinson (as laid down on the map), but on the road (as laid down on the map) leading from Harrodsburg to Perryville.

Question. Look at the map, if you please, and inform the Commission what road you mean by the Perryville and the road to Camp Dick Robinson?

(Referring to Perryville map.) It was upon this road from Harrodsburg to Perryville that I was taken in—the road from Camp Dick Robinson as laid down upon the map.

Question. Are you certain, major, that these troops you saw leaving Harrodsburg were moving down upon this road leading from Harrodsburg to Danville?

I am certain they did not come down on that road unless there were other roads across the country from which they could come on to this road, because they came up on the Perryville road.

Question. Where and how did you learn the fact that Hardee, Cheatham, and Kirby Smith united were moving down upon the Army of the Ohio?

When I was brought in from Harrodsburg on the morning of the 9th we then passed the troops retreating on the Perryville road to Harrodsburg. I was taken out upon the Danville pike on the cross-road; kept here till 3 in the morning; was then taken upon a cross-road, and passed the troops of Buckner, Hardee, and Polk retreating into Harrodsburg. That was on the morning of the 9th. They then took the road down to Camp Dick Robinson on that day. I could see them from the building in which I was placed and observed them going back. I saw their battle-flags and had explained to me which were Hardee's forces, which were Cheatham's, and which Buckner's. On the morning of the 10th Kirby Smith came in. I do not know what road it is that leads out of Harrodsburg; it was not the Camp Dick Robinson road or the Danville or the Perryville road on which Kirby Smith's forces came.

Question. If you saw Buckner's, Hardee's, and Cheatham's forces retreat down toward Camp Dick Robinson and Kirby Smith's forces march down toward Perryville how came you to report that there was a junction of those forces and that they were moving down to attack the Army of the Ohio?

This was upon the morning of the 9th that I saw these forces going down upon the road leading to Camp Dick Robinson. On the morning of the 10th Kirby Smith's forces came into Harrodsburg and the forces of Buckner and Cheatham came back upon the road leading from Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. What time on the morning of the 10th did you see these forces coming back from Camp Dick Robinson?

While Kirby Smith's forces were moving through Harrodsburg couriers came in riding very rapidly from Perryville and went out on the road leading from Harrodsburg to Camp Dick Robinson. I should judge it was between 10 and 11 o'clock that these forces commenced coming on the Camp Dick Robinson road. They came down the Perryville road and went up the Harrodsburg road.

Question. Did their forces form a part of the column you have described as marching out from Harrodsburg toward Perryville between the hours of 8 and 12?

I cannot state exactly whether they did form part or not. A part of them went out upon that road. I do not know exactly when Kirby Smith's whole force got to the end of it; they were moving when I left Harrodsburg, which was 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Question. What force was it, then, you said moved out between 8 and 12 o'clock?

Kirby Smith's forces.

Question. What force, then, moved out between 12 and 3 o'clock?

I went to get some dinner at 12 o'clock at a hotel, and when I came out of it I saw the troops still moving on the Camp Dick Robinson road. How long it took Kirby Smith's force to get through there I do not know.

Question. In what direction were they moving on the Harrodsburg and Camp Dick Robinson road?

They were moving into Harrodsburg.

Question. Why cannot you then say, if you saw it, whether Buckner, Hardee, and Cheatham formed a junction with Kirby Smith?

I stated that I supposed they formed a junction; in fact I know that they formed a junction.

Question. By what road did you leave Harrodsburg to join the Army of the Ohio?

By the Danville road.

Question. At what point did you meet our forces?

We were taken out upon the Danville pike leading from Harrodsburg to Danville. We were then taken out upon the pike leading from Danville to Perryville for about 3, 4, or 5 miles perhaps. We were then taken upon a circuitous route; I do not know by what name the road is called; it was to the left of the Danville road going from Danville to Perryville. We met our pickets the other side of Perryville. We marched some 30 miles to get there.

Question. What time did you arrive at the point where you met our forces?

Probably about 3 or 4 o'clock on the morning of the 11th. I do not recollect the exact time.

Question. Where did you find General Buell's headquarters?

I went out upon the pike leading from Perryville to Harrodsburg and found General Buell's headquarters to the left of the pike.

Question. How far from Perryville?

I should judge it to be 2 or 2½ miles.

Question. Upon what day did you see General Buell?

On the morning of the 11th of October.

Question. Did you report to General Buell that you saw Buckner, Hardee, and Cheatham going down toward Camp Dick Robinson?

I do not recollect whether I did or not. It was but a short time after daylight that I got there, and I felt it necessary for him to know what information I had obtained, and do not know whether I told him I saw the forces retreating to Camp Dick Robinson or not on the morning of the 9th.

Question. Did you consider it right to violate your parole as you did in reporting to General Buell in regard to the movements of the enemy?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President. It is not necessary for any purpose of this investigation, and it is not the province of the judge-advocate to admonish this officer. I presume the Commission itself will not undertake to admonish him.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The witness appears upon the stand precisely as any other witness would do and gives us a statement of facts. I have a right to inquire into his status as I would into that of any witness coming before this or any court. Now, I want to know whether this witness considers it right to violate his oath given under those circumstances; if he does, it may have a decided influence in the estimate of the facts he lays before us.

General BUELL. I desire to express my astonishment and my regret that this method should be adopted of instructing officers in regard to their duties. I do not think it is necessary nor do I think it is in good taste.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was resolved that the objection should be sustained.

Question. State to the Commission whether you consider that you violated your parole in giving that information to General Buell.

No, sir; I did not.

Question. Did it turn out subsequently that the information you gave was correct?

I do not know, sir. I left the same day for the rear. I wished to remain, but was not allowed.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. Were you with General McCook during the battle of the 8th. And, if so, please state where his position was from 12 till 4 in the afternoon of that day.

I was at the front when the battle commenced, and did not see Major-General McCook till 12 o'clock. I saw him several times on the field during the battle. At 4 o'clock he was with me at the point known as Russell's house. I did not see him afterward, as I was taken prisoner. I was in charge of the five batteries of artillery, that I was working to the best advantage that I could, according to my judgment, and consequently did not see the general only when he came by. I saw him several times riding by.

Question. What time in the afternoon did you first see General McCook?

I could not state positively what time; I should judge somewhere about 2 o'clock, when I rode up to him and told him I wanted some support for one battery, and he gave me the requisite order to move up the Thirty-eighth Indiana, Colonel Scribner's, to support Simonson's battery. I moved that regiment up and was engaged with my batteries and consequently did not see him. I saw him several times riding along the line of battle. I distinctly remember seeing him at 4 o'clock near Russell's house, where I placed two pieces of Hotchkiss' Minnesota battery. I showed him the rebel lines where they were planting a battery, and before we got away they fired upon us, and he immediately sent back to the end of the line. I was engaged upon the right entirely and did not go to the left at all. When I say the right of our line, I mean the center, to the right of McCook's corps.

Question. Was General McCook aware that the battle was in progress when you first met him?

He must have been aware of it, because they had been cannonading for some half or three-quarters of an hour before I saw him.

Question. You stated you met him on several occasions; did you see any of the members of his staff with him, particularly Captain Hoblitzell?

I could not be positive as to whether I saw Captain Hoblitzell with him or not. I saw one or two of his staff at the time referred to. I was very much occupied with my artillery, and did not particularly notice any one but the commanding officer, from whom I received instructions.

Question. Do you know at what time General McCook sent Captain Hoblitzell to General Buell with information about the battle?

I think it was a little before 4; I cannot say positively what time it was, whether before or after. I rode up to General McCook and said to him—he was at the front, at Russell's house—I said, "We must have more re-enforcements; they will drive in our right and I shall lose my batteries," and he immediately turned to one of his staff—I cannot recollect whether it was Captain Hoblitzell or not—and sent him to General Buell for re-enforcements. I think he sent some one to General Gilbert. He then rode down with me to Russell's house to show me the position of the rebel lines. They were then coming down four lines deep. It was at that time they fired upon us with their batteries.

By General ORD:

Question. Do you know whether General McCook had sent previous to this time for re-enforcements, to whom he sent, and about what time?

No, sir; I do not. We formed our line of battle upon the Chaplin Hills, and a section was moving from there as they attacked us. We were not expecting an attack. We had our line of battle formed there. I think they opened upon us about 2 or 3 o'clock. I was there when they fired the first shot. We were skirmishing then, as we had been all the morning, with the rear of the army.

Question. When do you consider that the battle was finally closed, and there was no further fight to front of fighting?

About 5 o'clock in the evening there was very heavy firing. We ceased firing at dark. When I was taken prisoner I was riding into the lines which I supposed was our army; it was after dark. I rode up to a point that half an hour before our forces were on, intending to put some artillery there to open out upon them by moonlight.

Question. Did the re-enforcements sent for come?

Just before dark—I do not recollect the exact time—there was one brigade of four regiments sent down to a point near Russell's house to the cross-road. I think the road runs from the Mackville road to the pike leading from Bardstown into Perryville. They came down upon that road. Probably we were there half an hour, and if we had had re-enforcements, probably at 4 o'clock—had they been there half an hour earlier we could have held our right.

Question. Do you know whether any other applications were made for re-enforcements than the one you have spoken of?

I do not, sir; because I was engaged entirely with the artillery on the right, and and did not know what the left was doing all the time.

Question. How far was the right driven back? Did the retreat begin before the re-enforcements came up?

From 400 to 500 yards.

Question. Was the retreat in good order or did it appear to be a panic?

The retreat was in good order. I fetched off all my artillery and did not lose a piece of the twenty-six I had.

The Commission adjourned to meet March 9, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Monday, March 9, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BUELL wishing to introduce a witness whose name was not included in the list furnished the judge-advocate by General Buell and who was therefore excluded by the resolution of General Tyler—

General ORD moved that the witness be considered as within the rule.

The PRESIDENT. I wish, general, you would state what you expect to prove by this witness.

General BUELL. I wish to show by this witness that the forces of Kirby Smith moved through Harrodsburg toward Perryville on the morning of the 10th. The evidence of this witness I expect will confirm the evidence given by Major Cotter on Saturday, and I may as well say that I shall have other witnesses to call upon the same matter until the Commission shall consider themselves satisfied on that point and that the rebel army occupied a position south of Perryville on the 10th, as is presumed, for the purpose of battle.

Mr. H. W. HIERONYMUS (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. State your name and place of residence.

H. W. Hieronymus; Harrodsburg, Ky.

Question. Were you in Harrodsburg between the 8th and 12th of October last?

Yes, sir.

Question. State whether or not you witnessed the movements of the rebel troops about that place between those dates, and what you know of those movements from the 7th to the 12th inclusive.

On the 7th, in the afternoon, after dinner, all the forces that were at Harrodsburg went in the direction of Perryville. I made the inquiry where they were going, and they said they were going to re-enforce Bragg at Perryville. They returned that evening; they came in between 8 and 10 o'clock, and the next morning they all went in the direction of Perryville—that is, the 8th, the day of the battle. On the next morning some of them came into Harrodsburg, I suppose between 11 and 12 o'clock. I believe that was the first I saw, and I asked a young man I knew from Tennessee what was the matter, and he said, "I suppose we are retreating;" but what was the force that came into Harrodsburg I do not recollect. Bragg's army came up the Perryville and Harrodsburg turnpike road and they went on the Cave Run road in part; but there are three roads to Camp Dick Robinson from Harrodsburg; their names are the Danville, Bellus' Mill, and Cave Run roads; and then there is a ferry 8 miles from Harrodsburg called Baker's Ferry, but I never crossed it and do not know what facilities there are for crossing.

Question. Do you know whether the whole of Bragg's force passed through Harrodsburg the day after the battle?

No, sir; I do not.

Question. How far on the road to Camp Dick Robinson did these troops that you saw go?

I do not know. I do not know whether they encamped at the Big Spring or went farther. I cannot tell.

Question. On what road is the Big Spring and how far from Harrodsburg?

It is near the Lexington pike, where the Cave Run road leaves the Lexington road—just at the fork of the Lexington and Cave Run roads and some 150 to 300 yards from the forks of those roads.

Question. Is it on the left of the Lexington road or on the right and how far from the town?

On the left of the road. It is in the town limits, I think; it is three-quarters of a mile from the court-house.

Question. Where did the troops that started for Perryville on the evening of the 7th come from?

From that spring; they were located around that spring.

Question. Do you know whether they belonged to Bragg's army proper or to Kirby Smith's?

I do not know.

Question. How long had they been at the Big Spring?

I do not know. They were moving all the time in and out, passing backward and forward.

Question. State now, if you please, what movements of the rebel army you witnessed on the 10th?

Kirby Smith's army commenced coming into Harrodsburg and passing through it at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 10th; they passed on until 6.30 or 7 in the afternoon.

Question. Which road did they move on in passing through the town?

A number moved on the Perryville road, but what number I do not know.

Question. Do you know of any of them going on any other road?

No, sir.

Question. Did they all pass along the same street in going through the town?

The soldiers did; the wagons did not.

Question. The soldiers, I understand you, passed on the Perryville road?

Yes, sir; on the Perryville road—that is, the right-hand road; the wagons went on the left.

Question. On what road did these troops come into town and from what place, if you know?

From the neighborhood of Lawrenceburg, on the Frankfort and Louisville pike, so I understood.

Question. Did the troops at the Big Spring remain there the day of the 10th?

There were troops there, but how many I do not know.

Question. Do you know whether the troops you say stopped at the spring on the 9th moved from there on the 10th? If so, where did they go to?

I do not think they all left there on the 10th.

Question. Did they form part of the troops that passed through Harrodsburg toward Perryville on the 10th?

That I am not exactly able to answer.

Question. Do you know when these troops that you say went through Harrodsburg toward Perryville on the 10th returned?

Some of them were returning on the morning of the 11th, but how many passed through previous to that I cannot say.

Question. Where did the rebel army go after leaving Harrodsburg—the last you saw of it?

From the best information I had it was to Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. When did the last of it leave Harrodsburg for Camp Dick Robinson?

On Saturday morning, the 11th of October, the Federals came in, as I supposed, between 11 and 12; it may have been between 11 and 1 I saw them coming through.

Question. Did you on the 11th know positively that the rebel army had gone on the Camp Dick Robinson road?

I do not know that all went on that road, but a considerable number had gone that road, from the best information I could get.

Question. What kind of road is there from Dick's River to Camp Dick Robinson on what you call the Cave Run road?

It is a good road; that is, from Dick's River to Bryantsville and Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. Is it a graded road and perfectly practicable for wagons, or is it a difficult road?

It is a graded road and practicable for wagons, as I have been informed, and a good road, but I have not passed over it for some little time.

Question. Have you any idea of the quantity of water that is required for a large army?

No, sir; I have not.

Question. How is Harrodsburg and the vicinity supplied with water; are there many large springs or streams immediately about the town?

There is this one spring. That is a large spring and does not exhaust at all; all others do. That is the principal spring. At that time it was a dry season, and we had little water in the town except at this spring.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Which way did the troops go that came into Harrodsburg from toward Perryville on the 9th, when the young man told you they were retreating?

From the best information I could get they went on the Camp Dick Robinson or the Cave Run road.

Question. How far toward Perryville did Kirby Smith's army march on the 10th, when you saw them pass through Harrodsburg?

I do not know.

Question. When that army came back did it take the same road that Bragg's army had taken toward Camp Dick Robinson?

From the best information I could get it did.

Question. You say Kirby Smith's forces, coming from toward Lawrenceburg and passing through Harrodsburg down toward Perryville on the 10th, got through or ceased going through about half past six o'clock in the evening?

Yes, sir; that is correct.

Question. How long was Bragg's army going through Harrodsburg toward Camp Dick Robinson?

I do not know.

Question. They had got through, however, before Kirby Smith began moving down toward Perryville?

No, sir.

Question. Did the two forces pass each other at Harrodsburg?

There was Kirby Smith going down and some others coming up; they were mixed up. I cannot exactly explain how it was.

Question. When you say you saw the last of them leaving for Camp Dick Robinson what troops were they going through last?

It was a cavalry force that left last; what troops they were I do not know.

Question. How was Kirby Smith's force marching, rapidly or quietly, through Harrodsburg, when they moved off toward Perryville?

They were moving at what I should call medium pace; they were not in a particular hurry and not very slow. They were marching along all day.

Question. Where did you understand they were going to fight our forces?

After they had all passed through Harrodsburg I understood they were going to make a stand at Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. When did you first learn that they were going to make that stand at Camp Dick Robinson?

I do not know whether it was the 9th or 10th, but I think it must have been the 10th. There was a supposition that there might possibly be a battle at Harrodsburg or around there. The citizens were fearful of it.

MR. TANCRED R. WILSON (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and place of residence.

Tancred R. Wilson; Memphis, Tenn.

Question. Do you know Brigadier-General Schoepf, a member of this Commission?

Yes, sir; I know General Schoepf when I see him.

Question. Were you present at a conversation between General Schoepf and Colonel Mundy in Louisville in the month of October last?

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question. It has nothing whatever to do with the matters we are called upon to investigate, as far as I can see.

General BUELL. I should like to inquire of the Commission whether I am required to explain the object of the question I have put to the witness.

THE PRESIDENT. As far as the rule referred to is concerned you are not. The objection of the judge-advocate, as I understand it, is that the question has nothing to do with the investigation. I should like to hear further from General Buell on that point. I do not think the nature of the conversation to which the general wishes the witness to testify has been sufficiently developed to enable us to judge whether it has anything to do with the investigation or not.

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It is impossible, Mr. President, to proceed with this investigation unless we confine our examination to evidence that properly comes within the line of investigation we have to pursue. The question in this instance is clearly outside the matter we are called upon to investigate, and the party asking the question should explain the object of the question before the case goes on.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should not be sustained.

Yes, sir; I was present at a conversation between General Schoepf and Colonel Mundy.

Question. Relate that conversation, as nearly as you can, and particularly state what remarks you heard General Schoepf make in reference to General Buell.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President, on the same ground I did to the other.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should not be sustained.

I heard General Schoepf speak of the battle of Perryville. He said it was a very badly managed affair, and that he had sent several messages to General Buell asking him to allow him to re-enforce General McCook and General Rousseau. He spoke also of a difficulty between himself and General Buell in Tennessee, in which he defied General Buell, and I believe, if I remember aright, threatened him with personal violence. The whole tenor of his conversation at that time was in reference to General Buell, and in speaking of him he said he intended writing letters to Washington City to his friends there to let them know how matters were going on. He also stated that there were more brains in the Confederate Army than there were in the Federal Army. These are the only particulars of the conversation that I remember distinctly; these I do remember distinctly.

Question. What was the spirit manifested by the words and tone of this conversation of General Schoepf in reference to General Buell; was it friendly, or indifferent, or otherwise?

I thought he spoke very bitterly of General Buell. The whole tenor of his conversation was of that character.

Question. Do you remember whether he stated any other cause of difference between General Buell and himself?

No, sir; I do not think he did.

Question. Can you state about the date of this conversation?

It was either the first or second Sunday after the battle of Perryville.

Adjourned to meet March 10, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, March 10, 1863.

(IN CLOSED SESSION.)

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate.

General TYLER. Mr. President, before the record of yesterday's proceedings is approved I wish to submit, as follows:

That the act of the Commission yesterday in going into the trial of one of its members is so extraordinary that I feel myself obliged not only to object but to protest against this procedure, and I respectfully ask that this protest may be put upon your record to vindicate myself from any participation in such an uncalled-for course of investigation. It is immaterial to me whether the member whose conduct is attacked is willing or unwilling to have his conduct previous to the ordering of the Commission inquired into; but one thing is clear to my mind, that however willing he may be to meet personal accusations this is not the time nor is this the tribunal for such an investigation; and I enter my solemn protest against proceeding to investigate any matter not distinctly enumerated and ordered in the instructions of the Secretary of War dated November 4, 1862. And I now move, before the record of yesterday shall be approved, that the testimony of Tancred R. Wilson be struck from the record and that General Buell be notified of the fact, and that in future no witness shall be examined touching the conduct of any member of the Commission antecedent to the 27th day of November, the date on which this Commission convened.

General DANA. I would like to know if this resolution is in order before the minutes of yesterday's proceedings are read. I move that the usual order of business be proceeded with.

General TYLER. I move that we consider this resolution before the record of yesterday be read. The records of yesterday are not the records of the court till they are approved.

General DANA. I enter my objection to transacting this kind of business until the usual order of business is proceeded with. As to the difference between minutes and records, it is merely technical, to say the least. The record was as complete when we adjourned last night, as perfect as it can be made, with the exception of any clerical errors which may have been made by the clerk in taking the evidence of the witnesses. We have the right to correct the record in any clerical error, but there is no reason for departing from the regular order of business. The fact of interfering with the regular order of business cannot make the record any more complete than it is; neither would it be proper or right, nor can it be entertained, to expunge any portion of the record of this court for the purpose of its concealment from any one.

The PRESIDENT. The question is whether the resolution of General Tyler should be entertained in advance of reading the record.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not see clearly the strength of the point urged by General Tyler in introducing his resolution before the minutes of yesterday's proceedings are read. After the reading of those minutes, before they are confirmed, any member may propose any correction or any alteration he may see fit to make, but until they are read we have no right to proceed with the consideration of any resolution. The proper way would be to read the minutes and the record, and before they are confirmed offer any protest or resolution that any member may see fit. As to our right to correct an error, on that I would like to be heard.

General DANA. I wish emphatically to deny the right of any one of this Commission to try any one of its members. I wish also to deny that any one of its members has been tried or that any attempt has been made to try him. I wish further to deny the right and the power of this Commission to alter its record or to expunge any portion of it. I wish also to state that in my belief no member of this Commission has been attacked in his character, nor has he been put upon his trial, nor has any attempt been made to introduce evidence militating against his character; and that the introduction of evidence before this court attempting to show that any member has expressed opinions prior to the organization of this court which he had an undoubted right to express, and which do not in any way militate against his character, is proper evidence to introduce. As to the evidence introduced yesterday, each member has his own opinion of it and as to its weight. I do not think it is important to go into that discussion; but the attempt to represent that a member of this court has been put upon his trial or his character impugned I consider a mistaken one.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The question as to altering or obliterating or changing in any way any part of our record admits of no discussion. We clearly have the right. But the question that presents itself is, when any matter appears upon our record that is foreign to our inquiry, that has nothing whatever to do with our investigation, whether it got upon our record by error or by design and forms part of that record, have we the right to correct it? I hold that where any matter foreign to the issue, having no bearing whatever upon the points we are called to investigate, has been introduced upon the record, we have a right to wipe it off. This is a well-established rule. Now, so far as the fact is concerned, if the introduction of this witness yesterday, with the statements he made, in connection with the statements of like witnesses who may be brought forward—if that is not putting a member of this Commission on trial, if it is not thereby intended to impeach the impartiality of a member of this court, I should like to know what it is. It certainly has no other object that I can see. If it is not a trial, what is it worth? But I hold that no honorable man or officer would consent to sit upon the court were his mind so influenced that he could not judge impartially. And I have not the authority to send for witnesses to show that this man is a low gambler and cannot be believed under oath. I could not do it if the Commission so ordered. What is the effect of this? It places a member of this court under an imputation that an honorable and sensitive man would not submit to without the chance of a fair trial.

I would ask why was not this fact, occurring prior to the organization of the court and known to General Buell, presented to General Halleck or Secretary Stanton? Why was it preserved till we are nearly through with our labors and have collected a vast quantity of evidence, when it is too late to remedy the difficulty by a reorganization if it should prove to be true? It is improperly brought in here, it forms no part of our investigation and cannot make any part of our record, and the best thing we can do is to expunge it.

I came to this Commission this morning intending to object to the further introduction of testimony of this sort and to make my argument upon it in the presence of General Buell; then he might reply to it. In the shape it has now assumed, however, I am unwilling that my objections should go to General Buell. There are other reasons that might be urged against the introduction of testimony of this sort as not only improper but illegal.

General SCHOEPPF. I vote against sustaining the resolution from a feeling of delicacy, as I do not wish to appear as shrinking from an investigation. I never saw this man Wilson that I know of nor do I believe that I ever saw him, as at the time he says he heard this conversation I was confined to my room by ill health.

General TYLER. It is an extraordinary proceeding on the part of General Buell to bring this gentleman in to back up the testimony of a witness who has not yet testified before the Commission, although Colonel Mundy has been here in attendance over a month. General Buell introduces this witness just before closing our proceedings, and by him undertakes to kill the Commission by an attack upon one of its members. I do think it is rather too late to bring up from Memphis this unknown gentleman to back up Colonel Mundy's testimony that is not yet before the court; and after getting from the witness the language said to have been used, General Buell then wanted, by another question, to get the animus of the language used by General Schoepf.

General SCHOEPPF. In regard to the witness' statement that I expressed an intention to use violence against General Buell, it may be that he heard something of the affair in Tennessee, when on one occasion General Buell visited the camp, when General Fry rushed out of his tent, seized General Buell's bridle, and took out his pistol to shoot him, thinking he was a rebel, and the next day General Fry told General Buell that if he came in again in that way he would dismount him. He may have heard of that, and that perhaps may be the origin of Mr. Wilson's testimony.

General ORD. The judge-advocate has alluded to his desire to express his opposition to this testimony in the presence of General Buell, and one of the members of the Commission has expressed not only disapprobation but some reflections upon the propriety of the course pursued by the defense. As we are now discussing the evidence adduced by the defense as to the propriety of admitting that evidence, it seems to me we would be doing nothing but what was right if we were to ask General Buell to be present, that he might express his views and the reasons which influenced him to this course; that he might argue the case which has been argued at length by the judge-advocate in opposition to the defense. Would it not be right and proper to ask General Buell to be present, to have the judge-advocate's remarks read over to him, and ask him if he has any counter-arguments to make.

General SCHOEPP. There is time for the defense to make all the argument he desires.

General ORD. The defense is attacked; one of his witnesses is attempted to be thrown out. The Commission did not introduce this witness, but the defense, and the defense, I presume, considered this testimony proper or it would not have been introduced. Remarks have been made in opposition to the course pursued, and therefore I think the defense ought to be heard, and therefore move that General Buell be invited to have the proceedings of this morning read to him.

General SCHOEPP. The motion is to strike out the testimony of Mr. Wilson.

General ORD. As there has been a long argument made against the defense, I think it would be but justice to General Buell to ask him to be present, and I therefore repeat, I move that General Buell be invited to attend.

General DANA. I hope that General Buell will not be brought in to carry on a discussion of this sort. A great deal too much importance is attached and the minds of members of this court are influenced to feel that this is a more important matter than it really is. If it is necessary to advise General Buell of the proceedings of this morning for the purpose of having a reply from him, I think the best way would be to give him a copy of the proceedings and let him reply in writing—that is, if it is considered necessary. I do not see that it is necessary. If, however, such a course is deemed necessary I hope this method will be taken: that a copy of the proceedings will be given to him, that he make out a protest or argument in writing, and that the court adjourn for the purpose of considering it. I dislike to see an unimportant matter of this kind pressed in the way it is, and particularly have it rendered still more objectionable by asking General Buell to take part in the proceedings.

General ORD's motion, being put to vote, was lost.

General Dana's motion, being put to vote, was lost.

General SCHOEPP. The question is now on General Tyler's motion; and as I am personally interested in this matter, and am ready to answer before the Commission if it thinks itself competent to make an investigation, or to answer to any tribunal that may be ordered for the purpose, under the circumstances, and with perfect respect for the Commission, I request to be excused from voting upon that motion.

The PRESIDENT. Upon this question I shall vote against its being expunged from the record, and for the reason that if it is now expunged a correct and true history of our proceedings would show that such and such testimony was given and after having been given was stricken from our record, and I consider that it would have a worse effect to strike it from the record, leaving the world to form its own judgment and opinion and suspicion as to the nature of the testimony, its purport, and how far it went, than to have it remain upon the record,

The motion of General Tyler was then voted upon and lost.

General ORD. In voting as I have done in the matter that has just been before us, I take the view that as General Buell was not asked if he objected to any member of this Commission, the right of challenge not having been given him at the organization of the Commission and not at any time indeed, the only means he had of challenging a member of the Commission—a right given in all cases of trial by jury—was to challenge that member at some stage of the proceedings. I look upon the introduction of this evidence in the light of a challenge, and in referring to the authority upon the subject I find it stated that there is good ground for a court-martial to allow a challenge, though not supported by any proof, which does not exist in a like procedure in the courts of common law.

General TYLER. I do not know that it is necessary to have this upon the record. There is no business before the court.

General ORD. There is a motion to be offered.

The PRESIDENT. There being nothing before the court, those remarks are not, in my opinion, in order.

General ORD. I have been interrupted two or three times in this matter, but I must beg to be allowed to say that I consider it a matter of privilege, where a resolution has been offered by a member of the Commission, if a member ask to explain the reasons for his vote, and I therefore ask to be allowed to explain my reasons.

General TYLER. I object to it.

General Schoepf presented an application to be allowed to withdraw from the Commission, which was read.

General DANA. I suggest that, in that it charges a portion of the Commission with introducing evidence that impeaches his impartiality, it is hardly fairly drawn up. It certainly appears to me that no member of this Commission has attempted to introduce any testimony against any other member.

General ORD. I would suggest that General Schoepf make a change in the wording of his application. My vote was very much influenced by his own.

The PRESIDENT. I see two objections to this application of General Schoepf. The first is that it would necessarily have to be referred to the Secretary of War. General Schoepf is here by the order of General Halleck. It is therefore impossible for this Commission or for myself as president of this Commission to relieve General Schoepf from his present duty; that can only be done by General Halleck or the Secretary of War. The second objection is that it only proposes to suspend the proceedings of this Commission until the general can make his defense before the proper authorities; that would necessarily suspend the proceedings of this Commission for a considerable time, and thereby occasion delay, which I do not think would be advisable.

General SCHOEPF. I would ask, then, that my application to be relieved from this Commission be forwarded to General Halleck, while at the same time I deny most positively the truth of the testimony given by this man.

General DANA. As far as I am concerned, I would say that I voted in favor of introducing this testimony. At the same time I regret exceedingly that General Schoepf should take the view of it which he appears to take, and feel that a member, in voting, as in my opinion he is bound to do, according to his own best judgment, has entertained any other than the most cordial regard for him; and I furthermore wish to state that nothing has yet been introduced in testimony before this Commission which makes it necessary for that member to withdraw or which places him on the defensive. He has been reported as engaging in a conversation which he had an undoubted right to engage in, and which does not incapacitate him as a member of this Commission:

General SCHOEPF. General Ord said that he voted for the admission of that evidence because I did so. Now, as I have said before, my vote was influenced by a feeling of delicacy in not wishing to appear to shrink from an investigation; but this affords no excuse for any other member of the Commission to vote as I did.

General ORD. General Dana's opinion is perfectly correct. An opinion previously formed or expressed does not disqualify a member from sitting on a court-martial or court of inquiry, though it might disqualify him as a juror. The law in reference to courts-martial specifies that we shall go into an inquiry of the ground where a party is challenged, but shall not admit or reject a member on account of slight reasons; and it was because members of military courts are frequently challenged and for such reasons that I looked upon this as a challenge offered on the part of the defense, an opportunity to challenge not having been offered earlier. I consider, too, that this is to some extent a trial of General Buell. The judge-advocate said he was sent here to examine into the offenses of General Buell, and adduced proofs which he thought would convict him of certain offenses; and the president said that he looked upon it as similar in its proceedings to a court of inquiry. It has about taken the form of a trial. Witnesses have been examined by the judge-advocate as for the prosecution; notice has been given that the prosecution was closed; witnesses have been called for the defense; and the rules by which we have been governed—when we have been governed by rules—were those of courts-martial. In all such tribunals the prisoner, the party before the tribunal, though he may not be on trial—it may only be an examination into the propriety of indicting him for offenses—has the right to challenge any member of the court in some form or other; and I presume this was the form taken by the defense in the present case, and I shall act in this case precisely as if I had been challenged. I have been on courts-martial where I have been challenged, and where the objection has been sustained I have left the court; but I did not think it was wrong or that it in any way affected my character as a gentleman. I may say that for some reasons I should have been very glad if I had been objected to in this case and had been allowed to retire. My vote in regard to this matter seems to have been entirely misunderstood. We have not refused an investigation to the member who states that his impartiality has been impeached; he has not asked for any.

The PRESIDENT. The general has misunderstood me. He has on previous occasions referred to my calling this investigation a court-martial or a court of inquiry, and I have as frequently called his attention to the fact that all through these proceedings I have held that it was not a court-martial nor a court of inquiry but of investigation—a board of officers appointed to investigate certain operations of the Army of the Ohio in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaigns.

General ORD. If there are no objections I suggest that we telegraph to General Halleck for instructions, and that we adjourn till the result of the dispatch be learned.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. In connection with the course pursued by General Schoepf, I will say that he advised with me in reference to his position before the Commission, and I told him what I firmly believe, that under the instructions given us by the Secretary of War General

Buell does not occupy the position of a defendant. There were no charges or specifications filed, and therefore he had no right to challenge any member of the court. If he had the right to challenge, and he was dissatisfied with any member of the court or all of them, he should have exercised the right then; this he failed to do, even supposing he had the right. The introduction of this testimony, therefore, was foreign to the issue, foreign to the subject-matter we are called upon to investigate, and I claim that General Buell had no power to introduce it for the purpose of challenging any member of this court; but having gone upon the record, the only power General Schoepf could appeal to to set him right was the President. What action the Commission will take upon his application to be relieved it is for the Commission to decide.

General ORD. I move that the application of General Schoepf to be permitted to withdraw be forwarded by the president of this Commission to General Halleck, and that in the mean time the Commission adjourn till an answer be received.

The motion was put and lost.

General TYLER. I move that General Schoepf's application asking permission to withdraw, together with such parts of the records of the Commission as the president and judge-advocate may see fit, for the past two days, be forwarded to General Halleck and instructions requested, and that this Commission adjourn from day to day until an answer be received.

General DANA. I offer the following in place of General Tyler's motion:

"That a full copy of the proceedings of the Commission, including General Schoepf's application, both in open and closed session, since the introduction of the last witness, be brought into court, and that after it has been read and approved it be turned over to the president to be forwarded to General Halleck, who ordered the Commission, in order that we may be instructed as to further proceedings in the case."

The motion was then put and lost.

General Tyler's motion was then put and carried.

The Commission then adjourned to meet at the call of the president.

CINCINNATI, March 20, 1863.

(IN CLOSED SESSION.)

The Commission met pursuant to a call of the president. Present, General Wallace, president; General Tyler, General Dana; also the judge-advocate.

The following communication from General Buell was received and read:

CINCINNATI, March 10, 1863.

To the Commission:

I desire the attendance of two witnesses not heretofore named, and in accordance with the rule established yesterday by the Commission I submit this statement of the object of their testimony:

The judge-advocate has attempted to show that my army was dissatisfied with its commander and had from that cause become demoralized. It is proper that I should trace the extent of that dissatisfaction and if possible explain its cause in each individual case.

Brigadier-General Schoepf was an officer under my command, and the witnesses for the prosecution have disclosed the fact that he was one of those who gave expression to his dissatisfaction, going to the extent of impugning my loyalty. I propose by the testimony of these witnesses and by other evidence that I shall introduce to trace the dissatisfaction in this instance to that discontent and personal animosity which are the inevitable consequence of command and are to be found in every army.

I shall show that in connection with these hostile manifestations this officer complained or asserted that I had not given him the command to which his rank entitled him, and had besides treated him with indignity; that while under my command he more than once avowed himself my enemy; that he more than once declared that I was a traitor, and expressed his determination to exert himself to effect my removal from the command of the army. I shall show that this inimical feeling evinced itself to a greater or less extent as early as a year ago this last winter, when he was in the habit of speaking disrespectfully of me in the presence of his subordinate officers and perhaps of soldiers.

The evidence in this light bears directly and materially on the question introduced by the judge-advocate as to the dissatisfaction and demoralization in my army; but it also has another bearing on which I should claim its admission, and that is as to the competency of this officer to sit in judgment on my official acts. In this connection I shall show also that his acquaintances have spoken to him on this point, and that he has excused himself by saying in effect that he had expressed his unwillingness to serve on the Commission, but could not avoid it. This is a fact which I deem it due to the War Department that it should be advised of.

It has already been claimed by the judge-advocate that the objection on account of prejudice should have been made before the Commission commenced its business. Undoubtedly that is true if I had known the prejudice to exist, but I hold the objection to be valid and admissible at any time when the fact becomes evident that the judgment of a member is so warped by prejudice that justice is not to be expected. That I think has been apparent in this case.

The facts with reference to Brigadier-General Schoepf are new to me. Had I been aware of them while in command I think I should have known what course my duty required me to pursue with reference to them. I do not propose, however, to insist that this officer shall vacate his seat or that the proceedings of the Commission shall be staid. I content myself with laying the facts before the Government.

The question as to the demoralization of my army is in my opinion an important one, and the investigation of it may be of the highest importance to the public good in explaining the influences which tend constantly to such a result in our armies.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There is, I understand to be, a law authorizing courts-martial, military commissions, and bodies of this character to take the depositions of witnesses instead of calling them into the presence of the court, for the purpose of facilitating business, and not taking them away from the army, as has been done. I have not seen that law, but I gather from what Judge Holt told me in Washington that he has it in his power to order the deposition of a witness to be taken instead of forcing him to appear in court or before a commission.

All the testimony in the shape of rebutting evidence that I have to take I propose to take in that way, and I gather from what Judge Holt told me that the Commission, if it see fit, can call upon General Buell to do the same thing with his. The Commission will see the advantage arising from the adoption of such a course. By taking depositions or affidavits we can take the testimony of twenty or thirty witnesses while we would be examining perhaps one before the Commission, and instead of lengthening out this investigation we have it in our power to abbreviate our labors very much as far as time is concerned.

The PRESIDENT. I am not willing to act upon a law which I have not seen, although I am satisfied that so just a man as Judge Holt would never draught a law which proposed to do a willful and deliberate injury to a party accused by authorizing the taking of the deposition of a witness for rebutting purposes. Suppose the witness is in Kentucky or Nashville, how can General Buell go down there to examine a witness?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Have the interrogatories sent to him.

The PRESIDENT. The deposition would of course have to be taken by some person legally authorized to take it; for instance, a judge-advocate there or some one appointed for that purpose.

The following communications from General Buell were read:

CINCINNATI, March 18, 1863.To the Commission :

I desire that Mr. James Collier, of Nashville, Tenn., may be summoned before the Commission as a witness. I expect to prove by this witness that Brigadier-General Schoepf said in Louisville, soon after the battle of Perryville, that I was a traitor and had sold out my army; that he had begged me with tears to permit him to re-enforce Major-General McCook in the battle of the 8th, and that I had refused him, or words to that effect.

What I have already stated in a previous communication to the Commission in regard to the testimony of other witness whose presence I have requested will explain the object of the testimony of this witness also. It is first to throw light on the subject introduced by the judge-advocate of the alleged dissatisfaction in my army, and second to show the frame of mind which, so far as Brigadier-General Schoepf is concerned, was to shape this investigation and pronounce judgment on my official acts.

I desire also that J. M. Lawrence and David Hawkins, of Lexington, Ky., may be summoned to appear as witnesses. I expect by their testimony to multiply the evidence I have already introduced as to the strength of Kirby Smith's forces while they were in Central Kentucky. I desire also the attendance of Mr. Cosby, from the Fair Ground, Danville, Ky., by whom I expect to show that the retreat of the rebel army by way of Crab Orchard and Cumberland Gap was of sudden determination and contrary to the plans of its commander.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

BURNET HOUSE, March 19, 1863.

Lieut. Col. DONN PIATT,
Judge-Advocate, &c. :

SIR: On the 10th instant, in accordance with a rule recently established by the Commission requiring a statement of the object of calling other witnesses whom I might desire, I gave in a communication to the Commission my reasons for calling two more witnesses. They are Brig. Gen. Speed S. Fry and Surgeon Strew. I request that they may be summoned. They are somewhere in Kentucky, and the general in command at Louisville will probably know where they are to be found.

You have the names of the following witnesses who have not yet appeared, besides those named to you yesterday; you will, of course, take steps to have them here whenever the Commission is ready to resume business: W. S. Downey, Lexington, Ky.; Richard S. Anderson (not Richard C. Anderson, who was summoned and is a different person), Lexington, Ky.; — Yates, Lexington, Ky.; W. G. Bruce, Lexington, Ky. Lieutenant-Colonel Darr is at Glendale, near this city. You are aware that Captain Bingham and other witnesses from Nashville have not appeared.

Out of regard for General Lytle's anxiety to return to the army I am disposed to take his evidence by affidavit.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

General TYLER. I move that the judge-advocate be directed not to call Mr. Collier, on the ground that we do not require more evidence as to the words said to have been spoken by General Schoepf.

The motion being put to vote, it was unanimously carried.

General DANA. I move that in reply to the communications of General Buell of the 18th and 19th instant the judge-advocate be directed to reply as follows:

That the Commission declines to call James Collier, for the reason that General Schoepf has been relieved from duty on this court; it also declines to call J. M. Lawrence and David Hawkins, for the reason that the Commission is satisfied by the evidence of witnesses already examined as to the strength of Kirby Smith's forces and does not intend to controvert it. The Commission also declines to call Mr. Cosby, for the reason that it will admit that he will testify to the fact as stated by General Buell and will consider it as sworn to by him. It also declines to call General Fry and Surgeon Strew, for the reason that the points on which their evidence is required are not stated.

Carried unanimously.

The judge-advocate introduced a deposition from General Lytle, which was read and received.*

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Buell has propounded three questions to General Lytle, but I find nothing in the affidavit that requires a cross-examination.

Commission adjourned to meet March 21, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, March 21, 1863.

(IN CLOSED SESSION.)

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, General Wallace, president; General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

General TYLER. I object to receiving the deposition of General Lytle, read yesterday, on the ground that it has no place on our record. I move that the questions and answers be struck from our record, and that General Buell be notified that this Commission will not inquire into any matter outside of the investigation ordered by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission has the right to strike out matters that it considers out of place on its record, everything that is irrelevant to the business for which this Commission was organized.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If when a deposition comes before the Commission I make an objection to any portion of it General Buell has a right to be heard. When a deposition is received by the Commission the court has the right to strike out any portion and retain just what it considers pertinent to the issue before the court. Nothing has been done with these questions that prevents that course being taken by the court.

General DANA. That testimony was received yesterday, and to strike it out now is not in the power of the court to do.

General Tyler's motion was submitted to vote and lost.

The judge-advocate then read the following communication from General Buell:

BURNET HOUSE, March 20, 1863.

To the Commission:

I did not have access to the Commission at its session to-day, but the judge-advocate informs me that it was determined not to call certain witnesses, because Brigadier-General Schoepf, to whose conduct they were expected to testify, had been relieved from the Commission, and that no testimony would be taken with reference to the conduct of that officer. In the communication which I submitted on the 10th instant I meant to explain the double bearing of such evidence; that is, it was to go first to the allegation of demoralization or dissatisfaction in my army, and second to the competency of Brigadier-General Schoepf to sit as an impartial judge of my acts. The removal of the latter question by relieving that officer from the Commission does not affect the former, which is one of the questions introduced by the judge-advocate.

I meant to be understood as not intending to notice the general statement of any witness that the army was dissatisfied with its commander, for that would virtually amount to putting the question to popular vote; I shall only answer specific statements of facts on that subject. To this end I propose to show that the demoralization was in the witnesses themselves who made the general assertion, and that it was in fact merely the dissatisfaction which results in every army from the exercise of command. Brigadier-General Schoepf was one of those who are shown to have expressed dissatisfaction. I desire to show that in this case personal irritation and disappointment were the real cause of dissatisfaction. I desire to show how that irritation manifested itself and how it must have affected the discipline of the portion of the army to which this officer belonged, and from which the evidence on this subject has mainly been drawn. The judge-advocate informs me also that, contrary to my understanding, the rule of the court requiring a statement of what I propose to prove applies to witnesses that have been summoned as well as those whom I wish summoned, unless they are actually in attendance; and I am requested to give that explanation with reference to Messrs. Downey, Anderson, Yates, and Bruce. The evidence of the former will have reference to Brigadier-General Schoepf's expressions concerning me, and of the three latter to the strength of the rebel forces in Kentucky.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

General DANA. I move to reconsider the vote of yesterday in reference to calling the witness mentioned by General Buell.

The motion, being put, was lost.

(IN OPEN SESSION.)

General Buell, having been notified that the Commission was ready to proceed with the taking of testimony, entered the court-room.

Lieut. Col. FRANCIS DARR (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Please to state your name and position in the United States service.

Francis Darr; lieutenant-colonel and commissary of subsistence of the United States Volunteers.

Question. State whether you were on duty with the Army of the Ohio during the past year; between what dates and in what capacity.

I was on duty in the Army of the Ohio, on General Buell's staff, as chief commissary in the field, from about the middle of January, 1862, until October 30, 1862, when General Buell was relieved. I was relieved at the same time.

Question. State, as circumstantially as you can, what measures were adopted for subsisting the army from the time it commenced its movement from the vicinity of Corinth to North Alabama until its arrival in North Alabama.

When the forces of General Buell commenced their movement from Corinth eastward I was stationed at Buell's Landing, on the Tennessee River, 2 miles above Pittsburg Landing, supplying his forces from that point. When the said movement was commenced I was ordered to move the supplies to Eastport, Miss., about 30 miles above Pittsburg Landing, from which point to a line of march from Corinth eastward to a place called Iuka it was only 8 miles, giving a first-rate road to supply General Buell's troops and saving about 20 miles of land transportation. As fast as the troops reached Iuka on their march eastward from Corinth they drew their supplies from Eastport sufficient to last them until they reached Tuscumbia, to which point from Eastport I was ordered to supply the forces by the river. For this purpose I secured the lightest draught boats, and had considerable difficulty in doing so, as the navigation between Eastport, Miss., and Tuscumbia, Ala., was dangerous and difficult on account of the low water on Colbert's Shoals, a few miles above Eastport.

It was at first considered impossible to so supply the troops on account of Colbert's Shoals. By General Buell's orders all the river pilots acquainted with those waters and living in the surrounding country were seized one night at midnight, and kept under close guard to run our steamers, because Union pilots then in the employ of the general were unwilling to undertake running boats to Tuscumbia. So difficult was the navigation that I went up on the first boat myself from Eastport to Tuscumbia. We stuck for half a day on the Shoals, and no boat went up the river without sticking there and having considerable trouble. Every boat had to be sent up by force, and threats were made against the captain and the crew. I mention this to show the difficulty of the navigation and the delay and the time consumed in supplying the troops. Boats drawing only 16 inches of water were only able to take about 30 or 40 tons to the trip. Besides commissary stores these boats were obliged to take forage and quartermaster's supplies, as the country through which the troops were marching was totally stripped of its resources by the enemy.

During my efforts to supply the troops at Tuscumbia we seriously damaged three of our steamers and were obliged for months to leave one of them above the Shoals. After the last of our troops had reached Tuscumbia and were provided with about ten days' rations of the essentials only—bread and meat, coffee and sugar—they were moved on without delay. I was then ordered to take all the available transportation of the army, fill the wagons with the essentials of subsistence—by that I mean bread and meat, coffee and sugar—to cross the river at Eastport with them, and proceed to Florence, on the north side of the Tennessee River, in Alabama. Taking about ten days' supplies of bread and meat, coffee and sugar, for the army, I left Eastport, Miss., crossing the Tennessee at that point on or about the 24th of June, 1862, and reached Florence, a distance of about 22 miles, the next day, where I found the columns in motion and crossing the river from Tuscumbia on its march to Huntsville, Northern Alabama.

My efforts to supply the troops from Eastport to Tuscumbia by river were unceasing, running the steamers day and night, and with all my efforts the column moved from Tuscumbia with altogether in the hands of regiments and in the supply trains about fifteen days' rations, and that only of the essentials of bread and meat, coffee and sugar. We expected, on our arrival at Athens, Ala., and Huntsville to find abundant supplies for our army, as orders had been issued to parties in Nashville to have supplies ready for us at least three or four weeks before we moved from Corinth. On arriving at Athens, Ala., to which place I rode ahead of the column, I discovered that no provisions whatever had been accumulated and that no forage either had been gathered. Upon inquiring the cause thereof, as it was a matter of great importance, I found that the railroad, sometimes called the Central Tennessee and Alabama Railroad, but generally called the Decatur and Nashville road, was so badly broken by the rebel raids and bridges burned that it was impossible to move more than feed day by day the troops then under charge of General Mitchel, who was occupying Northern Alabama at Huntsville and the lines between that and Nashville. Inquiring as to the resources of the country from the inhabitants of the region through which we had passed and around Athens, I discovered that the country was entirely bare of resources along and near our lines of march, both of forage and subsistence, and that on account of the large bodies of guerrillas infesting the country it was dangerous to send out trains for foraging purposes without a larger guard than General Mitchel was able to afford. I came back to camp near Athens and reported the condition of supplies and asked for orders to remedy the evil. General Buell ordered me to make myself thoroughly acquainted as far as was in my power with the resources of the country and to make use of them wherever we could reach them. At the same time he told me to ascertain by what time the railroad would be completed from Nashville to Athens, in order to bring us supplies by rail. The break in the railroad was from Reynolds' Station to Elk River, the bridge over the latter stream being destroyed. The distance by railroad was only 24 miles, but on account of the impossibility of crossing by fording or ferrying Elk River, which was very high, and on account of an impassable mountain for loaded trains about midway between Elk River and Pulaski Station, I discovered it was necessary for our trains wagoning provisions around this break to make a detour of 40 miles, which going and coming made a trip of 80 miles. The train forded Elk River at the point called Elton, above the burnt bridge.

At the time that we reached Athens railroad repairing was going on, not only on the Decatur and Nashville road but on the Nashville and Chattanooga. I discovered also at Athens a great deal of irregularity in the use of army wagons and of railroad transportation, under the command of General Mitchel, which I have no doubt retarded the progress of getting supplies, by the uses made by quartermasters of this transportation for the purpose of hauling cotton. Immediately after the arrival of General Buell at Huntsville, which was next day after we reached the vicinity of Athens, an order was issued by General Buell restricting the use of army wagons for the uses of the army only in procuring forage and subsistence, and disallowing the use of railroad transportation when it interfered with the progress of supplies for the army. All the trains were immediately organized for the purpose of foraging, and the country in Northern Alabama as far south as the Tennessee River was scoured for forage and subsistence, and everything that could be gathered without absolutely starving the women and children was taken. Quartermasters were sent to different points along the railroad to receive and take care of the supplies so brought in. The country north of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad was also visited thoroughly by our forage trains. The result of these labors was but a small quantity of old corn, left by the rebels, and only gathered in a few bushels at the time from different plantations. Subsistence of no account was brought or could be found, except a few almost worthless cattle and sheep, and these not enough to justify the hunting for them.

In the mean time every effort was concentrated to complete the repairs on the Decatur and Nashville road first, all the force that could be put upon the different points in the break working day and night. Not only were the Michigan Mechanics and Engineers employed on this work, but every negro that could be secured in the region through which the railroad passed was pressed into the service to expedite the work. When I first visited the burnt bridge on Elk River—this was about the last of June—I was told by the colonel commanding the Engineers that it would take one month of unremitting work to complete the repairs, on account of the impossibility to ferry and ford this river, and on account of the impassable mountains for loaded teams, which I have already alluded to. It was absolutely necessary for the trains around the break to make this detour by way of Elton until the very moment that the railroad was completed. To my certain knowledge every effort that mechanical skill and perseverance could do was used in making the repairs on this road, and it was a month, if not more, before the trains could be run over the road. During this time all the troops of General Buell had occupied their position from Tuscumbia on the left, where General Thomas was left in command, to Battle Creek on the east, near Stevenson. About July 14, discovering that the supplies wagoning around the railroad break did not come fast enough either to supply the army day by day or to accumulate a quantity for any forward movement, I asked of General Buell the propriety of placing the troops on half rations, which was done, not only to accumulate supplies if possible, but to increase their industry in making everything they could out of the resources, if they could be so called, of the country. This was about July 14. From my representations that the railroad would not be completed in time to accumulate any supplies, and that it was absolutely necessary to look to some other line of communication, General Buell sent me to Tuscumbia, Ala., on our extreme left, about the middle of July, I think, to urge General Thomas to bring with him all the provisions he could haul and all the cattle he could drive with his column when he should be ready to march from Tuscumbia eastward to join the rest of our forces. He also ordered me to place myself in communication with Colonel Hawkins, chief commissary of General Halleck at Corinth, and to see if supplies could not be brought by rail from Memphis and by river to Eastport, thence wagoning to Iuka, thence by rail eastward to Decatur, on the Tennessee River, where the railroad bridge was also destroyed, where we expected to boat the stores on flat-boats across the river.

On my arrival at Tuscumbia General Thomas informed me that instead of bringing any supplies he was scarcely able to receive supplies sufficient for his own troops. On telegraphing to Colonel Hawkins, at Corinth, and asking if anything better could be done, he told him that he could hardly supply the troops at Corinth, and that he must not look to him for any supplies. He also telegraphed that General McPherson informed him that he had but two locomotives to be used from Corinth to Tuscumbia, and that these were so heavy that it was pronounced impracticable by the railroad engineers to cross the railroad bridge at Bear River, about 8 or 9 miles east of Iuka, on account of the weakness of the bridge. This was, I think, about the middle of July. At the same time General Thomas informed me that the guerrillas were threatening the line of railroad between Decatur and Tuscumbia and between Tuscumbia and Iuka and Corinth, and the Tennessee River had become so low that the navigation above Pittsburg Landing was only practicable for the very lightest draught boats.

The next day after I had left Tuscumbia on my return to Huntsville the rebels made a successful attack upon a line of railroad at a place called Courtland, captured the forces there guarding it, destroyed the railroad bridges, and effectually closed that line against us. In the mean time the Cumberland River had fallen so low that we were entirely dependent on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad for the arrival of our supplies in Nashville. The raids of the rebels into Kentucky, and cutting the railroad and their successful raid against Murfreesborough on the very day that we had completed the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad to Stevenson, made us entirely dependent for our supplies in Northern Alabama upon the Decatur and Nashville road.

With the opening of the Chattanooga and Nashville road, which, as I have said, was destroyed on the very day it was opened by the capture of Murfreesborough, the troops had been put again upon full rations a few days previously, but with the capture of Murfreesborough we were obliged to fall back again upon half rations. In procuring supplies from Nashville nothing but the essentials—bread and meat, coffee and sugar—were thought of. Every effort was made to obtain as large a supply as possible of these articles; and, as I have said before, the country was thoroughly scoured for supplies, but with very little success. I myself went out on one of these expeditions in order to satisfy myself that every effort had been made to obtain supplies for the troops. I saw with my own eyes and heard the additional testimony of the people that from the time the rebellion had broken out their country had been stripped of everything in the shape of army supplies. At no time was it a country which produced more than grain enough for their own simple wants. I found much suffering for the want of food. The country from Duck River in Tennessee to the Tennessee River in Northern Alabama, and between the Nashville and Decatur Railroad on the west and the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad on the east, consisted mostly of cotton plantations, and had been up to the spring of 1862 planted with scarcely anything else, but in the spring of 1862 the farmers had planted corn. After exhausting all the old corn we could find in the country we had to use green corn, not only for the animals, but it comprised a large portion of the food of the troops. I mention this particularly to account for the scarcity of grain in that part of the country, and that was about the extreme range of the movements of our foraging trains. From Duck River to the Cumberland north the country had been thoroughly foraged by the forces at Nashville and occupying our line of communication.

When General Buell's headquarters were moved from Huntsville to Decherd Station, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, on or about August 20 or 21, the supply of rations in the hands of the troops and at the stations between Nashville and Stevenson, all points south of Nashville—for I include Murfreesborough, Franklin, Decherd Station, Stevenson, Huntsville, Athens, Columbia, and Franklin—was 628 [?] half rations. One week before that movement of General Buell to Decherd Station the following is the report of stores at Nashville: 300,000 rations of salt meat, 700,000 rations of hard bread and flour. Salt meat, as you will see by the figures, was largely inferior to the quantity of breadstuffs. This was owing to the difficulty of procuring fresh meat. The beef contractors of the army having met with heavy losses in the capture of herds of cattle by the guerrillas, I was ordered on our arrival at Huntsville to use every effort to absorb the resources of the country in fresh meat, and for that purpose all the cattle that could be gathered from Southern Kentucky and around Nashville and between Nashville and Huntsville were diligently sought after. In the movement of abandoning our line of communications in Northern Alabama and on the road between Columbia and Decatur all the other stores were carefully gathered up and sent northward, and in no case was anything lost except at Huntsville, where only a small quantity was lost. We succeeded in bringing everything safely forward. We arrived at Decherd Station, I think, on about the 21st or 22d of August, where we established our headquarters. While there I was ordered by General Buell to take four companies of cavalry and to thoroughly scour the north and south bank of Elk River as far as Fayetteville, and to bring in all the cattle that could be found, to ascertain what resources were still left in that region, as that was considered the best part of the country. I was absent five days and returned with 200 head of cattle, which was every hoof that could be gathered up on both banks of the river; but they were in very poor condition, so as hardly to justify the trip. I found in all the farms and plantations but a few bushels of old corn, and that not more than sufficient to feed the families and negroes living on the farms. On the McMinnville Railroad, leading from Tullahoma eastward, a branch of the Chattanooga Railroad, we gathered up a few hundred barrels of flour, a part of which proved afterward to be damaged. All this was brought forward and went toward Nashville with the movement of the army.

On our arrival at Nashville, about September 2, the following was the amount of stores on hand. I forgot to mention that already in July the commissary in Nashville was ordered to take all the supplies in the hands of dealers in Nashville, and all shipments of supplies out of Nashville on private account were stopped. I mention this to account for the enormous quantity of one item—salt—included in the following statement.

On the 1st of September the following was the condition of supplies in Nashville about the time our columns marched into the city: 345,000 rations of salt meats, 200 head of beef cattle, 1,000,000 rations of breadstuffs. The disproportion between breadstuffs and salt meats will account for our efforts to obtain all the fresh beef possible. Of salt Captain Macfeely had seized 5,000 barrels. That was the large item spoken of. I mention that because it might be thought we had taken up unnecessary transportation for the supply of this article, whereas that was taken from private parties. Constant complaint was made by our officers at Nashville of the inadequate means of transportation on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. In order that no time should be lost and that no means should be left unused, Capt. W. Frank Harris, assistant quartermaster of volunteers in our command, and who at one time had been an agent on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and was thoroughly posted in railroad matters, had been sent up to Louisville in the month of July with full powers to run the railroad to its utmost capacity. With all his efforts the railroad was unable to carry more than about 75 tons per day. This of course included not only subsistence but forage and quartermaster's supplies. In the mean time, discovering that subsistence was more requisite than that of forage, because our troops were making free use of the green corn in the fields, all the railroad transportation was applied to bringing subsistence. To provide for our march northward from Nashville in pursuit of Bragg, and at the same time to leave Nashville in as well supplied condition as possible, General Buell had ordered 1,000,000 of rations to Bowling Green, not only by railroad but by way of Green River.

The condition of our troops about September 1, when they reached Nashville on their march northward, was as follows (I have already stated the supplies at Nashville): General Crittenden's division had 20,000 rations of breadstuffs, but not so much of other articles; General McCook's train had forty days' rations complete; the Third Division, formerly commanded by General Mitchel, had 72,000 rations of breadstuffs only; the Fourth Division, formerly commanded by General Nelson, had 50,000 rations; General Wood's division had 36,000 rations of breadstuffs; and as General Thomas' division was over near McMinnville, I had sent him on about the last of August 35,000 rations. Besides these rations mentioned the troops had three days' rations on their persons, enough to allow them to reach Nashville. Besides these supplies mentioned as on hand at Nashville about September 1 and in the wagons of the division trains, I had sent to Nashville, and there were then in the depots there and en route in the cars waiting to be unloaded, 430,000 rations of breadstuffs, but nothing else. This, with the quantity on hand at Nashville, would give 1,100,000 rations of breadstuffs. General Buell ordered me to provide for the troops as far as Bowling Green on half rations, in order that we might leave every available and possible pound of supplies in Nashville, as we expected communication to be cut off in our rear with our forces left there. The troops were so supplied until we reached Bowling Green, and everything else turned over to the depots in Nashville. On our arrival at Bowling Green we were expecting to find the million rations ordered by General Buell beforehand for this emergency. The supplies which were taken with us from Nashville were exhausted.

On investigating the condition of supplies at Bowling Green I discovered that the essential parts of the rations ordered by General Buell were almost totally wanting, on account of the interruptions by the rebels at Munfordville and other places and of the inadequate power of the railroad to transport them in time. I found that no breadstuffs whatever were on hand, with the exception of a few barrels of flour and those not sufficient for the troops garrisoning Bowling Green for over four or five days. The meat rations amounted to only about one-third of the quantity ordered. It was necessary to halt the command and obtain sufficient supplies of meat and breadstuffs. Trains were immediately organized and sent out to gather all the wheat and flour in the surrounding country. Trains went as far as 20 and 25 miles westward in the direction of Russellville. Here we met the same difficulty in obtaining supplies, on account of the previous occupation of Bowling Green by the rebels and of the destitute condition in which they had left the people. I called upon the citizens of Bowling Green and induced them to send messengers throughout the country, promising immediate payment for all the wheat brought to the mills and for all the flour brought to Bowling Green. All the mills that could be put into operation within 18 miles around Bowling Green to the westward were put in operation, and by this means in about four or five days I had gathered about 400,000 rations of flour. Of salt meat I was unable to obtain more than about 10,000 rations. Upon the arrival of our troops at Munfordville the railroad trains from Bowling Green under my care were run to Munfordville day and night, supplying the troops as they passed Munfordville with provisions gathered in the manner I have stated. On the arrival of our troops at West Point, at the mouth of Salt River, on the Ohio River, provisions which had been ordered from Louisville down to West Point met us. One of the divisions, commanded by General Smith, formerly of the division of General Nelson, had been out of provisions for nearly a day where they arrived there. All the supplies that were left at Bowling Green of the quantity gathered in the manner I have stated were intended to be pushed into Nashville at the first favorable opportunity. When I left Bowling Green I so instructed the commissary there. During our march northward, according to my instructions, I used every effort to supply Nashville, even stinting the troops on the march, so that in case communication should be cut off with that city we had left everything possible with them.

We reached Louisville about the latter part of September. The troops on our arrival there were ordered to send in their trains and supply themselves with provisions immediately for ten days, so as to be able to march at an hour's notice. Arrangements were made also to supply the columns marching from Louisville in pursuit of Bragg at the rate of 100,000 rations per day.

The troops left Louisville about the 1st of October, marching in three different columns, by three different roads and routes, intending to concentrate in front of the enemy at or near Danville. The raids of the rebels under Kirby Smith by way of Frankfort, in the rear of the columns of General McCook, seriously impeded the movements of our trains following his columns to supply him, and they were consequently ordered from their route, barely in time to save them from the enemy, by way of Bardstown. It was a difficult matter to supply the troops on this march for these reasons: the Louisville and Nashville Railroad was destroyed; several important bridges burned on the main stem; the Bardstown branch was completely destroyed in every vulnerable point, as also the principal bridges on the Lebanon branch, which made it necessary to depend upon wagons alone from Louisville. Desiring to make use of the railroad as far as was in our power, the construction of the Frankfort Railroad and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and its branches was pushed with the greatest energy. The raid of Kirby Smith in the rear of General McCook's column prevented us from making use of the Frankfort branch, and having taken supplies on the Louisville and Nashville as far as Shepherdsville, we had to abandon that route on account of the almost impracticable road between Shepherdsville and Bardstown, so that the column had to be supplied entirely by wagon trains starting from Louisville on the Bardstown pike.

The rebels having occupied the country in force as far as Bardstown and their pickets having come to within a few miles of Louisville they had stripped the country of forage, so that the trains hauling subsistence were obliged to haul the forage. Water was also very scarce upon the road, and we almost broke down our teams in pushing supplies up to the column at Crab Orchard and to the troops who had gone beyond that point a distance from Louisville of about 120 miles. I think that the total consumption of rations from Northern Alabama, while we were there, and on the march to Nashville was about 75,000 per day. Our effective force, I think, was about 45,000 men; the additional 30,000 rations is about the usual percentage of loss of rations in transportation, sick in hospitals, teamsters, and others. The difficulty in procuring forage, the bad roads beyond Crab Orchard, and the scarcity of water did not enable us to push our wagon trains over about 15 or 20 miles beyond Crab Orchard southward.

On motion, the Commission then adjourned to meet on Monday, March 23, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Monday, March 23, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Lieut. Col. FRANCIS DARR's examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Submit to the Commission, if you please, colonel, any documents you have in confirmation of the particulars stated in your testimony on Saturday in regard to the amount of supplies on hand at the various periods mentioned. You may at the same time submit any of the instructions under which you acted in procuring supplies.

On June 3, a few days after the evacuation of Corinth by the rebels, I was ordered to make Eastport, Miss., the base of supplies for General Buell's command, the supplies to be wagoned thence to Iuka. Complying with this order, the supplies were moved from the neighborhood of Pittsburg Landing to Eastport. On June 9, at 11 p. m., I received orders to commence sending supplies to Tusculum and Florence. Up to the 20th instant I was engaged in so doing, and sent up about 300,000 rations, ten days' supply, at which time we were unable to run any more boats with any freight. From the 20th of June to the 25th instant I was engaged in loading wagons with five days' supply, which made fifteen days' supply from the 20th of June. From the 20th of June the forces were occupied at Jackson's Ford, ferrying across the river. On the 26th of June I fell into the column at Florence with my supply train.

In the neighborhood of Athens, Ala., the divisions of General Nelson and General Wood were obliged to wait for supplies. This was about July 5. About July the 4th or 5th the divisions of General McCook and General Crittenden, having exhausted their supplies with which they started from Tusculum and then being in the neighborhood of Huntsville and on the march toward Stevenson, had to be supplied day by day by railroad trains following their line of march. On July 15 the rebels destroyed at the capture of Murfreesborough 200,000 rations, breaking the railroad there on the day before on which we were to run trains from Nashville to Stevenson. This disaster, coupled with the difficulty already mentioned in my previous testimony by the breaks in the railroad between Athens and Nashville, induced me to apply to General Buell to put the troops on half rations. This was done on the 14th of July. At that time there were hardly any supplies in Nashville, on account of the Morgan raids in Kentucky.

Question. If you have any documents substantiating the statements you are making submit them to the Commission as you go along, that they may appear in the body of your testimony?

On the 14th July, in confirmation of the want of supplies at Nashville, I would submit the following dispatch from Capt. R. Macfeely, commissary of subsistence in the United States Army, and in charge of supplies at Nashville, addressed to Capt. F. Darr, commissary of subsistence, Huntsville:

"NASHVILLE, July 14, 1862.

"No stores sent to Elk River Bridge. I informed you on the 12th instant there were no provisions in this depot; if there had been they could not have been sent to Elk River Bridge (on the Decatur and Nashville road), as the trains have been unable to run through. No provisions received from Louisville in the past week, I presume on account of the troubles on the road.

"R. MACFEELY,
"Commissary of Subsistence."

I submit another dispatch:

"NASHVILLE, July 12, 1862.

(This was the day before the rebels cut the railroad.)

"To Capt. F. DARR:

"I forwarded to Murfreesborough 100,000 rations. None to forward until received from Louisville. Nothing received since 6th instant. Will send stores required at Elk River as soon as received. Who is commissary of subsistence at Elk River? The transportation department at Louisville is responsible for delay in receipt of stores. They are sent forward from here as fast as received. Symonds [he means Capt. H. C. Symonds] has plenty, but cannot get cars.

"R. MACFEELY,
"Commissary of Subsistence."

The indorsements on the back of this dispatch, made by me at the time, state that Captain Nigh, the chief quartermaster of General Buell at the time, reported to J. B. Anderson, military railroad superintendent, the lack of transportation at Louisville. It was to remedy any delay or neglect at Louisville that General Buell at once decided on sending Capt. W. F. Harris, assistant quartermaster, to Louisville.

On July 17 the guerrillas were so bad between Nashville and Huntsville that the sending of the mails was suspended. On July 21, eight days after the capture of Murfreesborough, the rebels destroyed an important railroad bridge at Antioch, 12 miles south of Nashville, on the Chattanooga road, also several small bridges on the Decatur and Nashville road between Reynolds' Station and Columbia, besides attacking and driving in our forage trains. About the same time, July 21 or 22, there were heavy rains; a flood on the Duck River washed away part of the bridge across Duck River at Columbia. These impediments to obtaining supplies from Nashville and the non-arrival of them at Nashville induced General Buell to send me to Tuscumbia to attempt to bring supplies for our army from that direction. On the 23d of July I left Huntsville and reached Tuscumbia the same evening. On the same night I telegraphed to Colonel Hawkins, the commissary of General Halleck at Corinth, the object of the mission I was on, and received from him the same night the following dispatch:

"CORINTH, July 23, 1862.

"To Capt. FRANCIS DARR, Tuscumbia:

"On account of the small means of transportation we are living from hand to mouth. It will be impossible for me to send you any supplies.

"JOHN P. HAWKINS,
"Captain, Commissary of Subsistence."

In my testimony I have called him colonel; this is his present rank.

I left Tuscumbia on the 24th on my return to Huntsville. On the 25th the rebels destroyed the railroad communication between Tuscumbia and Decatur by a successful raid upon Courtland and neighboring stations. On the 24th of July the wants of the troops at and near Murfreesborough were so pressing, railroad communication to Nashville being destroyed, that we were obliged to wagon supplies from Nashville to them. In a letter dated July 26, at Louisville, Captain Symonds, commissary of subsistence, writes that he sends 75,000 rations per diem, and complains of the want of transportation; but he says that he will do his best to throw into Nashville 2,000,000 rations. Applying to him for a statement of the supplies shipped from Louisville to Nashville during the months of June and July I received the following statement: List of provisions shipped to Captain Macfeely at Nashville, Tenn., in the months of June and July, 1862, both by railroad and river, by Capt. H. C. Symonds, commissary of subsistence: 1,705,106 pounds, equal to 2,202,434 rations, salt meat; 2,711,243 pounds, equal to 2,202,434 rations, hard bread; and a proportionate quantity of the other parts of the rations.

On the 28th July the first train of the Chattanooga Railroad ran from Nashville to Stevenson, with 210,000 rations on board. On July 29 the troops were put upon full rations. By July 30 threw into Stevenson 160,000 rations additional. On August 6 a trial train of a few passenger cars was run over the Decatur and Nashville road for the first time from Nashville to Athens; the bridges were pronounced unsafe and the trains suspended. It was not until August 11 that loaded trains could pass safely over the road. On the 10th of August the line between Louisville and Nashville was again cut by the rebels by the capture of Gallatin, Tenn., and the garrison stationed there captured, and railroad communication between Louisville and Nashville again stopped. On August 19 the break of communication in Kentucky induced the order to put the troops again on half rations. In the mean time, by General Buell's orders, the lightest boats were seized at Louisville for the purpose of sending stores up the Cumberland River. This line of communication was also cut on the 20th of August by the rebels capturing Clarksville and seizing the first boat with supplies, which had just arrived there, and destroying the supplies on board. On the same day, I think August 20, General Buell's headquarters were moved to Decherd Station. I have before mentioned in my testimony the care taken to save all the supplies and carry them northward with the army and of the efforts made while at Decherd Station to gather all the supplies which could be found in the neighboring region.

In testimony on Saturday I also gave a statement of the means taken to supply the troops on their march from Nashville, by way of Bowling Green, to Louisville. In addition to that I will state that from the time of our arrival at Athens, about the last of June, until our march northward in pursuit of General Bragg, all the transportation of the army, except that which was absolutely necessary to carry the camp and garrison equipage of the troops, was put into requisition on the railway breaks for the purpose of wagoning supplies, and it was not until we reached Nashville, about the 1st of September, that the troops were able to get their proper transportation returned to them. I state that to show that we used every means in our power to bring forward supplies.

Question. Have you any memoranda which will enable you to give the dates at which the different divisions passed some given point on the march to Corinth? Can you state the date of their arrival at Tusculumbia, and, if you can, the date of their departure from the vicinity of Corinth?

On June 11 the advanced brigade of General Wood's division, commanded by General Hascall, was at Tusculumbia; I found them there. I think they got there the same day or the day before. On June 21, ten days afterward, General Nelson's division was at Iuka. From my being at Eastport I do not know the exact time of the arrival at Tusculumbia of the different divisions, but on the 25th, I think, General McCook's and General Crittenden's divisions had just succeeded in crossing the river at Jackson's Ferry or were in process of doing so. The wagons were taken across on large coal barges decked over, which we had hauled across the Shoals with great trouble.

I cannot exactly give the dates when those barges were taken up to Tusculumbia; I think they were taken up about the 20th. I know that General Thomas' headquarters were at Iuka on the 25th of June, because on that day I had sent him some prisoners.

On July 23, while on my way to Tusculumbia, I met General Schoepf's brigade, of General Thomas' division, on the march for Decatur, where their wagons had to be ferried across the Tennessee River by a very small and fragile scow. They were several days in crossing. I think that the other two brigades of General Thomas' division crossed the river at Florence, commencing to do so on or about the 25th or 26th of July. The progress of this division marching eastward I have no other data to judge by except the murder of General Robert L. McCook, who was killed a few miles east of Athens, Ala., on August 5. I think that General Thomas himself was but a day or so in advance of him and had his headquarters at Decherd Station, from which place on August 6 he telegraphed to General Buell the report of the murder of General McCook on the day before. The brigade of General Robert L. McCook must have passed through Athens on or about the 4th of August.

Question. Do you know anything of the troops being employed in repairing the railroad from Corinth to Decatur during the movement in that direction? If so, state what you know about it.

I think that on about June the 10th or 11th the Michigan Mechanics and Engineers were put to work on the burnt railroad bridge across Bear River, a few miles east of Iuka. The fact is fresh in my mind on account of the murder of two of the Engineers by the guerrillas while at work there.

On my visit to Tuscumbia on June 11 I rode with General Hascall to examine the railroad bridge across Tuscumbia Creek a few miles west of Tuscumbia, and which was completely destroyed. Another bridge a few miles west of that was reported to me as also destroyed. With a view to putting the railway in order between Tuscumbia and Decatur, ahead of the construction of the bridges between Tuscumbia and Iuka, a locomotive and some freight cars had been ordered by way of the Tennessee River. I would state that at Tuscumbia all the rolling stock left by the rebels was useless. On the arrival of the locomotive at Pittsburg Landing, about June 15 or 16, I had it towed up to Eastport, transferred it, and towed it over the Shoals to Florence, where it was landed on the south side of the river and taken up the bank. On placing the locomotive on the rails and attempting to use it the engine was discovered to be useless, and after repeated trials to use it by some Michigan Engineers it was given up.

Question. Do you know who provided that locomotive or who is to blame that a locomotive in that condition was furnished?

I have no other reason than a military reason to know who provided it, and it is this: Col. Thomas Swords, assistant quartermaster-general, and in charge of furnishing quartermaster's supplies for General Buell's command, stationed then at Louisville, is, I presume, the party who procured it. I know it was a very old locomotive, having had some experience in railroad matters myself. I think the locomotive bore this mark: "W. and O. R. R." Had the locomotive been in good order and condition it would have assisted us very materially in bringing supplies forward to Decatur, a distance, I think, of 43 miles from Tuscumbia.

General BUELL. I will state, in justice to Colonel Swords, that he is not responsible, as I believe, for the condition of that locomotive or that such a locomotive was forwarded.

Question. Do you know how far the work required to be done on the railroad and the preparation of the ferry was the cause of the delay of the troops along the road and in the vicinity of Tuscumbia until the 25th of June?

I think it was the only cause of the delay, because our troops repaired the railway bridges from Iuka eastward as they advanced.

Question. Can you give the date of the arrival of General Schoepf's brigade at Decatur and the date at which it had completed the passage of the river?

The head of General Schoepf's column reached Decatur on the evening of July 23. He himself with his staff arrived there about 1 or 2 p. m. He commenced crossing his wagons on the next day, and I think it took about three days to transfer his brigade from one side of the river to the other.

Question. Was the transfer of the troops across the river at Florence, with the means which we had prepared there, rapid or otherwise?

It was rather slow, because we had but one steamboat, the Lady Jackson, to carry and to tow the coal barges which were lashed alongside for the purpose of carrying the wagons. The road to the water's edge on the south side of the river came through a narrow defile. The landing on the opposite side (the north side) of the river, on account of the low and swampy nature of the ground, was very muddy. Temporary piers had to be constructed for the purpose of loading and unloading the wagons. The river at that point was very broad.

Question. What was the capacity of this ferry in comparison with the one at Decatur?

Having been only about an hour or two at Jackson's Ferry watching the ferry I could not state the exact number of wagons that could be crossed at the time, but I think it was in the neighborhood of ten, with their mules, whereas the ferry at Decatur I think, could only take one or two wagons at the time. The Muscle Shoals, between Decatur and Florence, was an impassable barrier to navigation.

Question. Do you know what delayed General Thomas' division so long after the balance of the army in the movement from Corinth?

In a conversation held with General Thomas on the evening of July 23 he told me that he was obliged to wait; that he was occupying the country and line of railroad until troops from General Grant's army should come up to relieve him. I think General Morgan was the name of the general whom he expected to relieve him. He told me that he had been in readiness to move for some time, and had actually that evening ordered Brig. Gen. Speed S. Fry's brigade to be in readiness to march from Jackson's Ferry to cross in case the troops from Corinth came up. He remarked at the same time that he was fearful of withdrawing any portion of his troops from the line of railway until they had been actually relieved by General Grant's troops and not until the latter were in full possession, on account of bands of guerrillas who were hovering along the line of railroad.

Question. Do I understand you that the fifteen days' supplies of provisions which were forwarded to Tusculumbia for the use of the army dated from the 20th of July and that the previous supply was exhausted at that time?

Yes, sir.

Question. Do you know whether the supplies embraced in the statement of Captain Symonds which you have submitted to the Commission were actually received at Nashville?

I do not know, sir. I think that some supplies must have been detained along the line of the Louisville and Nashville road between the breaks, because a railroad line of that length could hardly be at any one time clear of railroad trains.

Question. Do you know anything about the shipment of supplies to Nashville by Captain Symonds during the month of August; whether such shipments were made and to what extent?

I have a dispatch dated Louisville, August 4, 1862, addressed to Capt. J. G. Chandler, quartermaster on General Buell's staff: "117 tons commissary stores (equal to 75,000 rations) forwarded and 100 tons of grain went forward this morning." Signed W. F. Harris, captain and assistant quartermaster. This is the officer whom General Buell had sent to Louisville to expedite shipments.

I have no consolidated returns of shipments in August. Seventy-five thousand rations per diem was about the capacity of the railroad when in running order; that was about equal to the total consumption of the army. There were interruptions on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. On August 10 Gallatin was captured by Morgan, the railroad cut, and his subsequent defeat of General Johnson, commander of the Federal forces, and the constant interruptions, lead me to think that not over 600,000 or 700,000 rations were sent forward in August.

Question. Are you able to state whether the supplies for the army were generally well taken care of or whether they were wasted?

The utmost possible care was taken to preserve the supplies in transit and in depot; but large quantities must necessarily have been wasted in the frequent transshipment from Nashville toward Huntsville from rail to wagon and back again and in fording streams. There is always large wastage where supplies are wagoned over rough roads.

Question. As far as you know by comparison with other troops were the habits of the troops of the Army of the Ohio wasteful or economical and careful?

I have served in three departments since the commencement of the war, and I have known no troops managed better or make better use of their rations or use more care thereof than the Army of the Ohio.

Question. What was the amount of supplies left at Huntsville when that place was evacuated?

I do not think there could have been over ten days' supply left there for the forces under General Rousseau, and they took in their wagons all they could possibly haul away. I do not think over 10,000 rations were destroyed. I was present there at the time and this is my impression.

Question. Was there any loss of supplies at any other points when the troops commenced their concentration at Murfreesborough?

No, sir; most of the supplies at Stevenson, our main depot, had been forwarded north. Captain Bright, the commissary at that point, forwarded all the supplies before he left.

Question. Did you have an opportunity of observing the troops generally on the march from Nashville to Louisville? And, if so, please state in what manner that march was conducted. Was it orderly or otherwise?

My duties calling me frequently from the head of the column to the rear, I had often occasion to remark to my brother officers the excellent manner and close order in which the troops marched from Nashville to Bowling Green. I remember this distinctly, having had occasion to ride to the head of the column between Tyree Springs and Mitchellsville to learn the particulars of a skirmish between General Crittenden's advance and the rebels. I saw no straggling of any consequence, and for troops who had marched the distance they had passed over, in my experience I never saw troops march in better order or in better preparation for any attack or emergency which might occur. From Bowling Green to Munfordville, in the course of my duty, I passed up and down the column several times, both by rail and horseback, and still noticed the excellent marching order of the troops. At Munfordville, in the course of my duty, supplying each division as it passed Rowlett's Station, near Munfordville, I could not help but notice the excellent order of march, on account of the rapidity and regularity of each brigade drawing its supplies and the absence of stragglers in the rear of the line of march. After the troops had all passed Munfordville and were still on the march I rode along the column from its rear to General Buell at Elizabethtown, and had no reason to change my opinion already expressed. From Elizabethtown to West Point, at the mouth of Salt River, the troops marched with greater alacrity than ever and were going with the hope of soon meeting the enemy, and no depredations were committed along the road to my knowledge.

Question. Can you account for the large numbers of absentees from the army after its arrival at Louisville?

At West Point there was considerable conversation and discussion upon the subject of apprehended desertions, or rather an attempt on the part of the soldiers whose homes were in the neighboring counties of Indiana to visit them, and I have no doubt that on their arrival at West Point many crossed the river in skiffs and otherwise to gratify their desire to visit their homes, mostly by troops living in the southern counties of Indiana. I remember some instances of field officers doing so, and I have no doubt but that many company and regimental officers connived at this absenteeism of their troops.

Question. Have you observed the same thing in other cases when troops arrived near their homes after a long absence?

Yes, sir; in Western Virginia, where I served, the troops we had stationed along the Ohio River on the Virginia side caused us much annoyance by their visits to their homes; and even while at Pittsburg Landing I know there were great complaints among the officers of General Grant's army that the Illinois regiments gave him considerable trouble by soldiers escaping down the river in boats, so much so that the most stringent provost-marshal arrangements had to be made to suspend it. A more striking instance I remember when some of General Rosecrans' troops were transported from Western Virginia to General Buell's command in Kentucky in the fall of 1861, when two regiments from Cincinnati gave considerable trouble. The Ninth and Tenth Ohio being permitted to land at Cincinnati, their home, great annoyance and delay were occasioned in gathering them up, so much so that the Ninth Ohio had to be almost driven on board their boats at the point of the bayonet. This attachment for home was also exhibited by the Sixth Ohio Regiment, who, not being allowed to land at Cincinnati, their home, and being taken to Louisville, deserted almost in a body and visited Cincinnati.

Question. Did this absence of men from the Army of the Ohio on its arrival at Louisville to visit their homes indicate any demoralization in the army?

I do not think so, because many returned within a few days to join their regiments on the march toward Perryville, and in all cases that I heard of—and I spoke to many of them—they indignantly denied any intention of deserting; it was simply a desire to gratify an ardent wish to visit their homes before the impending battle.

Question. Would you consider that the same thing must be expected whenever troops return to the vicinity of their homes after a long absence from them with the mild discipline which is enforced in our armies?

I do; on account of the strength and natural desire of people absent a long time from their homes to see their families and on account of the non-punishment of previous examples of the same kind and on account of our people not having been used to the privations caused by war keeping them from their homes.

Question. State all that you know in regard to the amount of stragglers from the army on the march from Louisville to Perryville.

On the march from Louisville to Perryville I rode with the center column, commanded by General Crittenden, on the line of the Louisville and Bardstown pike. On the arrival of the column at Springfield I was sent back to Bardstown, that being considered the most central point to superintend the movements of supplies for the army, and attend to any other business which might be forwarded to me there, that being the terminus and as far as we had erected the telegraph. General McCook's column having moved on a different road to the left and General Gilbert's command having joined our column at Springfield I can only speak of what I saw at that time of those two columns. I noticed that all the old troops, as we called the army that had come up from Tennessee, marched in their usual close order, and on account of this example kept the column composed of the new and old troops pretty well up; but returning from Springfield to Bardstown during the night I found many stragglers who had hidden during the day in the woods, but were mostly from the new troops absorbed by us at Louisville. On my arrival at Bardstown I asked of the officers in command of the post if there were many stragglers in town, and that it was General Buell's orders, if any such were there, that they should be sent forward immediately. From the march of the 7th or 8th stragglers who had hidden along the road during the days or who had loitered in Louisville came thronging through Bardstown, and up to about the 15th or 16th a great many passed through—in my judgment 5,000 or 6,000. I took particular notice of what part of the army the stragglers were composed, and with but rare exceptions I found them to be entirely of the new troops, who, either for purposes of plunder or not being accustomed to march, straggled behind the column. By General Buell's orders, twice a day stragglers were pushed through Bardstown at the point of the bayonet by the provost guard. By order of General Buell I directed Colonel Minty, of the Fourth Michigan Cavalry, who was coming up in charge of the ammunition train, to detail a portion of his cavalry to sweep the road and drive ahead of him every straggler.

Question. Do you know whether the orders were frequent and urgent for an accumulation of supplies in Middle Tennessee from Louisville during the last summer?

Yes, sir, they were; for it was our constant aim to hurry forward all the supplies possible. The frequent interruptions by the rebel raids kept us constantly on the alert to take every advantage of the river and railroad communication and wagoning to bring forward supplies.

Question. From your experience what do you think of the practice of supplying as large a force as was in Middle Tennessee last summer from the resources of that country, in the midst of active operations and in the midst of a population disposed as the people of Middle Tennessee were to the Government at that time?

I think it was impossible to subsist an army in that region of Middle Tennessee, strong enough to occupy the country, off the resources thereof, on account of the destitution of the people, they having been almost entirely stripped by the rebels. That the people were hostile to us there can be no doubt, because the rebel bands of guerrillas infesting that region were composed entirely of the inhabitants thereof.

Question. In an attempt to depend mainly upon the resources of the country which army would fare best, the Army of the Ohio or the rebel army? And give your reasons for whatever opinion you may have upon that subject.

In my opinion the rebel army, because the inhabitants of that region would have been volunteer foragers, and would have brought any supplies, pound by pound, to them; for no matter how poorly off they were, it was their boasted saying that the rebel troops should be the last to suffer for anything to eat wherever they and the people were concerned, when by connivance and preconcerted action supplies could be gathered for the rebels by the people themselves. Our army would have been compelled to visit every individual and to have taken supplies by force. My experience in foraging, even in a good country, induces me to believe that where an army subsists on a country's resources, without the aid of depots, it requires one day to forage for another.

Question. Did the organized bands of guerrillas give the enemy any advantage in this respect?

It did; because the guerrillas, at home in the neighborhood they infested, could be easily supplied by their families, on account of their knowledge of the country, whereas it would be impossible to have subsisted our troops; the rebel plan being generally to scatter and hide during the day and meet at night for the purpose of their raids, by this course making them entirely independent of a commissariat requisite to handle our troops in the field, especially while we were in a hostile country.

Question. Can you form any estimate of the cavalry force that would be required to counteract this advantage which the rebels had, say in the district of country occupied by the Army of the Ohio last summer?

On account of the facilities enjoyed by the rebels in Tennessee and of their sympathizers in Kentucky, their knowledge of the country, and the rapidity of the movements of the rebel cavalry, it has always appeared to me to be necessary to have a cordon of cavalry or mounted men from Louisville to Huntsville strong enough at any available point on the railroad to meet any attack which the rebels in any force might hurl against them. This would have involved a large number of troops to effect a purpose, for which the small body of cavalry we had was totally inadequate. With my knowledge of military affairs I do not consider myself competent to estimate the number of cavalry required for this purpose. From the results of the rebel raids it was always my impression that no matter how much cavalry we had we never could have too much, for in a line of communication extending from Louisville to Nashville, and occupying two lines of railroad south from Nashville, as we did, embracing over 500 miles of communication, it appears to me almost impossible for such a line to be guarded thoroughly and safely, so as to make a constant communication certain, with less than 100,000[?] troops of cavalry, doing nothing else but guarding the lines, because every vulnerable point in that line, if guarded at all, should be guarded so as to make certain defense against any attack whatsoever by the enemy; that is, such a certain defense as I consider was required by such a line of communication, liable to be broken at any hour.

Question. Taking the district of country which the Army of the Ohio occupied last summer, what amount of cavalry force do you think would be required, in an attempt to subsist on the country, to neutralize the inconvenience resulting from the unfriendly disposition of the people and the large guerrilla force scattered through the country, so as to enable the Army of the Ohio to derive all the benefit possible from the resources of the country?

I frequently heard cavalry officers occupied in guarding wagon trains say that 5,000 and 6,000 cavalry between Nashville and Huntsville was hardly sufficient to drive the guerrillas out. The line between Nashville and Louisville, it appears to me, would have taken a great many more, on account of the distance.

Question. Has your experience in commercial business given you an opportunity of knowing anything of the agricultural resources of Middle Tennessee?

It has. I am personally cognizant that Nashville has always been one of the largest markets for Cincinnati for the disposition of meat products, and the shipment of subsistence supplies. In my journeys through Middle Tennessee, in conversation with the planters, I have frequently asked the reason for purchasing their food in the North, when such a rich country as Middle Tennessee could produce it equally as well as our own lands. The reasons were these, that they scarcely would raise grain enough for their own negroes and animals, because they found it much more profitable to plant cotton, and for this reason they devoted their lands to the most profitable culture and obtained their food from the North.

Question. Up to how recent a period has this system of cultivation continued?

In the spring of 1861 they commenced planting corn. They were encouraged almost entirely to suspend the planting of cotton and substitute corn, because in the spring of 1861 shipments from Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Louisville, and Saint Louis and other points to Nashville were either suspended or under such restrictions that it was impossible to get any amount of supplies through, and at the urgent solicitation of the press throughout the rebel States the system of corn planting was generally adopted. Large quantities of corn and meat were therefore raised and put into the market in Tennessee in the fall of 1861. Such home products were that year immensely in excess of any previous year. The grain so raised and the meats so packed in the fall of 1861 in that region of country composed the main supply of all the rebel force. Both in Virginia and other regions they were very active in the winter of 1861 in taking these supplies out of Tennessee. The Confederate authorities, in their eagerness to make use of the resources created in this year 1861 in Tennessee, packed the meats throughout Tennessee on their own account, either purchasing or taking by force the live stock from the owners or raisers. It was well known throughout the country, and I found it corroborated by my own inquiries, that from the supplies raised in Middle Tennessee in 1861 the main supplies for the rebel forces were drawn.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Colonel, what was the force leaving Corinth for North Alabama which you were called upon to subsist?

I think it was about 30,000.

Question. What was this force about the 14th of July, the middle of August, and the 7th of September?

About 45,000. They were about the same in the middle of August and the 7th of September.

Question. What was the force that you were called upon to subsist after the Army of the Ohio left Louisville to attack Bragg at Bardstown.

About 58,000.

Question. Have you any better means of making up the force of the Army than that of the consolidated reports submitted to the Commission by the assistant adjutant-general?

I have not had any experience in making up the number of troops in our army or as to the mode employed in doing so. I generally ascertained or gathered my idea of the number of troops I had to feed from headquarters.

Question. If the morning consolidated reports for the 20th of July exhibits 55,269 men present for duty and your recollection is that you fed 45,000 how do you account for the difference?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President. The force which the judge-advocate states is represented in the morning report is one thing and the force which the witness has stated that he subsisted is a different thing altogether. The witness will answer the question intelligibly I have no doubt, but it is a question that can have but one effect, and that is to mislead him.

The court was then cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should not be sustained.

The WITNESS. The troops I mentioned as amounting to about 45,000 were those between Nashville and Huntsville. There were other forces under General Buell's command at other places, and whom I was not feeding and did not include in my estimate in Middle Tennessee. This may account for the difference in the morning report. There were troops at Cumberland Gap. Of course I did not include those; they were fed by way of Lexington, Ky.

Question. Were there any other forces besides those at Cumberland Gap which were not included?

There may have been on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and on the lines in communication with Cumberland Gap.

Question. If it should prove, however, that the consolidated morning report does not include the force at Cumberland Gap and those on the lines you have enumerated, are you still firm in your recollection that you fed only 45,000 men at that time?

It is my impression it was about that number.

The Commission then adjourned to meet on Tuesday, March 24, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Tuesday, March 24, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Cross-examination of Col. FRANCIS DARR continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. In stating that the available force was 45,000 men are we to understand it to include the two divisions that were added at Nashville after the army was massed there?

No, sir; in estimating the effective force 45,000 men I included our own command when we made the junction with General Mitchel's force at Huntsville and in that region. The two divisions from General Grant's army alluded to in the question joined us on or about September 1. The first division from General Grant's army joined the main column of General Buell's troops at Murfreesborough and the second division alluded to in the question reached Nashville a few days after the main body of General Buell's troops had left. I do not remember exactly the strength of the division of General Grant's army which joined us at Murfreesborough, but from my impression I think it amounted to about 5,000 men, which would have made our troops at that point after that junction about 50,000.

Question. Do you say that the two divisions only made about 5,000 men?

No, sir; the division that joined us at Murfreesborough. I did not see the other division, as they arrived at Nashville after I left.

Question. This 50,000, then, does not include the forces under Morgan at Cumberland Gap or the force stretched along the line to protect the communication?

This estimated force did not include Morgan's force at Cumberland Gap nor the troops north of the Cumberland River.

Question. At the time the various repairs were ordered on the railroads you enumerated was it not known that the lack of sufficient rolling stock would prevent this road being of use in supplying the army?

While our troops were repairing and on the march to Huntsville I inquired of Colonel Fry, chief of staff of General Buell, about the prospect of supplies when we reached Huntsville, and if I remember aright I think he told me that they had assurances from General Mitchel of the most encouraging kind; that with the wagons General Mitchel then had he (General Mitchel) thought he could supply a force of about 25,000 men. In order to make the supply more certain a large train of wagons had been sent from Tuscumbia, under the escort of cavalry, up to Reynolds' Station, on the Nashville and Decatur road, to assist in wagoning supplies around the break. This was done several times before the head of the column left Florence. As to the fact of the rolling stock not being sufficient to supply the troops after the railroad should be completed being known or not I am not aware, having been from about the 1st of April to the middle of June in and about Northern Mississippi.

Question. Were not the wagon and railroad trains used by General Mitchel's army to carry cotton confined to return trains, which would have been otherwise empty; and was not this explained in a satisfactory manner to the Government?

The knowledge about the use of General Mitchel's wagons in carrying cotton which I gathered by inquiries was as follows:

Between Athens and Huntsville the wagons were used in bringing cotton to sundry railway stations. Cotton was hauled northward between Reynolds' Station and Athens on the return trip of the army wagons, which I consider a detriment to the service, because a bale of cotton weighing on an average 500 pounds, and generally putting about three or four bales in those wagons, made the return trip of the wagons as arduous and as wearing on the mules as the trip southward loaded with subsistence, and I urged that such transportation of cotton be suspended to enable the mules to get the rest by coming back empty. As for the explanation rendered by General Mitchel for so using the wagons I have no knowledge of it, and merely know that the condition of affairs in using these wagons induced the order which I have mentioned in my previous testimony about restricting the use of army wagons for army purposes only and restricting the transportation of cotton by railway where it interfered with Government supplies.

Question. Do you know what became of the slaves pressed into the service of the Government for the repairs of railways after such repairs were completed?

I cannot tell of their ultimate fate except of what I saw myself. A great many of them were sent to Nashville to assist in erecting the fortifications there, and on the line of march northward and along the Chattanooga Railroad, both by rail and by wagon road, they received every facility for being sent northward with the troops. Large crowds of them were on the railway trains, picked up from the stations as we relinquished them, and I saw a great many going north in wagons by the country roads about the same time that the troops were on the march. I know that there was a great sympathy felt for them by officers and soldiers and a general desire to help them along.

Question. Do you know of any orders issued in reference to that subject?

No, sir.

Question. In saying that the produce trade between Nashville and Cincinnati is very extensive, do you mean to say that this is confined to Middle Tennessee or Tennessee at all, or is it not rather that the Nashville trade extends throughout the whole South?

I have no doubt that other States besides Tennessee derived their supplies from Nashville, but I am satisfied that such shipments were made to Nashville for the benefit of Tennessee, because in time of peace they found it more profitable to raise cotton than grain as a general thing.

Question. Do you not know that the published statistics, such as those of 1850, made by the Government, show that the counties of Middle Tennessee and East Tennessee give a very large surplus in grain and produce of that sort?

I am not aware of that fact; but the fact of a region raising more produce than is requisite for the supply of the inhabitants thereof does not involve that it should be impossible for that region to import large supplies.

Question. Did the troops when put upon half rations suffer?

That I am unable to say. I was told, however, as a general thing, that they eked out as much as they wished to eat by living on the green corn.

Question. Did they not in fact live better than when they had full rations?

I do not know; but I would state that it was a by-word in the army that a soldier in full health cannot well eat the full rations allowed by the Government.

Question. State briefly the amount of subsistence in Nashville after the Army of the Ohio was massed there and all the supplies you enumerated had been brought in.

In my testimony the other day I gave the amount that was on hand September 1, and I stated the supplies were sent there by rail, and what each division had when they went into Nashville, which all summed up was the amount of supplies then in Nashville after the army had got there. I have my own report to Colonel Fry, dated September 4, and I have the report of the chief commissary in Nashville, dated two days before, so that would give a very accurate report.

Question. Does that include the number of rations of beans and mixed vegetables, said to be 1,217,888?

In Captain Macfeely's report of stores on hand in Nashville, dated September 2, he gives the number of rations of beans 100,000 and of mixed vegetables 200,000. McCook's train, having taken in 40,000 rations complete, must have had 40,000 rations of beans, but they had no mixed vegetables. General Thomas' train had 35,000 rations of beans. It does not amount to the quantity stated in the judge-advocate's question. The quantity of small rations was largely inferior to the essential rations—meat and bread.

Question. Does your statement made in your evidence in chief include 98,306 rations of tea and coffee?

Captain Macfeely's statement does not mention coffee; it mentions 300,000 rations of tea.

Question. If on August 31 there were on hand in Nashville 86,437 rations of meat, would not the days you speak of increase that largely beyond the amount you stated in your examination-in-chief?

Of all the salt meat taken into Nashville by the troops I do not think there was any left there, because I know there was a scarcity among the troops. It was not increased.

Question. Is the Commission to understand from that that there were no meat rations brought in by these various divisions to be added to the 86,437 rations?

None of any consequence of salt meat, but we left all the cattle on the hoof that we could spare.

Question. Does your statement of the subsistence on hand on the 2d September include the 106,039 rations of sugar?

It does not.

Question. Does it represent the 1,002,808 rations of mixed vegetables, not including the beans, pease, and rice enumerated in the number already stated?

It does not.

Question. Does it include the 223,144 rations of molasses.

It does not.

Question. If the number of bread rations was 527,786 on August 31 in Nashville, and represented to be 826,796 on September 30, how do you account for the difference?

On September 2, two or three days after August 31, Captain Macfeely reports 1,000,000 rations of breadstuffs on hand, which would account for part, and the troops on their arrival at Nashville had about 600,000 rations of breadstuffs.

Question. Do you consider a statement which leaves out such important items one of sufficient accuracy to make up an estimate as to what the subsistence of the army really was?

Yes, sir; because such articles as molasses and rice cannot be well used on a march, and Captain Macfeely in his statement mentioned only the leading articles.

Question. Are not beans, sugar, and coffee leading articles?

As to beans, yes, sir; but Captain Macfeely in his statement mentions beans and tea. From his not mentioning coffee I suppose the quantity must have been very small.

Question. Is the Commission to understand that the halt of four or five days at Bowling Green was owing solely to the lack of subsistence?

I have no doubt it partly was, because we consumed that time in getting in the wheat and flour. Besides this, the labor of loading the wagons with supplies consumed a great deal of time, and troops were necessary to guard the forage trains.

Question. Were the other halts, amounting in all to four or five days, between Nashville and Munfordville, owing to the same cause?

I do not know.

Question. Was not the Nashville and Louisville Railroad in operation from Louisville as far as Bowling Green at the time our advance guard reached Bowling Green?

The trains did not come through for several days, on account of the fear of guerrillas. I do not know the exact day when the last train left Louisville for Bowling Green.

Question. Did you not know that the railroad was in operation as far as Munfordville, and that soldiers were sent there to re-enforce that point after their arrival at Bowling Green by rail?

I heard so; but the rebel troops occupied positions on the railroad between Munfordville and Bowling Green.

Question. Had the four or five days, or the ten days in all, been used to secure Munfordville and the railroad, would you not have been in a better position in regard to supplies than in gathering them up all over the country near Bowling Green?

I am unable to say. Such an attempt may not have been successful or it may have been impossible.

Question. Was your information of such a character that you could say positively that the Army of the Ohio was not demoralized in its march from Bowling Green to Louisville?

I can only judge from my own impression and the feelings of my brother officers that at no time did they feel more buoyant with the hope and expectation of meeting the enemy.

Question. If out of twenty officers examined upon that subject of the Army of the Ohio not one could be found to dispute the fact that the army was demoralized, is your information of such a character that you could venture to dispute it?

I should say if there was demoralization I did not see it, nor do I think there was.

Question. Can you give any instance from your own observation in the service where the rebel inhabitants voluntarily furnished the rebel army with supplies other than those you have alluded to in Tennessee and Kentucky?

In Western Virginia the rebel sympathizers freely gave the guerrillas subsistence.

Question. Guerrillas were in a position to help themselves. Can you give an instance where the army was voluntarily supplied by the inhabitants in Western Virginia?

No, sir.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate in his cross-examination has touched upon some points which were not embraced in the examination-in-chief. Under the established rules governing the proceedings of military courts I should be allowed to examine the witness upon those points. The arbitrary rule which you have established precludes me from doing so unless by special permission. I have perhaps half a dozen questions I should like to ask the witness.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If I have gone outside the examination-in-chief in this examination I shall make no objections to General Buell's additional questions, but I should like General Buell to state what those points were.

General BUELL. The departure from the limits embraced in the examination-in-chief is as to the time occupied by the army in the march from Nashville to Munfordville, and the witness may be able to give some information which you have not exactly upon your record in reference to that.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I cannot admit that I went outside of my examination in that. The witness stated positively that the army stopped for lack of supplies between Munfordville and Nashville.

General BUELL. There was no attempt made in the examination-in-chief to explain a delay of four or five days at Bowling Green and a delay of four or five days between Bowling Green and Munfordville, a period of about ten days, which the judge-advocate has endeavored to explain by his cross-examination. I wish only to question the witness in reference to the dates of the arrival and departure of the army at several places.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That we have already before us in the evidence of other witnesses. The only object in the cross-examination of Colonel Darr was to test the accuracy of his knowledge in reference to the facts he has given the Commission. As to the dates and the delays and the number of days on the march, that is already before the Commission, and I doubt if Colonel Darr could add anything new upon the subject.

General BUELL. If the Commission desire any further information upon this subject they may perhaps adopt my questions. I have no desire to put them myself.

The court was then cleared; when, upon motion whether the rule relating to the re-examination of witnesses should be suspended, it was decided in the negative.

By General DANA :

Question. How many days' halt of the Army of the Ohio was there between Nashville and Munfordville altogether?

I do not remember exactly. We arrived at Bowling Green the same day on which Munfordville was attacked by the rebels. As fast as the flour came in the troops were supplied and commenced moving. I think I was four or five days in Bowling Green while the troops were marching, but I think we halted two days at Prewitt's Knob; not exactly halted, but the headquarters halted. I can tell about the time that was consumed in marching from Nashville to Munfordville. We arrived at Bowling Green on the 14th, and I think that day week we arrived at Munfordville.

The witness was then dismissed.

General BUELL. I made application for all the signal officers. There seems to have been some difficulty about procuring their attendance. The judge-advocate expressed himself as satisfied that no message was received at headquarters during the day of the Perryville battle. I made this application upon the statement of Colonel McCook, who said in his testimony that he was under the impression that a message had been sent through the signal station giving information of the attack upon General McCook's corps, and also upon a statement in a published letter of Colonel McCook which I saw subsequently. The judge-advocate has said to me, and I suppose has said to the Commission also, that he was satisfied that no such message had been transmitted to headquarters, and that it does not desire further evidence upon that point. I understand that one of the members of the Commission is not satisfied.

One of the signal officers is now present, and in order to satisfy that member as far as possible I propose to examine him for further evidence on this point.

General TYLER. I have no particular desire for further evidence on this point. If the judge-advocate or General Buell so desire it may be obtained by deposition; that is, as to whether any messages were sent by the signal corps on that day.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. After examining that matter very carefully I satisfied myself that no message had been sent to General Buell by the signal corps on the day of the Perryville fight. General Buell has called witnesses since to that effect, and I will further state that no such message reached him, and upon that assurance being conveyed to General Tyler I understood him to say that he desired no further evidence upon that matter.

General TYLER. I yield my doubt on this point that no message was received by General Buell on the day of the battle of Perryville.

The attendance of Lieutenant Sheridan was not required, because it was acceded by the Commission that no such message was received by General Buell on the day of the battle of Perryville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Although there are yet Major-General Wright and Colonel Fry whom it is proposed to examine for the defense, I propose to examine, through questions reduced to writing, a certain number of witnesses as rebutting evidence. In accordance with the rule established I propose, although General Buell is not through, to state what witnesses I shall call and the points on which I wish to examine them and what I expect to prove by them. I propose to call Colonel De Courcy, to show that the testimony offered through Major-General Granger that East Tennessee could not be invaded successfully from Central Kentucky is erroneous.

General BUELL. Does the judge-advocate propose to examine that witness by deposition?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir; that is, by questions and cross-interrogatories by yourself at the same time.

General BUELL. I shall object to the introduction of testimony upon that question, upon the ground that it is not necessary and does not go to rebut anything that has been introduced in the defense. If it is claimed that my instructions restricted General Morgan from invading Eastern Tennessee farther than he did, those instructions will appear in the documentary evidence. The question of the invasion or the farther advance of General Morgan into Eastern Tennessee was introduced by the judge-advocate himself or by a member of the Commission, and I notified the Commission at the time of the wide field that was opened by this question. It is not possible that it could be fully explained by the testimony of one witness, and especially by the examination of that one witness in the manner proposed. I shall object to the introduction of this witness upon the broad ground that his testimony is not necessary to rebut any new matter that has been introduced in the defense. It was undoubtedly one of the subjects open to the investigation of the Commission at the beginning, and if it was to be introduced at all it should have been introduced in the inquiry on the part of the Government before the judge-advocate had ceased.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Buell hardly states the proposition that gives me the right to examine witnesses in rebutting evidence. I am not confined to new matter, as is well established in law governing rebutting evidence, but it is incumbent upon me to say that it has been introduced by General Buell in his defense; for I claim that in asking

General Gordon Granger as to the possibility or the practicability of invading Eastern Tennessee from Kentucky by the way of Cumberland Gap General Buell opened the way to this inquiry, and that I have an entire right to show that it was practicable and could have been done but for the instructions that retarded General Morgan.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate in stating the proposition with reference to introducing rebutting evidence may be accurate in so far as it has reference to civil courts, but the rule of proceeding is altogether different before military tribunals. My examination of General Granger upon the practicability of invading Eastern Tennessee by way of Cumberland Gap had reference to a different time and different circumstances altogether. The time to which the investigation which the judge-advocate proposes to enter upon applies is the time when General Morgan was in possession of Cumberland Gap with a small force. The time to which my inquiry applies was after the battle of Perryville, and had reference to the movement of a large army into East Tennessee. The time and the circumstances are all different.

The judge-advocate reads from General Gordon Granger's examination :

CINCINNATI, February 17, 1863.

By General BUELL :

Question. Have you had occasion in your official position to study the problem of throwing a force into East Tennessee from Central Kentucky ?

Yes, sir ; it is a matter to which I have given a good deal of study and reflection, and abandoned it as impracticable.

Question. In the course of your investigations what have you learned to be the character of the country and its agricultural resources between Somerset and East Tennessee directly across the mountains ?

The character of the country is altogether mountainous.

General BUELL. The testimony which the judge-advocate proposes to introduce now has reference to the movements of the forces which were actually in East Tennessee. My examination of General Granger was in reference to the movement of a force across the mountains to Central Kentucky. There is not the slightest connection between them. In my question to General Granger there is nothing which refers to the force that was at Cumberland Gap under General Morgan. The examination had reference to the movements of the Army of the Ohio into East Tennessee after the battle of Perryville ; a thing which I have heard has been supposed by some persons to have been possible.

The PRESIDENT. What is the question upon which the judge-advocate proposes to introduce the witness ?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to examine Colonel De Courcy, who was with General Morgan, upon the possibility of having seized and held East Tennessee at the time General Morgan was in possession of Cumberland Gap and to ascertain the reasons why it was not done.

The PRESIDENT. You propose to show by this witness that it was practicable ?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir. It was eminently practicable ; it was a thing that could have been done, General Granger to the contrary notwithstanding.

General BUELL. General Granger did not answer at all with reference to what General Morgan might have done. General Granger's answer has no reference to that case at all.

General DANA. I should like to place on record my reasons for voting against the introduction of this witness : First, that it is in no form to be considered rebutting evidence, on account of the difference and distinction made by General Buell himself between the statements of the case at two different times; secondly, although it is a question which might properly have come before the Commission at the beginning of its labors, when General Buell could have introduced such testimony on that subject as he might have seen fit, it would at this stage of the proceedings be manifestly unjust to open a new investigation on new points, when the rule of the court not only prevents him from introducing testimony on that point, but if the court permitted it it would be impracticable for him to do so; and, thirdly, if the testimony were proper and the subject proper at the present time the proper witness would be General Morgan and not Colonel De Courcy.

The PRESIDENT. I would suggest that the judge-advocate alter the phraseology of his question so as to show if the invasion and occupation of East Tennessee from Central Kentucky was practicable.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. In showing that the thing might have been done of course I showed its practicability, and what I meant was to meet the question that was opened by General Buell in his questions to General Granger as to whether it was practicable to seize and hold Eastern Tennessee from that direction.

The court was opened; when the judge-advocate said that he had altered the proposition so as to bring it more within the rule and then read the proposition as altered.

General BUELL. I shall continue my objection to the question, and for the same reasons in general terms that I have previously stated. The examination of General Granger upon this point, it will be seen, evidently has reference to the practicability of the country between Central Kentucky and Eastern Tennessee—the mountainous region, that is, as to the practicability of throwing a large army into that country. The first question put to General Granger in reference to it is as to whether he has studied the problem of throwing a force into East Tennessee from Central Kentucky, and he answers that he has studied it and had abandoned it as impracticable. He studied it, of course, under the circumstances that existed at the time; it was a matter of consequence to him, and he answers as to its practicability with a view to those circumstances. It must be evident that he did not intend to say that it was impossible to march a force to East Tennessee, because the fact is before the country that a force had actually marched into East Tennessee and held possession of a point in that country for some weeks, perhaps some months. He answers as to the practicability with reference to the circumstances which he studied. The question which follows leads to the object of my inquiry; it was as to the character of the country and its agricultural resources between Somerset and East Tennessee, directly across the mountains, and the testimony goes on in reference to that. The judge-advocate has better evidence than any opinion that can be expressed by Colonel De Courcy, or any other witness, as to the practicability of doing what the judge-advocate says was practicable, and which the command of which Colonel De Courcy formed a part actually did. It is an established fact that that column marched to East Tennessee, and it is not necessary to produce evidence to show that it was practicable to do it; so that the proposition as the judge-advocate has shaped it is not less new matter than it was before; but, more than that, it is a mere shift to get at something which is not expressed in his new proposition.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I hope General Buell will not indulge in reflections attributing it to any such motive.

General BUELL. I do not impute it to any motive which the judge-advocate has not himself expressed. For my own part I do not hesitate to say that General Morgan would have been captured bodily in less than ten days from the time he reached Knoxville, and I claim to know as much about the matter as Colonel De Courcy. I have seen so much disappointed valor in the course of my experience in this war that I am a little skeptical in regard to it.

The court being cleared; on motion whether Colonel De Courcy should be summoned to appear before the Commission the votes were—ayes: President, General Tyler; no: General Dana.

The PRESIDENT. I wish to explain my vote. I vote affirmatively for the reason that General Buell, in asking such a question of General Granger, brought out an opinion from that gentleman which is now upon the record, which opinion is that such an invasion of East Tennessee from Central Kentucky was altogether impracticable, and that this is a conclusion which General Granger has arrived at from long and profound study of that military problem. Such an opinion from so distinguished an officer being upon record, General Buell has the advantage of it, and for that reason it is nothing but fair that the judge-advocate should have the privilege of showing by a person who testifies from personal observation and personal experience that such an invasion would have been practicable.

Court opened.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to call Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, to examine him as to the policy exercised by General Buell toward Nashville, North Tennessee, and Northern Alabama, and what the effect of that policy was in furthering the purposes of the Government.

General DANA. I propose that Governor Johnson be summoned before the Commission at Baltimore and that his evidence may not be taken by deposition.

General BUELL. I shall not object to the presence of Governor Johnson before the Commission upon any question whatever. I do complain that he has not been brought before the Commission before; it was practicable to do so at Nashville and it has been practicable since. I have urged it upon the Commission, and I will venture to say that no good reason can be advanced why he has not been before the Commission before. I shall, however, object to any testimony by deposition.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I could not tell, Mr. President, of what importance or of what significance Governor Johnson's testimony would be till I heard the defense. In that defense I find there is much in the knowledge of Governor Johnson, in the shape of rebutting evidence, that is important for us to have, and on that account I propose to bring him before the Commission.

The judge-advocate is directed by the President to summon Governor Johnson to appear before the Commission at Baltimore.

The questions to be submitted to Governor Johnson were then read to the Commission.

General TYLER. I move that Governor Johnson be subpoenaed to appear before this Commission if his personal attendance can be obtained; and, if not, that the judge-advocate be directed to obtain his deposition upon the subject-matter stated in the questions just read.

The questions to be submitted to Major Wright were then read to the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to call Major-General Wright to state what he knows of the capture of Munfordville by the forces under Bragg, and why that post, being in his department at the time, was not sufficiently re-enforced by him, or why Colonel Wilder was not ordered to evacuate in time to prevent a capture.

General DANA. I move that the same instructions be given the judge-advocate as were given in the case of Governor Johnson.

General BUELL. I could object to the introduction of General Wright as a witness upon the ground that the matter should have been a subject of investigation in the original proceeding of the Commission. I complain that Major-General Wright was not called at the proper time. I shall object to so much of the questions of the judge-advocate as he may propound to him in regard to the strength of the rebel army after the battle of Perryville, for the reason that he should have exhausted the evidence he had upon that subject before he closed his case.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I wish to recall Mr. J. H. Cooper, of Lexington.

The questions it was proposed to submit to Mr. Cooper were here read by the judge-advocate.

General BUELL. I do not object to General Wright being called, because there is matter that should have been explained by his testimony in the first instance. I complain that he was not examined at the proper time. I object to recalling this witness, Mr. Cooper, because in the first place it is not new matter upon which it is proposed to examine him. It is matter that should have been exhausted by the judge-advocate before he closed his case for the Government. I object to it also upon the ground that I have been precluded from calling witnesses that would have testified in reference to the matter that it is proposed to examine this witness upon.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I wish to call attention to the last statement of General Buell and say that he has not been precluded from calling witnesses who would have testified to the matter on which it is proposed to examine Mr. Cooper. It is not upon this point. I was willing to admit that the fact was well substantiated as to Kirby Smith's forces; it is as to the strength of Bragg's army after the junction of Kirby Smith's forces that I want settled.

General BUELL. The evidence of Mr. Cosby, whom I requested should be summoned, would have testified as to the strength of the rebel army. Every witness I named would have testified to the strength of that army after the battle of Perryville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I admitted that they would swear to what was the strength of the whole force of the rebel army.

General BUELL. I made no distinct statement as to what I expected to prove by these witnesses. I only stated the subject on which I wished to examine them.

The court was then cleared; when, on motion whether Mr. Cooper should be recalled, it was decided in the affirmative.

On the opening of the court the questions were read by the judge-advocate which it was proposed to submit to Col. L. C. Houk.

General BUELL. I have no doubt that the evidence of Colonel Houk would be most invaluable. I understand that he is a most intelligent and refined man and I should be delighted to have him before the Commission, but I object to his testimony in the way proposed. I shall particularly object taking his evidence by deposition after he has been kept here, as I understand, for months, when he could have been examined during that time as well as at any other.

On the court being cleared, it was decided by vote of the Commission that the testimony of Col. L. C. Houk should be taken by deposition.

On the opening of the court the questions to be submitted to Captain Mussey were read by the judge-advocate.

General BUELL. I shall object to this witness for the reasons I have stated generally in reference to others.

The PRESIDENT. Who is this Captain Brent, referred to in the questions? Is his evidence of any importance; and, if so, is it not new matter?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It is respecting a matter which has come to my notice since this investigation commenced. I do not attach much importance to it. The drift of it is that the condition of things at Munfordville was known to the commander-in-chief.

The court was then cleared; when, on motion that Captain Mussey's evidence should be taken by deposition, it was decided in the affirmative.

General BUELL. I understand that he is now actually in the city; do you propose to call him before the Commission?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir; I propose to receive his evidence by deposition.

General BUELL. Is it pretended that this witness has been here only since the prosecution was closed?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir; I have had no opportunity of examining him since he has been here.

General BUELL. Has he not been here all the time?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. All the time that the defense has been going on.

General BUELL. It appears to me that I saw an officer of that name when we first came to this city. If I remember rightly, he has been hovering about the Commission room from its first sitting here.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You cannot mistake him when you once see him.

The PRESIDENT. Do I understand you that you have tried to introduce him.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir; I had no right to introduce him at the time I had him at my command here; that is, while the defense was going on.

General BUELL. I state to the Commission that I believe this officer has been in the city here from the very beginning of your session in this city.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That, I believe, is a mistake, general; at least if he was it was without my knowledge. When he first came to me I told him the defense was going on and that I could not examine him.

The PRESIDENT. When did you send out the subpoena for him?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not recollect the precise date.

General BUELL. I request, then, that this witness, as he is here to testify, be called before the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not think his evidence is so important as to delay the Commission in its movements, and if General Buell insists upon it that the witness shall be brought into court, and if it is going to delay the Commission, I shall dispense with his examination altogether.

The PRESIDENT. If the witness is here in the city I see no reason why his deposition should be taken. The philosophy of taking depositions is to obtain evidence in the necessary absence of a witness, when it is impossible to obtain his personal attendance through sickness or any similar cause. I never heard of a deposition taken from a witness who was in attendance.

General BUELL. I think as good reasons could be given for Governor Johnson's presence before the Commission. Who is to decide in such a case?

The PRESIDENT. We must apply to the Secretary of War.

General BUELL. I take it for granted if it is left to Governor Johnson that he will not appear before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. It is proposed to ask for an order for his appearance.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There has been a good deal of the evidence that was expected from Captain Mussey, as to the time taken up in the marches from Corinth to Chattanooga, that has come out in evidence of witnesses examined since Captain Mussey has been here. It was deemed the most important part of his testimony, and I am not disposed to delay the Commission for his examination.

General BUELL. There is one point, with reference to the demoralization of the army, on which I should like him to be examined. I should like to find the man who can specify the grounds upon which he gives such evidence. If Captain Mussey can do it I shall be very glad to see him.

It was decided by the Commission to dispense with the examination of Captain Mussey.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to take the evidence of Mr. Brownlow (commonly known as Parson Brownlow) on the resources of East Tennessee and the character of the Sequatchie Valley and the roads leading out of it into Middle Tennessee.

General BUELL. If Parson Brownlow is brought before the Commission I shall not object to his appearance. I shall object to him otherwise. The information it is proposed to obtain I am very desirous the Commission should have, but I object to taking his testimony in the manner proposed.

The court was cleared; when, on motion, it was unanimously resolved to take the testimony of Mr. Brownlow by deposition.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose, in addition to the witnesses already enumerated, to take the evidence of Colonel Loomis (of Loomis' battery), now at Murfreesborough, by deposition, as to the character of the Sequatchie Valley and the roads leading out of it into Middle Tennessee.

General BUELL. The only objection I shall make is as to giving his testimony by deposition.

The court was cleared; when, on motion, it was unanimously resolved to obtain the testimony of Colonel Loomis by deposition.

General DANA then moved—

In order to give the judge-advocate time to attend to his documentary matters and to prepare the necessary interrogatories for the witnesses, that we adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, April 10, [?] at Baltimore, at 12 o'clock.

On being put to the vote it was carried unanimously:

CINCINNATI, Friday, March 27, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. J. D. BINGHAM (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you state your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please?

J. D. Bingham; lieutenant-colonel, and quartermaster of the Seventeenth Army Corps.

Question. State whether you have recently been on duty in Tennessee, at what place, and between what dates; state in what capacity also.

I have been on duty as depot quartermaster in Nashville, Tenn., from March 4, 1862, till March 19, 1863.

Question. Has it been your duty to acquaint yourself and have you acquainted yourself with the resources of the country about Nashville for those supplies which are required for the subsistence of an army?

It has been my duty to obtain that information, and I have obtained it as far as I could from inquiries throughout the country near Nashville.

Question. State what the condition of the country was during the last summer in that respect.

The supplies for an army in the vicinity of Nashville during the summer were very limited, as far I could ascertain. There were only two localities in which I could hear of supplies of any account.

Question. Go into the particulars, if you please, and state what you know in regard to that matter.

About the last of May I advertised for proposals for furnishing forage at the depot at Nashville. I received no bids in answer to the advertisement. I then applied to those who were represented to be acquainted with the country to know if they thought any supplies of forage could be obtained, and was informed that very little could be obtained near the city. Williamson County was represented as having a quantity of forage; the highest estimate that was placed upon it was 50,000 bushels of corn. I was informed that people were afraid to sell to agents of the Government, which probably was the reason I received no bids. I afterward ascertained there was forage and bacon and flour in Robertson County. I believe the estimated quantity in Robertson County was about the same as in Williamson County. Springfield, the county town of Robertson County, was about 40 miles distant from Nashville. Franklin, the county town of Williamson County, was about 18 miles from Nashville. I obtained from Williamson County about 28,000 bushels of corn and from the vicinity of Nashville about 8,000 bushels. I was informed by a quartermaster at Columbia, about 60 miles, I think, from Nashville, that hay could be obtained in that vicinity. I told him to purchase all that he could, but I never ascertained the amount purchased. Those were the only localities I heard of in which supplies could be obtained in that part of the State in any quantity.

Question. State whether proper means were used by your department to procure the supplies which could be obtained from the country; state what efforts you did use.

I sent agents throughout Williamson County and the country around Nashville to purchase all the forage that could be obtained. Where the people were afraid of known agents of the Government I sent agents who were not known to be such to purchase and forward to points on the railroad all the forage they could buy. I did not send agents into Robertson County until the guerrillas appeared in the counties south of the Cumberland River, when forage trains were sent into Robertson County to bring in what forage they could find on the north side of the river. I selected as agents people who were acquainted with the country and used every exertion to get forage in as rapidly as possible. The people were represented as afraid to sell to agents of the Government, for the reason that the guerrillas had threatened the destruction of their property if they were detected in furnishing any supplies to the troops of the United States.

Question. By what other means did you obtain supplies of forage for the army?

By requisitions on the depot at Louisville.

Question. And with what success?

The supplies could not be brought forward as rapidly as required. As an example, I remember one requisition that I sent in amounting to 5,000,000 pounds of grain. I received only 500,000 pounds.

Question. Do you know what means were used to forward supplies from Louisville and the cause of the failure to send them as rapidly as were required?

The supplies were forwarded over the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and by boats of light draught to Clarksville, on the Cumberland River. I sent all the boats of light draught I could obtain at Nashville to Clarksville to bring forward supplies from that point. Boats that I could use to advantage over the Harpeth Shoals ranged in draught from 11 to 16 inches. The low stage of water in the Cumberland River was one cause of the delay in forwarding supplies from Louisville; and, as near as I could ascertain, the cause of the delay on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad was owing to the company not rendering available their total rolling stock on the road as far as possible for Government purposes.

Question. Do you know of any omission of the proper instructions from the commander of the Army of the Ohio or want of proper energy on the part of the staff officers in urging forward supplies into Nashville during the last summer or in collecting them from the country?

I received instructions frequently during the summer to bring forward and collect supplies for the quartermaster's department. I saw instructions to the same effect to the depot commissary at Nashville from the Headquarters of the Army of the Ohio. To my own personal knowledge, as far it extends, every exertion was made by the officers of the staff to accumulate supplies at the Nashville depot.

Question. Up to what time did you continue to use the Cumberland River for the transportation of supplies?

Up to about the 18th of August, the day Clarksville was captured by the enemy.

Question. What was the amount of freight you could receive in that way up to that time?

When I commenced using boats in June they could bring up eighty tons each from Clarksville. The river fell daily, and the quantity was reduced to such an extent that some boats could only bring eight or ten tons at a load. At the time Clarksville was captured I was sending horses down to the Shoals to tow the freight across in flat-boats.

Question. At what time do you consider the navigation of the river closed for all practical purposes in consequence of low water?

I think about the middle of July. The quantity of freight received by the river at that time scarcely justified the attempt to bring it up.

Question. Do you know at what date the railroad communication with Louisville was permanently broken?

I do not remember exactly the date, but I think between the 21st and the 31st of August.

Question. Do you know anything about the resources of the country about Nashville in regard to subsistence for the troops?

I heard of subsistence stores in Robertson County, consisting of bacon and flour, and I think I heard of some flour at Gallatin. Those were the only localities in which I heard subsistence stores could be obtained. Flour was also obtained from Gallatin during the summer; I think also from Robertson County. The bacon was principally obtained by the foraging parties that were sent out.

Question. How does the army in Tennessee obtain its supplies now?

Principally by the Cumberland River. Some Government supplies are received over the Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

Question. Is the forage for the army procured in that way?

At present I believe almost all the forage is procured by the way of the river. I believe during the month of January and part of February the forage for the army was obtained in the vicinity of Murfreesborough from the country; at least so I was informed, and we forwarded very little during that time from Nashville.

Question. How have the resources of the country during this spring and winter compared in abundance with what they were during the last summer?

I do not know, for the reason that no supplies have been obtained from the country about Nashville for the depot; some forage has been obtained from Kentucky in the counties bordering on Tennessee. It was impossible to send out to obtain forage around Nashville, in consequence of the country being infested by guerrillas, except by trains sent out with large escorts.

Question. To what extent was that the case last summer?

The guerrillas did not appear troublesome in the country about Nashville until about the time of the capture of Murfreesborough, which I think was between the 1st and 10th of July. After that no forage could be obtained beyond 5 or 6 miles from the city, except by sending trains under escort. The railroads were held after that time, a forage continued to be brought in from stations along those roads.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. The country about Nashville that you have described is very productive, is it not?

Yes, sir.

Question. How did you pay for the supplies; cash down or give a certificate?

I paid cash down.

Question. The difficulty in obtaining supplies, I understand, did not originate from the lack of them in the country as much as from the fear the people had of guerrillas?

That was in the localities where I was informed forage could be obtained. In other localities that were not mentioned as having contained any quantity of forage none was procured until the new crop came in.

Question. In purchasing supplies from the country did you require the oath of allegiance before paying for them?

I did not up to the 22d of August; at that time I received instructions to give accounts bearing the conditions for payment, to be settled hereafter as the Government may direct.

Question. Did not our forces in Nashville at that time live unusually well while upon half rations and depending upon the country for supplies?

I do not know much about the way in which they lived. From information I obtained from reports I believe that they obtained large numbers of articles from the country, such as chickens, turkeys, geese, pigs, and sheep by the foraging parties during the blockade.

Question. How long have you been in the service, colonel?

Since 1854.

Question. What is your age now?

Thirty-one years.

General BUELL. I wish to ask the witness a few questions, Mr. President, on points which the judge-advocate has introduced in his cross-examination.

The PRESIDENT. What are the questions, general?

General BUELL. I wish to ask the witness first whether the orders requiring him to give accounts facilitated or embarrassed him in procuring supplies.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have no objection to that question if the Commission sees fit to suspend the rules.

The PRESIDENT. You have another question, general?

General BUELL. I wish to ask the witness whether these supplies that were procured by foraging parties, such as turkeys, geese, chickens, pigs, sheep, &c., were the results of plunder.

The PRESIDENT. What does the Commission say?

General TYLER. I move that the court be cleared.

General BUELL. I will withdraw the question.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If the court will permit I will ask the first question General Buell suggested.

General BUELL. I object to the judge-advocate asking the question. I desire to ask it myself.

The court was cleared; when, on motion, it was decided that the rule should not be suspended.

The witness was then dismissed.

Col. MARC MUNDY (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Colonel, state your name and position in the service of the United States.

Marc Mundy; colonel Twenty-third Regiment Kentucky Infantry.

Question. Were you on duty with the Army of the Ohio in Middle Tennessee last summer? If so, state where, for how long a time, and the different localities.

I was on duty with the Army of the Ohio in Middle Tennessee. I was first ordered from Nashville with a squadron of cavalry and my regiment of infantry to occupy Lebanon, Tenn. That was in the spring. I remained at Lebanon some six weeks. I went from there to Murfreesborough, and during the month of May—I cannot give the exact date—I went with my regiment and a section of artillery and 500 cavalry to Pulaski, Tenn., where I remained till about the 4th of July. After being relieved from court-martial duty at Huntsville I rejoined my command at McMinnville some time in August. I remained with the Fourth Division of the army until it returned to Louisville, Ky., where it arrived about the last of September or the beginning of October.

Question. How long were you at McMinnville?

I was at McMinnville altogether about two weeks. I should state that I was at McMinnville three times. I went from McMinnville to Altamont and returned to McMinnville. I then went from McMinnville to Murfreesborough and returned to McMinnville, and then returned from that place to Murfreesborough.

Question. In what condition did you find the country around McMinnville in regard to supplies for subsistence and forage for the army?

Subsistence of every kind was very scarce; not enough to supply the army by any means. There was no forage except green corn and hay, and the corn was too green for the use of our stock at the time I speak of. Roasting-ears were about ripe enough for the use of the men, but too green for horses. There was some hay. We had to rely upon our subsistence department at Murfreesborough for our supplies entirely, except as to the green corn we got from the country. My command had only half rations while at McMinnville, owing to the difficulty of getting supplies down from Murfreesborough. I saw few, if any, cattle. Those I saw were not fit for use—what we Kentuckians call “scrubs,” big-headed cattle, very poor and small. Hogs were also very scarce. I know it was with great difficulty we could keep our division supplied with the necessities of life. I mean the Fourth Division, under the command of General Ammen. I saw no wheat there. The wheat crop had been gathered, I suppose, but I understood there was very little wheat in the country; in fact the country had the appearance of having been cleared out before I got there.

Question. Is it a productive country about McMinnville; how does it compare with the rich country of Central Kentucky?

It compares very poorly with the rich country of Central Kentucky. I should judge the soil is very thin. The corn crop was what I should call a very light crop. The land between McMinnville and Altamont, at the foot of the mountain, is pretty generally cultivated in what might be called the valleys, but produces comparatively little. Between McMinnville and Murfreesborough the country is not so good until you reach near Murfreesborough. To the north and east of McMinnville the country is hilly and broken, and you might almost call it a sterile country. I do not think they produce at the outside more than four or five barrels of corn to the acre from their land in their best seasons, whereas our best land in Kentucky produces from fifteen to twenty-five barrels to the acre.

Question. Describe the topography of the country about McMinnville, as far as you are acquainted with it.

To describe the part over which I went first, as you go from McMinnville toward Altamont, the country, till you reach the foot of the mountains, may be called a level country; there are very few, and those small, hills. To the northwest, toward Murfreesborough, the country is somewhat broken, but comparatively level. I have already said that on the northeast it is hilly and broken, and directly to the east it is a mountainous country and the knobs come to within two or three miles of McMinnville. There is a stream of water running by the town. I do not remember the name of it. When I was there it was a season of drought, but there was some running water in this stream, abundant for our men and stock. I think the mountain knob spoken of to the east of McMinnville is about two or three miles from the limits of the town. The roads about McMinnville are generally good; the one toward, I think, Manchester—at all events it is the one we went on toward Altamont—is a fine open road, and the one toward Murfreesborough is a good road. The road leading toward Smithfield is also a good road near the town. I have never been out far up that road.

Question. What is the character of this stream you speak of as passing near the town?

It is what might be called a large creek or small river. It is dammed at the town for mill purposes. It is clear, nice water. It is not deep; it may be forded except in the dam, and even across the dam I have forded it. In visiting the pickets and outposts I have ridden across the river at any point where I struck it; the water was not higher than to my horse's knees when I forded it.

Question. Is there anything in the topography of that country that would make it necessary for an army coming across the mountains from the south to pass through that particular point? Could it be avoided on either side at the option of the advancing army?

The country is open enough for an army to pass and avoid the town; it is not necessary that they should go through it. I do not know the state of the roads except those leading into the town.

Question. Do you know anything of the country about Sparta?

I have no personal knowledge of it.

Question. Please look at this order (General Orders, No. 13*a*) and state whether you recognize it as embodying the policy which was to be adopted by the troops under my command toward the people of the country in which we were operating.

Yes, sir; that is the order of which I received a copy, and I was governed by it.

Question. Was it the practice in that order to treat all persons alike, loyal and disloyal?

It was not my practice, sir. I made a great distinction between loyal and disloyal persons. The loyal persons I treated with every consideration and kindness. Disloyal ones, who were stirring up the people by denouncing our Government, in some instances I sent them through our lines to the Southern Confederacy, in other instances I put them under heavy bonds, and in some instances I compelled them to take the oath or go to prison. I did not make a distinction between citizens upon mere questions of sentiment. The distinction was made from their course of conduct and conversation.

Question. State what the effect of that policy was, colonel, upon the temper of the people, as far as your observation extended. State anything you know in illustration.

The policy was considered a just one, and the effect was beneficial as far as my experience goes. When I first went to Lebanon there were quite a number of what I call rabid rebels in the neighborhood who were exasperating the people very much, some of whom I imprisoned and some of them I sent through the lines. I warned them, however, by public notice that all who would behave themselves like good citizens should be protected. The policy I pursued at Lebanon had the effect of ridding the community of some very bad men and developed a very strong loyal sentiment. I had the approval of some of the best men in that part of Tennessee of the course I was pursuing; among others I would mention Ex-Governor Campbell, Mr. Jordan Stokes, and Col. William [B.] Stokes. The same policy I pursued at Pulaski when I first went there. I found the sum total of our Union men there amounted to two in the whole country. I pursued the same line of policy, having given the citizens notice that I was not there to war upon unarmed people, but to protect all who in their civil pursuits behaved themselves. After giving this warning to them I treated the people kindly, remedied some wrongs they were suffering, protected them from the marauding of the teamsters and trains that were passing through there, who were deprecating very largely upon the people. I published an order forbidding any depredations upon the citizens, forbidding them from taking their property except by my authority, as I was instructed by General Buell's order No. 13.

In my intercourse with the people there I found the masses had been largely duped by their leaders in being led to believe that our purpose in coming into Tennessee was to take away all their civil rights and destroy their domestic relations. I permitted the country people to come into the town freely, in order that I might communicate with them more freely, and I discovered that while they were generally rebels they had been made so by falsehood. The policy I pursued made a practical contradiction to what had been taught them by their leaders, and the result in a short time was that they gained confidence in my course of procedure, and they themselves proposed that we should have what they called a county meeting, in order that all the people might hear my policy from my own lips.

I called a county meeting at their suggestion and invited the citizens to meet me at Pulaski. I was very agreeably surprised to find that we had a very large audience of citizens from every part of the country. I spoke to them in their court-house and assured them as I already had done by my order. The result of the meeting was that many of them declared themselves openly in favor of the restoration of the Union, and they themselves called another meeting of the people of Pulaski. At the second meeting Governor Neil S. Brown made them a speech, in which he publicly declared that his policy was changed and that he was then a Union man. He explained to them the impositions that had been practiced upon them, and at the end of the meeting they passed resolutions unanimously resolving to return to the Union and abandon the cause of the Southern Confederacy. A great many of the younger portion of the community in private conversation with me explained how they had been led away by the rebels assuring them that we were not only come there to take away their property, but to ravish their wives and daughters and do everything else that could be suggested that was bad. They expressed a great anxiety to return to their loyalty, feeling convinced that they had been deceived from the policy I was pursuing and the way I was treating them, but expressed fears that some leading men in the community who were bitter secessionists would mark them and have them punished by the Southern Confederacy.

To relieve these fears I summoned these gentlemen before me, frankly told them the apprehensions of the community, and insisted upon it that they should take the oath of allegiance and commit themselves in that way, so as to relieve the apprehensions of the community, or leave Pulaski and go to the Southern Confederacy. I think I summoned twenty of them, and perhaps all but six took the oath of allegiance and publicly proclaimed themselves for the Union. The six I sent through to General Beauregard. I think two of them were preachers. Having relieved the community of these men that they were afraid of, there was no longer any hesitation in declaring their Union sentiments, and I am satisfied that four-fifths of all the men in the country—fully four-fifths—returned to their loyalty and would have been glad to reconstruct the Union.

I advised Governor Johnson of the state of feeling and urged him to reorganize the State government by a popular election. We had considerable correspondence about the matter. He expressed great satisfaction at the result of my demonstrations at Pulaski, but declined to reconstruct the State government until all the rebels were out of Tennessee. He adopted another policy of mine and authorized me to proceed in it, which was to make the citizens of Pulaski reimburse the loyal men there whose goods had been seized in a rebel raid under Morgan, then Colonel Morgan. I had a commission organized, damages assessed, and made the citizens pay the money over. I believe that if the same policy had been pursued throughout Tennessee the loyalty of the people of Tennessee, which is overshadowed by the fears of the Southern leaders, would have been developed throughout the whole State. The people at Pulaski had been much outraged by the depredations of these teamsters, and they seemed much gratified at the policy I pursued in relieving them from those wrongs. I think that of itself had great influence on the minds of the masses. I found the masses of the people of Tennessee were exceedingly ignorant, and depended entirely for their information upon their public speakers, the stump speakers, as they are called, which accounts for their gullibility by their leaders. Quite a large proportion of them I found could not read or write, and they necessarily relied upon their public speakers for all their information.

Question. Do you know any marked case of a departure from this policy by portions of our troops in the country they were occupying? If so, please mention the case and the effect.

Yes, sir; I know of one very aggravated case at Athens, Ala., in which a portion of troops under General Mitchel's command, the Third Division, plundered the people at Athens, robbed their store-houses and residences, making no distinction between those who were loyal and those who were disloyal, which exasperated the people of Athens very much. The people in North Alabama, particularly at Athens, had been considered a loyal people, inasmuch that they kept the American flag flying at Athens until about the time General Mitchel's command went through to Huntsville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Colonel, you will confine yourself to the question.

The WITNESS. I am stating that they were loyal to show the effect upon them of such depredations.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If it was the mere plunder of soldiers and not done by the authority of the officers it is not answering the question General Buell asked you.

The PRESIDENT. The rule is there should be no interference with the examination.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The question is correct enough, but the witness is not answering the question.

The WITNESS. This plundering was done in the immediate presence of the officers who were commanding those troops, some commissioned officers taking part in it.

General TYLER. Did you see it, colonel?

No, sir; but it is testimony given me in court-martial under oath and from almost all the citizens of Athens who were present. I have it also from some of the officers who were themselves present and censured the commanding officer very much because he did not check them. The result of this was to estrange most of the citizens from our cause. They said to me themselves that they had lost confidence in our Government when they found they were subject to be plundered by our army. They complained bitterly that they had withstood the threats and supplications of the Southern rebels to join them and had been loyal to the Government, and yet their town was to be sacked and they were to be plundered because some rebels happened to make a raid into their town and drive out some Union soldiers. The people there also complained that these officers had taken away their horses without compensation or giving them any vouchers by which they might afterward obtain compensation. Other cases of departure from the rule I do not know of except those teamsters I spoke of, who plundered every man who lived on the road from Columbia, Tenn., to Athens, Ala. I know of one case which was reported to me which caused me to arrest the parties and send them to General Mitchel, in which they took all the bacon out of a man's smoke-house—some 6,000 pounds—drove his negroes off his place, and broke up all the furniture in his house. That was at the Elk River Crossing. When the men along the road who had been plundered found they would be protected by me they were pretty generally reconciled, expressed themselves in favor of the Union, and privately gave me advice of rebel bushwhackers and guerrillas who were prowling in the neighborhood. This Third Division had plundered the people.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, I object to this mode of examination, and I ask that this witness may be confined in his answer to the question that is asked him. The witness is asked what was the effect of certain departures from what is known as a conciliatory policy—a policy which recognizes the civil rights of the people who may openly sympathize with the rebellion and give aid and comfort to the enemy, but who are not found in arms; the opposite policy to which is that a people freely sympathizing with the enemy and giving aid and comfort to the rebels have no rights which the Government is bound to respect; but it does not follow that in pursuing either policy officers and soldiers guilty of such offenses as murder, rape, arson, and plunder may not be punished or can be said to have departed from either policy, and in giving instances of such offenses the witness is wide of the question asked him by General Buell.

General BUELL. In questioning this witness I have not spoken of a conciliatory or of a harsh policy. I have simply put before the witness an order which announced to my troops the rule of action by which they were to be governed. There are in fact two policies which may be pursued. One is that of justice and a reasonable respect for the rights of the people in whose country we are operating as far as is consistent with the success and efficiency of our military operations, and the other is one of plunder and pillage. If a country is laid under discretionary and unrestricted contributions by authority, it will be plundered by individuals without authority. The testimony of the witness as to what was the result with respect to the condition of things at Pulaski is an exemplification of the policy I attempted to pursue and did enforce as far as I could. The proceedings of our troops at Athens were exactly the result of the other policy, and they are just such results as have followed wherever the policy of no rights to the people of the States in rebellion, "or living upon the enemy" as it is called, has been tolerated. I wish to exemplify the difference, and I request that the witness may be permitted to continue his evidence.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If the witness is brought here to show the effect of unauthorized plunder and pillage on the part of the troops I answer that it is unnecessary, as the Government is prepared to admit it. I do not find in any orders issued from Washington permission to plunder, but it has been announced from headquarters at Washington that where a man is found in arms against the Government and giving aid and comfort to the enemy he has no rights which the Government is bound to respect, and his property may be taken, but in a legal and proper method, not by plunder and pillage. There are two courses which may be pursued, one only of which is authorized by the Government. Now if this witness merely shows that plundering, &c., is a bad policy, his testimony is unnecessary, for no one doubts it.

General BUELL. If it is necessary to show the propriety of the testimony which the witness is giving I think it would not be a difficult matter to establish before this Commission that the case which the witness has described is precisely the result of the reverse of that policy which I have insisted upon wherever I have commanded. It is undoubtedly true that the Government does not sanction such proceedings, and it must be assumed that they are the very reverse of what the Government desires to enforce, and that the men who have favored the free use of rebel property for public purposes would be as much outraged at the conduct which results from that course as anybody is; nevertheless that is the result, and it is a result which not only outrages humanity but trammels and impairs the efficiency of our armies.

The PRESIDENT. Is the point that you raise, colonel, whether the witness should be allowed to proceed further with this line of testimony?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir; I object to it for the reasons I have stated.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the witness should be allowed to proceed with his testimony.

On the court being opened Colonel Mundy continued :

From Columbia to Athens they took their forage, for which they neither paid them nor gave them vouchers, and took their furniture out of their houses. I reported the matter to General Mitchel at Huntsville, and put the train-master under arrest, and sent him back to Huntsville to General Mitchel, and reported to him what I had done. That was as the train went down to Huntsville. In a few days afterward I found the same train-master with the train returning, which astonished me. I rearrested him at once upon their complaints of depredations he had committed upon that trip and reported the matter to General Mitchel again. He replied to me by telegraph to attend to my own business. I replied to him that it was my business, and that I intended to hang the man, under authority of the order of General Buell. The order did not give me authority to hang, only to check depredations and plunder. I reconsidered it, however, and sent the man back to Huntsville under arrest. I never knew what became of him afterward ; he never came over my road any more. Under the aggravations of these depredations I found that our telegraph line was being cut continually, our railroad was being torn up, and bridges burned.

When I put a stop to the depredations the teamsters as well as the citizens found I was in earnest about it. I found that the citizens were freely disposed to give me notice of those who were interrupting our railroad and telegraphic communication ; they freely supplied my hospitals with necessities gratuitously, and behaved generally as a loyal and Christian people. I now remember something more of that man : his name was Proctor ; he afterward fell into the hands of General Buell, who ordered his trial by court-martial, but he escaped from the provost guard, and I do not know what became of him since. I might also say I had the sanction of Governor Johnson in pursuing this policy, who by proclamation advised the same as was recommended in General Buell's order. I reported the arrest of these citizens to Governor Johnson, with the reasons, and told him what I purposed to do ; he approved of it, and directed me to proceed, but subsequently he relented so far as Colonel Jones was concerned, who was a member of the Southern Congress, and ordered me to permit him to remain in Pulaski.

By General BUELL :

Question. Was there any change in the disposition of this Colonel Jones that you speak of ?

Well, sir, I cannot say as to that. If he talked any after that he did it so quietly that it did not come to my ears.

Question. Are any active demonstrations of loyalty to be expected from the people of the South so long as they have organized armies in their midst which control their actions and to a considerable extent their opinions also ?

We cannot expect any demonstrations of loyalty from the people there unless we can assure them of protection against the rebel armies and guerrillas. I found that the great fear in the minds of the people in that portion of Tennessee where I held command. Those about Pulaski who were disposed to come out openly for the Union said to me that they feared they would be marked and destroyed by the rebels for it. If they were to incautiously develop the Union sentiment, and they had no protection from our forces and our Government it would be to seal their doom. I know of two cases near Pulaski where citizens who had declared themselves for the Union were hung by the guerrillas and left hanging in the woods. Their wives came to me to Pulaski and reported the facts. I afterward sent an officer with a party of men to have them decently taken care of and to search for the guerrillas till they could find them. I did not find them ; if I had I should have retaliated by hanging them.

Question. In either event from which policy do you think the Government would derive most strength, the policy which is embodied in the order I have submitted to you or one which pays no regard to the private rights of the people among whom our armies operated ?

In expressing an opinion based upon my experience with them I am satisfied that the policy of General Buell is the true one. I do believe that the whole of Tennessee could be restored to the Union by a strict pursuance of that policy. I might say the same thing for North Alabama. I had a great deal of intercourse with the people of both sections. I believe that the true policy of the Government to bring this war to a successful issue would be to pursue a course where the rights of the people would be respected and to disenthral them from their leaders. Prisoners from the Army of Corinth who fell into my hands at Pulaski assured me that thousands of the soldiers from Tennessee, Kentucky, North Alabama, Arkansas, and North Carolina were disgusted with the war and would go back to their allegiance, but that they believed they would be shown no quarter and that their property as well as themselves would be destroyed. They seemed greatly surprised to find that I was not burning the houses, seizing the property, and ravishing the women in the neighborhood where I was in command. They said that representations of such procedures by all our officers were circulated in the Southern Army in order to keep alive the hatred and enmity.

Question. Do you know what measures were taken to punish the persons who committed those depredations about Athens which you have referred to?

They were arrested and tried by court-martial and punished according to the judgment of the court.

Question. What officers were punished in that way; how many were brought to trial, as near as you remember, and by whose orders were they brought to trial and punishment?

Colonel Turchin, who commanded the brigade, was dismissed by court-martial. Colonel Gazlay, who was commanding a regiment in the brigade, was also dismissed by court-martial. Captain Edgerton, who commanded a battery in the brigade, was tried, but acquitted, because it was shown that he acted by direct authority of his superior officer. Colonel Mihalotzy, who commanded a regiment in the brigade, was also tried by court-martial and punished. I do not remember what the punishment was; as he showed that he was acting by the authority of his superior officer, Colonel Turchin, the punishment, if any, was light. They were arrested and tried by the order of General Buell. Colonel Stanley was also tried, but I believe he was acquitted. I think the prosecution against him was abandoned. He showed that what he did was by authority of his superior officer, Colonel Turchin, and there was nothing to criminate him personally. These are all I remember now of the officers of that brigade who were tried.

Question. What effect did these disciplinary measures have upon the temper of the troops who were concerned in those depredations and others who sympathized with them toward the commander of the army?

I heard officers express great bitterness toward the commander of the army. I never heard private soldiers make any remarks about it, but I know the soldiers usually take their tone from their officers, and I have no doubt but what it embittered them against the commander of the army also.

Question. What comments were made upon those measures by the public press throughout the country generally?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question. We are certainly traveling outside of our record. I do not see what the press has to do with the matter under investigation.

General BUELL. I think the judge-advocate is mistaken. Our record is a pretty comprehensive one; the subject is certainly a very comprehensive one. I wish to give some explanation of whatever ill temper may have existed in the army toward its commander. That is a matter which has been admitted already, and the question is pertinent to it. I will show how it is if the witness can be permitted to go on.

The court being cleared; on motion, it was decided that the objection should be sustained.

By General BUELL:

Question. Can you point to any circumstances in connection with these depredations and the measures that were adopted to punish them that were calculated to impair the authority of the commander of the army and to produce insubordination in its ranks?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President. I have charged that after the army left Nashville, in falling back upon Louisville, it was demoralized, and witnesses have been before the Commission who have said that they believed the army had lost confidence in its commander. Any evidence brought to bear upon that fact would be in order, but the witness should not be allowed to travel outside of the time specified by the Government in its charge. I am prepared to admit that up to the time to which the question refers the army had entire confidence in General Buell, believed in him, and sustained him as their commander, and that no general ever stood higher in the estimation of his troops than did General Buell.

General BUELL. And I wish to show that that confidence continued, if it ever existed, and that it was the tone of the public press and the censure passed upon the commander of the army for the measures now under consideration which encouraged that spirit of ill-will which can be found in any and every army, and is ready at any opportunity to express itself insubordinately with reference to its commander.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should not be sustained.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; the dissatisfaction of the officers who were tried and their friends, as expressed both in the army and the criticisms of the public press, both upon General Buell and his court-martial, no doubt sowed the seeds of insubordination. I saw in some Northern papers, I think a Chicago paper—

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. This is precisely the response that was ruled out here and I object to it now.

The PRESIDENT. If the witness states what any particular paper said it would bring his answer within the objection that was sustained to General Buell's former question.

General BUELL. I do not understand that the Commission meant to rule out anything I might introduce to establish the proposition I stated to you a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT. I would state, general, that the Commission had no objection to your showing any circumstances which were calculated to produce dissatisfaction and insubordination among your troops or alienate their confidence in yourself; but what this or that paper says the Commission would hardly think proper to admit as testimony. For instance, if the witness, in stating the circumstances that called forth the insubordination referred to in the question, should state that the tone and spirit of the public press commenting upon that affair were calculated to produce dissatisfaction and insubordination, such testimony would be perfectly proper.

General BUELL. I should think, sir, you were wrong in that. What would be objectionable in the evidence would be a general opinion. I should suppose it would be preferable that he should state the ground upon which he based his opinion, that the Commission might judge for itself whether the opinion was well founded or not.

The PRESIDENT. The decision of the Commission is as I have stated.

General BUELL. I wish, then, to put upon record that I desire not so much to call out the opinions of the witness as to establish the facts upon which those opinions might be based.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission has no objection to the witness proving facts; on the contrary, they expressly ruled that he should be allowed to state facts, and to show what those were on which he based his opinion. Among other facts may be enumerated the tone or spirit of the public press in its comments upon the affair you have alluded to.

General BUELL. I cannot understand, sir, the reason for the objection. The witness has given his opinion, and it seems to me to be very proper that he should give the reasons upon which he bases that opinion. So far from expecting that the Commission would stop him in his statement of the facts of the case, I should rather have expected that they would require him to give the explanation. It appears to me that it would be necessary to give his testimony substantial value; otherwise it is a mere expression of his own opinion.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to the testimony offered for two reasons. In the first place, it is inadmissible unless General Buell can connect it with the time when it is charged by the Government that the army was demoralized; in other words, he is attempting to show that his army was demoralized when its morale was good; that is, at the time the press was commenting upon the trial of Colonel Turchin. In the second place, unless the witness connects the public press with the army and shows that these articles were read in the army and influenced it at the time that the Government charges the demoralization to have occurred it certainly is outside the case.

General BUELL. I have no doubt, sir, that the effects of these comments of the public press upon the army can be established very easily. I do not agree with the judge-advocate that it can be brought down to a particular point of time; he has not shown nor has he attempted to show that it commenced at any particular point of time or had reference to any particular act of mine.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would say that in this General Buell is mistaken. The question has been asked as to the morale of the army after it fell back from Nashville, and the testimony given has been confined to the condition of the army at that time, and the witnesses introduced by the Government have shown that the discipline and drill of the army previous to that period were excellent.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should be sustained.

On the opening of the court General Buell informed the Commission that Mr. Brownlow was at his home at Newport or Covington, and requested that his testimony should be given before the Commission instead of being received by deposition.

The court then adjourned to meet on Saturday, March 28, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, March 28, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, and General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

By General BUELL:

Question. Were newspapers freely circulated in the camps of the army while we were in Tennessee last summer?

Yes, sir.

Question. Name the papers that were most frequently seen among the troops.

We had frequently the Cincinnati Times, Gazette, Commercial, Louisville Journal, and I frequently saw Pennsylvania papers. We also had Chicago papers, and many papers published in little inland towns, that came to soldiers from those localities. I remember the Cincinnati papers, because they came more directly to my camp than other papers. We also used to have the Nashville Union. There was quite an abundance of newspapers, though I cannot now give the names of all of them.

Question. Can you name all the Chicago papers that you saw frequently?

There was the Chicago Tribune and perhaps the Chicago Times. I cannot remember distinctly if that is the name of it.

Question. Were these papers unanimous in their condemnation of the commander of the Army of the Ohio?

Those that spoke of the conduct of the commander of the army particularly, with, I think the exception of the Louisville Journal, criticised his course severely. I do not mean to say that all these papers I have named spoke of the conduct of the commander of the army, but those that did, with the single exception of the Louisville Journal, spoke of it in condemnatory terms.

Question. What was generally the burden of this condemnation? And mention, if you please, those papers that indulged in it most freely.

I cannot give the exact language of any papers, nor can I specify which papers were most severe. The Chicago papers, I remember, condemned him very bitterly for his punishment of Colonel Turchin. The burden of complaint in the papers was this: that General Buell was protecting the people, rather than punishing them, generally; that he did not devastate the country and destroy all the rebel sympathizers, and that he treated the people generally too kindly; I mean the people of Tennessee and Alabama. In other words, they seemed to advocate what they called a "vigorous war policy," by which they seemed to mean general devastation.

Question. Did this sort of criticism have a good effect or a bad effect upon the temper of the troops and the discipline of the army?

I think it sowed the seeds of demoralization. I remember another thing which gave me a great deal of trouble in controlling my command. It was the general applause of the press for the orders and policy pursued by General Pope in Virginia, which the troops and papers construed into a right on the part of our soldiers to appropriate all the rebel goods they could find, to make themselves as comfortable as possible, and destroy the resources of the enemy. I know that many of our soldiers practiced the policy pretty freely, and I had great trouble and difficulty in restraining my own. I restrained mine not so much to protect the property of the people as to preserve the discipline of the troops, and in obedience to General Orders, No. 13, because that required me to do it.

Question. Have you any knowledge of the extent of the straggling that took place in the army after the march from Louisville in the pursuit of the rebel army? If you have, please state all you know about it.

Yes, sir; about the time we reached Louisville I suffered from a very violent hemorrhage, which incapacitated me from field duty, and I was ordered to report to General Boyle for duty. I reported to him immediately. I think it was the same day or the day afterward I was enabled to get up to him, and not being able for specific duty he assigned me to the general superintendence of military affairs about Louisville under himself. Citizens from all the roads over which our army had gone out came in with constant complaints that the country was full of stragglers, who were committing all kinds of depredations upon them. I sent out cavalry patrols on all the roads, who gathered up a great many stragglers near the city of Louisville, some of whom they brought back to Louisville and some they sent forward to overtake their respective columns. These complaints were coming in continually until after the battle of Perryville. I have no idea now of the extent or the number of stragglers, except from the universal complaint from every part of the country between Louisville and Perryville. I know that during the month of November, when I had been assigned a command at the barracks at Louisville, I sent forward to Nashville over 5,000 and I sent forward during December about 4,000. This embraced not only stragglers, but a few convalescents sent from Louisville. The stragglers that I gathered up in the country were principally from new regiments, but a great many from our old regiments had gone home from Louisville. I remember in my own regiment, which was encamped in the island, surrounded by water and a strong guard, when ordered to march from Louisville toward Perryville left 125 guns in the stacks, and yet I had used every precaution, with a strong guard, to keep them in camp. I found afterward, by interrogating some of them that were captured, that they had waded and swum the Ohio River across the falls after night to get home. I sent out detachments as I had organized them in the city for recapturing them on the roads, under officers, with instructions to pick up all they could find and carry them to their commands.

Question. What was the cause of the large amount of absence without leave from the Army of the Ohio after its arrival at Louisville and while it remained there?

I think the principal cause was the desire of the soldiers to get home to see their families, from whom they had been absent a long while.

Question. Did they subsequently return to Louisville for the purpose of joining their regiments while the army was in front about Perryville and beyond there?

A great many of them did, sir. A great many of my own regiment returned within four or five days, took their guns, and went up to join their regiment. I made the detachment up and sent them forward under officers, with instructions to gather up stragglers on the road. I made them up largely from men who returned in that way, as being most reliable, adding to them the stragglers that I had gathered up by my cavalry patrol.

Question. What was the cause of the great amount of straggling from the army after it left Louisville to advance against the enemy?

I suppose there were two or three causes, one of which was they did not care much about fighting; another was they wanted to make use of the opportunity to plunder the people of the country. I suppose some straggling was the result of want of ability on the part of the new troops to keep up in the march, as they were raw, inexperienced, undrilled, and undisciplined; but if I should judge by the complaints that came in, I should say that the principal cause for the straggling was the great desire for plunder. I say this because I remember that when I took occasion to lecture some officers for the misdeeds of their commands they gave me to understand that they were in an enemy's country and had a right to plunder the people.

Question. Was this straggling to be ascribed to demoralization in the army or was it due to the want of discipline in the raw troops?

I may say it was done almost exclusively by the new troops, and therefore could not be from demoralization, but from want of discipline.

Question. In what manner was the march conducted from Nashville to Louisville; was it an orderly march or a disorderly one; were the troops obedient and under control; was there a great amount of straggling and were there desertions—any of those incidents which indicate demoralization in an army?

I consider the march to have been a very orderly one and generally well conducted. There was some straggling—comparatively little, however—and perhaps there may have been a few desertions, but, if so, they were very few. I have no doubt that some Kentucky troops as they reached the locality of their homes took occasion to go home to see their families; I know that a few did, because before we reached Louisville I saw some three or four who had stopped about Bowling Green and afterward came up and overtook the column. There was some complaint during the march of the fatigues incident thereto owing to the scarcity of water, the heat, and the great amount of dust. I think those three things combined made it the most terrible march that soldiers ever did make in this country. The troops were obedient and under control, and, I might add, under thorough discipline. There are always a few exceptions in every command, and there were in this army. I heard much more complaint from officers than from men. I do not mean to say complaint of the fatigues of the march and its hardships, but complaint against their commanding officer. I do not mean to specify the names of the officers; perhaps it would be improper to do so; but while our corps was lying at Horse Well, beyond Munfordville, I heard officers who outranked me publicly censure the conduct of General Buell, and one of the officers, major of a regiment, made a speech to his men, in which he questioned the loyal purposes of General Buell and censured his course of conduct. I was not near enough to catch the exact language used, but could hear the applause with which his men greeted his remarks. It was very near the headquarters of the commander of the brigade. I took occasion to say that if I commanded the brigade I would have put the officer in irons, which I would have done. I consider this demoralizing to a great extent, unbecoming in an officer, and injurious to the service.

Question. From what State did this regiment come in which this occurred?

It was the Thirty-sixth Indiana Infantry.

Question. From what State did the officer come who commanded that brigade?

Indiana, sir; he was the colonel of the Thirty-sixth Indiana and commanded the brigade to which I was attached.

Question. Has that officer since been promoted?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question. I do not see its purpose or what it has to do with this investigation.

After an explanation from the witness that he could not answer the question the judge-advocate withdrew the objection.

I do not know about the promotion of the commander of the brigade; the major that was is now the colonel of another regiment.

By General BUELL:

Question. Did you ever see an article published in the Indianapolis Journal which counseled the soldiers of the Army of the Ohio to take the life of their commander?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President. It is hardly necessary to repeat what has already been said with respect to this outside matter.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection be sustained.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you know whether the Indianapolis Journal is recognized as expressing generally the sentiments of Governor Morton upon questions of public policy and the conduct of public officers, particularly those concerned in the direction of the armies of the West?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question also, Mr. President.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the objection be sustained.

By General BUELL:

Question. Have you ever seen published in any newspaper a report of a public reception given to Colonel Turchin, at which in a speech he animadverted in terms of censure upon the conduct of the commander of the Army of the Ohio, and which was got up for the purpose of commending his conduct about Athens and at which the conduct of the commander of the Army of the Ohio in bringing him to punishment was denounced and received with hisses and groans?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. I should like to hear what the general has to say.

General BUELL. I have nothing to say, sir.

The PRESIDENT. Let the court be cleared.

As General BUELL was about retiring he remarked:

In order to show that I am not asking these questions simply at random and for the purpose of occupying time I will say that which I have expressed before, that I am bringing this matter forward to show what influences were brought to bear upon the army to produce demoralization if it could be produced by any means on earth.

The court was cleared. On being reopened it was announced that the objection was sustained.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. What independent commands have you held since you have been in the service, colonel, and what were the specific duties attached to them ?

First, the command of my own regiment. Then I was in command at Lexington, Ky., I think a month, with my own regiment. I was afterward at Rolling Fork, I think, for two or three weeks. I was next in command at Lebanon, Tenn., with my own regiment and a portion of the Seventh or Ninth (I forget which) Pennsylvania Cavalry. Subsequently I was in command at Pulaski, Tenn., with my own regiment, a large portion of the First Kentucky Cavalry, and a section of the First Kentucky Artillery. None of these commands can be said to be independent. I was always subject to the orders of my superior officers. This is, however, while I have been doing detached duty from my division. My regiment was not assigned to a division until, I think, about July last, when it was assigned to the Fourth and exchanged for the Seventeenth Kentucky.

Question. Is not McMinnville naturally a strong position, looking toward an enemy approaching from the Sequatchie Valley ?

I should not call it a strong position ; it has no natural defenses. It is overlooked by the knobs of the mountains, which lie on the east and within easy range of artillery. It is otherwise surrounded by an open country and accessible at almost any point, and I know that the commander of my division expressed great concern while there that the whole division would be gobbled up. The creek or river which runs near the town would be no defense, for the two reasons it is too near the town, and secondly you can cross it at almost any point. It would not retard the progress of troops at any point who wanted to make a dash over it.

Question. Do I understand from that answer that there is no position near and covering McMinnville from an approaching enemy coming from the Sequatchie Valley that is not naturally a strong position ?

There are places where an army could be intrenched near McMinnville, but one of the great elements of strength—that is, sufficient supplies—would be wanting, and I therefore consider McMinnville to be a weak point in the general acceptance of the term.

Question. I understand you, then, that lacking supplies it is a weak point, but with supplies it is a strong position ?

No, sir ; I would not call it a strong position even with supplies, but an army might be intrenched near McMinnville so as to resist an assault of an equal force. I do not know how accessible the mountains are that look down upon McMinnville from a personal survey. I understand there is a road leading up the mountain from McMinnville, but a difficult road to pass. If an army were intrenched upon that mountain, with sufficient supplies to hold it, it would be in a very strong position. There are hills and a hilly country toward Woodbury, on the Murfreesborough road, where an army could intrench itself and make a stout resistance. There is, however, a scarcity of water, which would make that point objectionable. If intrenched on the knob of which I have spoken it might be supplied with water from the creek or river which runs at the base of it.

Question. How would you regard the opinion of such an officer as Major-General Thomas on that subject ?

I would most certainly defer to his opinion.

Question. Do you not regard murder, rape, and plunder as the violation of a policy rather than a policy itself ?

Most certainly I do. The practice of murder and rape could not be the furtherance of a policy, because the law expressly forbids them and affixes a penalty for them. To plunder an enemy may be considered as furthering a policy, but which I conceive to be a very bad policy ; not so much on the enemy's account as because of its demoralizing effects upon the force that is permitted to plunder.

Question. Do you know of any policy inaugurated in this war which authorizes the plundering of the enemy ?

Not under my construction of it, sir ; but I know that plundering has been justified by officers as high or higher in command than myself, in pursuing a policy promulgated by General Pope in Virginia I thought to have been sanctioned by the administration.

Question. Please confine yourself to the question.

That is answering it fully. My view of it is that I do not think it authorized me to plunder anybody.

Question. What do you understand, then, to be the difference between what is known as a "conciliatory policy" and a "vigorous war policy"?

In answering that I must give the opinion of others.

Question. I ask you for your own, colonel.

In order fully to explain my construction of the two policies, a vigorous war policy, as generally understood in the army to which I have been attached, means the adoption of all means and measures not only to crush out the rebellion but to punish indiscriminately all persons who live in a rebellious territory. A conciliatory policy, as I understand it, means a vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebels in arms, an entire respect for the civil rights of those not in arms, and protection to the loyal and innocent.

Question. Is not that difference simply this: that in what is called a vigorous war policy the man in arms, or sympathizing or giving aid and comfort in any way to the rebellion organized against his Government, is considered to have no rights that that Government is bound to respect; while a conciliatory policy recognizes the civil rights of people who openly sympathize and give aid and comfort to the enemy but are not in arms?

No, sir; as I understand it a vigorous war policy not only wars upon those in arms and who sympathize and who give aid and comfort to the enemy, but would practice devastation and would destroy the very germ of rebellion. The conciliatory policy does not excuse those who openly sympathize with the rebellion and give it aid and comfort, but it silences the sympathizer or punishes him. Those who give aid and comfort they regard as rebels and treat them accordingly, but it defers to the law to punish by its established rules those who sympathize and who give aid and comfort to the enemy rather than resort to the strong arm of military authority. That is the difference, I understand, between them.

Question. Was or was not the Army of the Ohio demoralized?

Until the Army of the Ohio reached Louisville I should say that it was not demoralized; it certainly was inoculated with some demoralizing tendencies which I tried to explain in my direct examination, but having been detached from that army at Louisville I cannot speak of its subsequent character.

Question. Then the punishment of certain officers for plundering and the publication of certain newspaper articles had no effect upon the army until it reached Louisville?

It had not the effect of destroying the authority of the commander of the army, though that it had some effect there is no question, and that is what I mean by demoralizing tendencies.

Question. I understand you to say that they had an evil tendency, but not far enough to make the officers discontented or to demoralize the men?

I think until we reached Louisville the discontent was confined in a great measure to the officers; the discontent, however, of the officers did not reach to the point of insubordination, but expended itself in grumbling against the commanding general, and which in my opinion operated badly upon the men.

Question. Did you ever read an article in the Cincinnati Enquirer reflecting severely upon General Buell?

General Tyler having objected to the question it was withdrawn.

The witness was then dismissed.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would suggest that it is now a proper time for the introduction of such documentary evidence as General Buell wishes to bring before the Commission on the part of the defense. I have not had the privilege of seeing it, but I have been informed that General Buell has such documentary evidence.

General BUELL. I called the attention of the Commission yesterday to the fact that some of the witnesses whom the judge-advocate has been permitted to call for rebutting evidence are within reach of the Commission now. I mentioned Parson Brownlow and General Wright.

The PRESIDENT. An order has been issued to call Parson Brownlow before the Commission.

General BUELL. General Wright is in attendance.

The PRESIDENT. Do I understand that General Buell is through with his witnesses?

General BUELL. No, sir.

General DANA. I suppose the same rule applies to calling witnesses for the Government as for the defense. If there are witnesses in the vicinity whose presence is not assured to us in future, I suppose we can introduce them in the same way that General Buell introduced witnesses for the defense before the prosecution closed. It certainly would not be right for us to allow witnesses to leave who are now within reach of the court and take their evidence by deposition.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. We have a law authorizing the taking of depositions which we had not at the time referred to. If a witness goes away his deposition can be taken as in a civil case. I can have General Wright and Mr. Brownlow after General Buell gets through with his evidence, and I propose that he should close.

General DANA. How about Colonel Fry?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose that we take his deposition. We cannot get him here; he is not allowed to leave the War Department and we are not permitted to go East. But the documentary evidence of the examination of General Wright I insist should be disposed of before we proceed with rebutting evidence.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate has already proceeded to take the deposition of witnesses who are within half an hour's walk of this room—witnesses that he calls rebutting witnesses. The judge-advocate claims that he did not intend to proceed with rebutting witnesses, when he had actually done so. He now insists upon my closing my case. One of the witnesses is now in Washington. When he comes to the question of bringing witnesses before the court, then he insists upon a certain order of procedure; then one of the Commission also insists upon a certain order of procedure, when he has before instituted a different order.

General TYLER. I am not aware that I have instituted a different order of procedure. There were five of us originally, and if there is any censure due I am willing to bear my part of it.

General BUELL. I speak of Brigadier-General Tyler as a member of the Commission. I do not speak of him personally. And perhaps I am wrong in assuming that he had anything to do with the order that was passed some days back directing that the depositions of certain witnesses should be taken. I may be wrong. I am willing to admit that I was wrong in assuming that he had anything to do with it.

The JUDGE ADVOCATE. I ask nothing that is unreasonable in insisting that General Buell close his case before I introduce rebutting evidence.

General BUELL. I would call the attention of the Commission to another fact. Notwithstanding the order of the Commission that Governor Johnson should be introduced, I have since been notified that the judge-advocate will proceed to take the evidence of Governor Johnson by deposition, before the Judge-Advocate-General at Washington, on Tuesday, March 31. It cannot be pretended that there is any necessity of the public service which keeps him away, and I demand his presence here. If it were not for the implied indorsement which my summons would give to his testimony I would demand him as my own witness.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If the presence of Governor Johnson can be procured I for my part desire him to be summoned.

General BUELL. With reference to the documentary evidence I have to submit, I am not prepared to proceed with it at once. It has, I believe, been all copied, but I have to return it to the officer who had the supervision of that work for correction, and it may take him some little time to do it. It will, however, be completed as speedily as possible.

The PRESIDENT. Can you introduce it by Monday?

General BUELL. No, sir; there is a good deal of it; but it will be proceeded with industriously. The officer has been prevented from examining it by the use of the books by the judge-advocate; making copies, I believe, of what he requires. And I may as well call your attention to the fact that the judge-advocate has not actually submitted his documentary evidence to the Commission. He has designated it, but has not submitted it in due form.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If it is not before the Commission it is the Government's loss. All the documentary evidence I have to offer is before the Commission.

The judge-advocate then proceeded to read the resolutions passed in reference to obtaining the evidence of Governor Johnson.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That I have proceeded to do not only with reference to Governor Johnson, but General Halleck. As to what may be his engagements I know nothing, but I telegraphed to him and got his answer, which is on record; but I know of no process by which I can force Governor Johnson to appear before this Commission.

The PRESIDENT. There was a telegraphic message sent to Washington for the appearance of Governor Johnson; it was done by my own direction; but I do not recollect whether that was for his appearance at Baltimore or here.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. By the recent law authorizing depositions we can obtain Governor Johnson's, and I consider it quite as good to take his deposition as to have the officer present.

General BUELL. I should like to know whether the judge-advocate took any steps to procure the attendance of Governor Johnson. I am notified by the judge-advocate that on the 31st of this month he will proceed to take the deposition of Governor Johnson.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I received a telegram from Judge Holt to the effect that Governor Johnson was in Washington. That was after I had asked for his appearance before the Commission at Baltimore. As we do not go to Baltimore, and as there is no prospect of getting Governor Johnson here that I can see, I proceeded to get his deposition.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate has certainly not complied with the resolution of the Commission. On the contrary, and in spite of it, he has proceeded to take the deposition of Governor Johnson at Washington.

General DANA. I do not see that there is any authority for taking Governor Johnson's deposition unless it is found impossible to get him before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I understood that if Governor Johnson could possibly be brought here his deposition was not to be taken.

General BUELL. The law for taking the depositions of officers is similar to that for taking the depositions of civilians. Heretofore there has been no compulsory process to enforce the attendance of civilians before the military courts; nevertheless it is a rule that the witness shall appear before the Commission if he can be produced at all. It never has been claimed that either party could insist that a deposition would be sufficient. It has been always considered that efforts should be made to bring the witness before the courts, but if that cannot be done, as military courts have no power to compel the attendance of such witnesses, then the law allows that the evidence shall be taken by deposition.

The PRESIDENT. It is in all cases preferable to have the personal attendance of a witness. I am not willing to concede that the gentlemen of Washington City can manage the business of this Commission better than we can ourselves, notwithstanding their claim. Has the judge-advocate written out the questions to be submitted to General Halleck?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have asked him a few questions covering the whole ground.

General BUELL. That is another matter to which I desire to call your attention. I am notified that the judge-advocate will take the deposition of Major-General Halleck on the 31st of this month at Washington City. The judge-advocate had no right to call for the testimony of General Halleck. The rule which the Commission established requires that he should state in writing what he expected to prove by the witness he wished to call.

General TYLER. That certainly is a matter between the Commission and the judge-advocate.

General BUELL. I think, sir, I have something to do with it. It is a rule of the court and it affects me.

General DANA. If a rule is adopted by the court which affects General Buell in any way I think he has a right to see that the rule is impartially applied.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I did not, when calling for witnesses, give the name of General Halleck; he came since this rule was established. I have been notified by the Commission in the presence of General Buell that the presence of General Halleck would be required upon that point. I did not understand General Buell to object to General Halleck. If he does object to him he has only to say so.

The PRESIDENT. Do you not recollect some time ago, when a discussion arose as to whether the Government was through with its witnesses, I gave notice that I insisted upon the testimony of General Halleck and also of the testimony of General Wright? As a member of the Commission it is my judgment that the Government could not possibly be through until the testimony of those gentlemen was taken.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Without recurring to the past at all, if General Buell objects to the evidence of General Halleck or objects to it in the form in which it is proposed to take it, he can do so and the Commission can decide.

General DANA. I consider the examination of General Halleck by a deposition will be very unsatisfactory to the Commission; but if it cannot be got in any other way I suppose it will have to be done, though it will be very unsatisfactory at the best.

The Commission then adjourned to meet on Monday, March 30, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, March 30, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. The members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General D. C. Buell.

General DANA. I move that the Rev. W. G. Brownlow be called before the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. With the exception of Colonel Fry, I decline calling any more witnesses before the Commission on behalf of the Government. Besides, if Mr. Brownlow's testimony comes into the case at all, it would be as rebuttal testimony and after the defense had completed its case.

The court was cleared for deliberation. On being reopened the judge-advocate announced that the motion to call Mr. Brownlow was lost.

General DANA. Has anything more been heard of Governor Johnson?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir.

After informal talk as to the time General Buell would be ready with his documentary evidence—

General TYLER. As the Commission has determined not to call any more witnesses till General Buell is prepared with his documentary evidence, I move to adjourn till to-morrow, March 31, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Adjourned.

CINCINNATI, March 31, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. The members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Since the Commission adjourned I have learned that Mr. Brownlow is for the present residing in this city, and if he is called away he will give me such notice that he may be examined here or will give me his deposition.

There being no further business before the Commission, on motion it adjourned to meet on Wednesday, April 1, at 11 a. m.

CINCINNATI, April 1, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. The members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BUELL. I propose to submit some documentary evidence. It is not all prepared. That which I have to present to the Commission I have arranged in different classes, according to its bearing upon the different questions that seemed to be before you. I propose that Major Wright shall read the copies that have been prepared and that Lieutenant Bush shall refer to the page where the dispatch is to be found and see that it has been correctly copied.

The Commission adjourned to meet April 2, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, April 2, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the President (General Wallace), General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to the Commission to agree to the documentary evidence that General Buell wishes to introduce in order to avoid the delay incidental to reading it before the court. That which was read yesterday, and which occupied the court till 2 o'clock, is, I am informed, about one-sixth of the whole. It therefore strikes me that the better and shorter way of disposing of it will be to agree to its admission.

The PRESIDENT. I have no objection. If the judge-advocate and General Buell can agree upon the matter I have no doubt such agreement will be coincided in by the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have made the same proposition to General Buell that I have submitted to the court, but General Buell does not assent to it. I must say that it occupies unnecessarily, as I consider, a great deal of the time of the Commission to read the evidence in this way, and if the Government is willing to admit it as General Buell submits it, I do not see how this refusal can be persisted in.

The PRESIDENT. The rule of the court can only be suspended by an agreement of parties. If General Buell and yourself were to agree I think it would make the reading unnecessary; but if there is no agreement possible, we must continue the reading.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. An agreement on my part makes an agreement for both parties. When General Buell offers evidence and the Government consents to its admission I cannot see why General Buell should object to it.

The PRESIDENT. General Buell has the advantage in this matter.

General TYLER. I wish to inquire if all the documentary evidence is ready, so that we may go on until it is completed.

General BUELL. It is not all ready, but it will be ready as fast as it can be read to the Commission, unless you should start now and read till the day after to-morrow. I suppose I have enough here to occupy you to-day. I should be glad, as the Commission listen, if each member would make notes of anything of importance as it is read, and I should be glad to have the attention of the Commission called to it. It is the only way in which I can present it, and it will facilitate your study of the matter hereafter.

The PRESIDENT. It has all to be read and studied, as a matter of course; but I do not know but that I, for my part, could use it better by having it before me to carefully read.

General BUELL. I have selected these documents with care, and have taken from the records everything that seemed to me important. I am willing to agree to withhold the reading to the Commission if it will be more agreeable to them. There is no advantage in reading the evidence here unless it will serve the purpose of information to the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. Notwithstanding the hearing of it here, every member of the Commission will feel it his duty to read very carefully each dispatch introduced.

General BUELL. I have no disposition to occupy the time of the Commission, and would submit that unless the reading here serves the purpose of informing them the reading is not necessary, and I am disposed to dispense with it to avoid the useless consumption of time.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to admit as evidence on the part of the defense all the documents General Buell may feel disposed to introduce, and the Commission will have to examine that may be placed before them at their leisure.

General BUELL. I understand it to be the desire of the Commission, then, that I prepare the documentary evidence and submit it to you without reading?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There is only one way of introducing this evidence, namely, that when these documents are introduced I identify them and make a record of them.

The Commission adjourned to meet Saturday, April 4, 1863, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, April 4, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Maj. J. M. WRIGHT (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please, major.

J. M. Wright; major and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers.

Question. Were you on duty with the Army of the Ohio from the time of its departure from Corinth in June last until General Buell was relieved from the command of that army? If so, please state in what position?

I was not on duty the whole of that time. Previous to the evacuation of Corinth I was taken sick, and did not rejoin the army until the 5th of July, at Huntsville, Ala. I was then on duty as assistant adjutant-general at headquarters.

Question. How many divisions of that army marched into North Alabama at that time?

Four divisions marched from Corinth.

Question. Name the divisions, if you please.

Second Division, General McCook; Fourth Division, General Nelson; Fifth Division, General Crittenden; Sixth Division, General Wood.

Question. Refer to the first morning report of that force after the 1st of July, and state what the effective strength of that force was.

I have a memorandum, taken from a Sparta report, which is more correct than these returns (referring to returns before the Commission), which gives the effective strength as 24,638.

Question. What is the date of those reports?

They were taken from those in the early part of July. I have not the reports themselves. They were at Nashville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to the introduction of this testimony without the original reports; I want the reports themselves. The question of General Buell refers to the official returns on the table and the witness proceeds to reply from memoranda which he has obtained from other reports which we have not here.

General BUELL. If there is any discrepancy I shall call upon the witness to explain it.

The WITNESS. From the reports (before the Commission) of the 10th of July the effective strength is 25,215. I see that this includes some cavalry regiments which were not permanently attached to the division. There is one attached to the Fourth Division, the Third Kentucky Cavalry, which is included in the report.

Question. Does that explain the discrepancy between the report that is now before you and the one from which you have made up your memoranda?

The difference between the two statements is 577. The Third Kentucky Cavalry numbered 547. These general consolidated reports have a great many inaccuracies in them, some of which I detected myself and corrected. I found a very important mistake in the report of the 20th of August. Those reports were made up in Nashville, and frequently from reports two and three weeks old. They were made up from reports as they were received, and the commands being in the field, they were irregularly received.

Question. When did the last division which came from Corinth arrive at Athens and what was the strength of that division?

I do not know, sir; I was not in Alabama at the time.

Question. I speak of the last, the First Division, which composed the Army of the Ohio at Corinth—General Thomas' division.

I do not know the date of its arrival. It had about 6,000 men for duty. (Major Wright looking over the consolidated reports.) The First Division is not included in any of these consolidated reports of the general strength of the army. I got my information from a separate report which was received at my office.

Question. What was the date of that report, as well as you remember?

It was in the early part of August. I have forgotten the exact date.

Question. Refer to the last report for August that is before you and state the full effective strength of the force under my command in Tennessee and Kentucky at that date.

According to this report the total force was 45,454 men, and the aggregate strength of the entire force 68,749.

Question. Does that include the present and the absent?

It includes everything, present and absent.

Question. Does that report include the whole force in my command; is there any omission from it?

The First Division is not included.

Question. Is there any other omission from it?

None that I can discover, sir. The effective strength on August 20, as corrected, is 53,309.

Question. What is the error which you have corrected to make this strength as you now give it and how does the error occur?

It is an error in summing up the totals of the divisions.

Question. Add now the effective strength of the division which is omitted in that return and then state what was the whole effective strength of the force under my command.

It was 59,309.

Question. Examine the report carefully and state how that force was distributed; how much of it was on the south side of the Cumberland River, exclusive of the force at Cumberland Gap, and how the other part of the force was distributed; that is, that part not included in the item which I have given you.

South of the Cumberland River the effective strength was 47,537. I would like to call attention to another inaccuracy in this report in representing some of the regiments which were north of the Cumberland as being at Nashville. There are three regiments in the report which I have marked; one of them, the Seventy-first Ohio, Colonel Mason, was at Clarksville, and not in General Buell's command.

Question. The report, then, does not represent with accuracy the force that was on the south side of the Cumberland at that date?

No, sir; it does not. I discovered this inaccuracy when I was looking over the report at Nashville, when I was endeavoring to get more accurate information, which I prepared.

Question. What is that information?

It is relative to the effective strength of the army, which is made up from different reports, which I found to be more correct.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That is what I objected to before. I want the reports from which these estimates of the witness are obtained, as being the better evidence.

Question. What, then, was the actual effective strength on the south side of the river?

As I gave it, 47,537. I deducted the regiments which were not south of the Cumberland, but which were so reported in this report of August 20.

Question. What other inaccuracies do you find in this report?

Those are the only ones I see and the one I referred to first in summing up the totals, which made a very material difference in the report.

Question. Do you mean to say that the information you derived from other reports gives a different strength from that which you have just stated?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question; and now for the third time I ask to have it disposed of. If there are other reports, giving different estimates from those before us, I want them produced; they are the better evidence and I have a right to them.

General BUELL. I do not see that the question calls for any specific information in regard to what is shown in any other reports. The witness has undertaken to make an explanation which I do not understand myself and which I knew nothing of. I have not called for him to state the strength of the Army of the Ohio from any other source than from the reports which are now before the Commission; but I wish him to explain what is the discrepancy which he says exists. If it is found important I shall insist upon calling for the reports myself. I am just as anxious to do so as the judge-advocate himself.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Any information which the witness may have derived from other documents is available to this Commission and is objectionable, because we have a right to the documents themselves. These reports were furnished to the Commission and were received as reliable; now we are told that there are other reports which show a different estimate.

General DANA. I do not see that the witness is precluded from testifying to the strength of the army, which many other witnesses have done. Other witnesses, I suppose, have got their information, both with respect to our own and Bragg's army, from all kinds of sources, and (as far as our own army is concerned) from these reports; and I do not see that any witness should be precluded from giving his testimony as to the effective strength of the army from any reliable source whatever.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the objection should be sustained.

The PRESIDENT. This ruling of the court, general, does not preclude you from introducing the other reports that have been referred to.

General BUELL. I do not think it is a matter of any consequence. I simply desired to understand what the matter was that the witness had to explain.

By General BUELL:

Question. In this statement of the force on the south side of the Cumberland River have you included what is entered under the head of unattached cavalry in this report?

All except the Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Question. In that statement of the force on the south side of the Cumberland have you included all the regiments which are entered under the head of unattached infantry on this report?

No, sir.

Question. How many regiments have you omitted?

Three regiments were omitted. I see by glancing at it again another should be omitted, Colonel Warner's, the Eighteenth Kentucky, I think, which was also in Kentucky.

Question. What further change would that make in your statement as to the force on the south side of the river?

It would make a difference of 733, making the entire strength 46,504.

Question. What was the force at Cumberland Gap?

Seven thousand six hundred and two.

Question. How was the balance of the force employed that was not included in these two items?

It was in Kentucky, a portion of it, guarding the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. I do not know the exact disposition of the remainder, but it was posted throughout Kentucky.

Question. Does the form which is used for these official reports show the actual effective strength of the troops in the ranks?

No, sir.

Question. What does it include?

It shows the entire number for duty; it includes the extra and special duty men.

Question. When did the two divisions arrive which came from Corinth; I mean the two divisions that came from the Army of the Mississippi?

The first, General Mitchell's, arrived between the 1st and 3d of September, I believe, while we were at Murfreesborough. The other, General Paine's division, came into Nashville after we left there; it must have been after the 11th of September.

Question. What was the date of the arrival of the headquarters of the army at Bowling Green on its march to Kentucky?

We arrived at 6 o'clock on the morning of the 14th of September.

Question. How many divisions of the army were there at that time and whose divisions were they?

Two divisions were there; General Rousseau's and General Wood's.

Question. What divisions were yet in the rear?

General Ammen's, General Crittenden's, and General McCook's.

Question. Is that all?

General Mitchell's had marched from Nashville, I presume, as it overtook us at Bowling Green.

Question. Do you know when General Mitchell's division arrived at Bowling Green?

I do not know the exact date; it was either on the 15th or 16th of September.

Question. Do you know the date of the first attack on Munfordville?

It was on Sunday, the 14th of September, I think.

Question. When did the army march from Bowling Green north?

Most of it marched on the 16th of September.

Question. When did it reach Munfordville?

It was either on Sunday or Monday, the 21st or 22d of September; I do not recollect which.

Question. Had General Thomas' division arrived at Bowling Green when the army marched?

It had not arrived there when General Buell's headquarters moved on the morning of the 17th of September. I mean by that that I do not know whether they had arrived when the rear of the army left there.

Question. On what day of the march did the headquarters leave Nashville?

On the 11th of September.

Question. Did any division of the army leave at that time?

I think that General McCook's and General Ammen's left on the same day. General McCook's, I am certain, marched on that day. We overtook it at Edgefield Junction.

Question. How many days was it, then, from the time that division left until it arrived at Munfordville?

I am not certain, but I think it was ten days.

Question. What is the distance from Nashville to Munfordville?

I think it is 80 miles, according to the map.

Question. Is that the map prepared for the information of the Commission?

It is the one the judge-advocate called my attention to as such. It is probable I made a mistake in running over the distances on the map. From the position in which it hangs on the wall, I am unable to see the distances marked distinctly. By Lloyd's map the distance is 94 miles.

Question. What was the strength with which the army marched from Louisville after the accession of the new regiments that we had there?

The army which marched on Perryville was about 58,000. I cannot give the exact numbers, as I have no official reports. No official reports were ever sent to headquarters at that time. Previous to our leaving Louisville I called upon the corps commanders and they in the same manner called upon their division commanders for returns of their strength, but no official returns were made on the forms furnished for that purpose. So that we only arrived at a proximate estimate of the entire strength. The information asked for was sent afterward by the corps commanders in the form of letters.

Question. Can you produce those letters?

They are probably at Nashville, in the office there. They were filed with other papers that were left in General Rosecrans' office.

Question. Does that include the division of General Sill?

No, sir.

Question. Does it include the division of General Dumont?

No, sir; as they did not march from Louisville with the army toward Perryville.

Question. What would be the strength of General Sill's division?

It was between 8,000 and 9,000 strong.

Question. Would that be an average of the strength of all the divisions of the army?

No, sir; the Second Division was the largest, unless it was General Dumont's division, which may have been a little larger than that, which was composed entirely of the new regiments, which were full.

Question. How many regiments were there in General Dumont's division?

Fifteen regiments, if I remember correctly.

Question. Are you positive about that?

No, sir; I am not. My recollection fails me in regard to that division, as I never had any reports of it, and I merely remember from the order first organizing it.

Question. Were the new divisions organized with fifteen regiments?

The organization of the Tenth Division, General Jackson's, was not complete, but if I remember aright General Dumont's division was more complete in its organization. I know it was larger.

Question. How would this estimated strength of the army at the time it was at Louisville compare with its probable strength at Perryville, say about the 8th of October? If you know of any discrepancy explain the cause of it.

Fifty-eight thousand is the number which we had represented on paper on leaving Louisville. I am confident it was much larger than the number we had at Perryville, as there was a great deal of straggling from Louisville to Perryville. A great many of the regiments broke down and many men were left behind. The great number of stragglers from the new regiments, from their breaking down, was remarked upon throughout the army.

Question. Did you carry any instructions on the 8th of October for re-enforcing the left corps? If so, state when you received them, what they were, and how they were executed.

I did carry instructions to General McCook, commanding the left corps. About half past 4 in the afternoon we broke up our camp, when I received orders from Colonel Fry to prepare an orderly to carry orders to General McCook. He then told me that I had better go myself, and give the orders to General Gilbert, commanding the center corps, to send two brigades to re-enforce General McCook on the left. I rode forward and met General Gilbert about 2 miles in advance, and delivered him the order to send these re-enforcements to General McCook, when he told me that he had already sent one brigade and a battery. He told me to take any brigade I wished, and showed great willingness to send re-enforcements to General McCook. I told him I would only take one. I then went forward to General Schoepf, who was probably 300 yards in advance of General Gilbert. He had two brigades with him, the Third Brigade of his division being in reserve near General Buell's headquarters. When I met General Schoepf his troops were in motion, but moving very slowly through a corn field. He was riding along in the rear near his advance brigade. I think they were formed in two lines as they moved forward. I told him to move one of his brigades forward, and he designated General Steedman's, which was, I think, the larger of his two brigades. I then told him I would ride forward, and tell General McCook that they were coming and find the direction. There was an interval of some distance between General McCook's line and that of General Gilbert, and in this interval, though not entirely covering it, was Captain Gay's cavalry, and I tried to find from them the direction of General McCook's command; but no one knew where he was or could tell, or could tell me which direction I should take. I afterward found an ambulance train, which I followed for some distance, when we were met by an orderly, who turned them in another direction. He said he had just come from General McCook with orders to hurry them up. I told the surgeon in charge of the trains that I thought he was going in a wrong direction. At that time I heard no musketry firing. The road I was following led me to the rear of the right of General McCook's command. As I approached General McCook's line I met one of his staff officers half a mile in the rear, and I inquired where General McCook was; he said he had not seen him for two hours; he said he had been placed there to stop the stragglers. He spoke of the great numbers of stragglers there were; he also said that we had got the worst of it in the fight. As I rode up this line I met a battery about 300 yards in the rear of the line occupied by McCook's command. The captain of the battery rode forward to meet me and told me that the position of the battery marked the point to which the line had been driven back, but by the arrival of this new brigade they had been enabled to recover the intervening ground. This was, I presume, about 5 o'clock. I met General McCook immediately in rear of his line, which was about the center of the Third Division, which was on his right. I told him that re-enforcements were coming. I also told him that the general desired me to ask him how he was doing and whether the re-enforcements coming would be sufficient. He said that he had been driven back, but that he was now recovering his ground and was doing very well. I asked him how his new troops had done, and he said splendidly. I thought, however, he replied to the question without thinking what I had asked him. He may have misunderstood me, for his Tenth Division, composed of new troops, had been driven back.

I left him for about fifteen minutes to write a note to Colonel Fry, and had just returned to where General McCook was when Colonel Steedman rode up. As he came up General McCook turned to me and said, "Here come the Pea Ridge men; tell the general I am all right now." As I was about leaving him I asked him if he wanted any more re-enforcements; he first said no, but when I was on the point of leaving he recalled me and said he did not know but he might want more, as he did not know what might occur. I told him if he wished for more to send to General Gilbert, who would send him any re-enforcements he might ask for or that he could spare. I went back by the same road that I came by, and found Colonel Walker's brigade, of the First Division, near the end of it. I told him to form across this road, so that any one coming from General McCook would meet him. This was the remaining brigade of General Schoepf's division. I did not see him, though I searched for him to give him orders in regard to re-enforcements. I then rode back to General Gilbert, and told him where I had posted this brigade, and to send forward any re-enforcements he could spare, if General McCook wanted them. I left General McCook at sundown, about half past 5 o'clock (the sun set at 5.32 p. m. that day). I rode back at a gallop to where I had left General Buell, and in not more than ten or fifteen minutes after I arrived Colonel Fry wrote an order and sent it back to General McCook by an orderly I had taken up with me in the afternoon. I told the orderly to go by the exact road I had taken, and I found afterward that he had gone by that road to the exact place where I had left McCook's force probably not half an hour before. The orderly rode right into the midst of a rebel regiment and was captured. Colonel Walker's brigade was not called upon to go over to General McCook's assistance, so I presume he did not send for re-enforcements.

Question. Do you know what order that orderly took to General McCook?

No, sir; I did not see it. I thought it was to hold his ground that night and be ready to renew the fight in the morning.

Question. Do you know what time information was received at headquarters that a battle was in progress on the left and that General McCook required re-enforcements, and how long was it before you started with the order for the re-enforcements?

I did not see the officer who came over to ask for re-enforcements, but Colonel Fry told me as he sent me off that an officer had just left them.

Question. What were the indications at headquarters that a battle was raging at that time?

No musketry firing could be heard, but toward noon and during the afternoon we heard artillery, but supposed it was in front; and I remember asking Colonel Fry if we were not going forward, and he replied that it was merely some artillery firing in front to hold the water that we had secured the previous night by sending forward a brigade. When I left General Buell to carry the order for re-enforcements to General Gilbert I had no idea that a battle was being fought, and did not know till I reached General McCook that one was in progress. During the time I was with General McCook his troops were advancing. I remember this distinctly, because as I was sitting on a log writing a note to Colonel Fry a battery came up and got into position immediately in front of us. I remember standing and looking at them for a few minutes as they were firing. They advanced their guns several paces by hand on the ridge from which they were firing and the troops on either side of the battery moved forward at the same time. General McCook afterward told me that this was the hottest part of the fight, and my impression was, as I told General Buell when I got back, that we were whipping the enemy.

Question. Do I understand you that subsequent to this the enemy actually occupied the ground you were on when you were with General McCook?

No, sir; I do not suppose that they did occupy that ground, as the point to which they had been driven back was fully 300 yards in rear of the line that our troops then occupied.

Question. Did you not state in your answer to a previous question that an orderly from headquarters was captured on this ground where you saw General McCook and where the advance was resumed?

Yes, sir; but that was after dark. The line had been driven back once before, but recovered their ground by the assistance of the brigade sent to them by General Gilbert. After dark they had been driven back again, and the orderly who went over to this place where General McCook was at sundown was captured.

Question. How, then, do you understand the previous question? Your answers, you observe, do not accord.

I supposed that the question had some connection with the fact that they were driven back some time in the afternoon previous to my arrival. The enemy did occupy that ground after dark and held it.

Question. Did you go to General McCook's corps on the morning of the 9th with any instructions? If so, please state what the object of your mission was and what you saw.

I did not carry any instructions to General McCook, though I was ordered to go forward by Colonel Fry to learn the positions occupied by McCook's command and see how they had progressed in issuing rations and in getting ready to advance. I left our headquarters about 8 o'clock and found General McCook near the Springfield and Perryville road. I told him what I had been sent forward for, and tried to get some information from him, but failed. He did not tell me anything about his troops. I then asked him where the Tenth Division was, but he did not tell me. I found them afterward on the left and to the rear of the other troops. His troops were formed in two lines. I think the intention was to have one regiment from each brigade in the second line, though it was not carried out through his entire line. The first brigade I found was Colonel Harris', Third Division. He told me he was on the extreme right and that there was nothing beyond him. Afterward I found Colonel Starkweather's brigade, of the same division, on his right. They gave me no information of the enemy, though I inquired of them. They were both formed on the skirt of some timber, looking out upon an open space several hundred yards across, toward the Mackville road. At this time General McCook's line was formed almost parallel to the Mackville road—the night before they had been almost perpendicular to it—so that in falling back the left had swept round and the right moved a very little to the rear. His entire force had moved to the right so as to connect with General Gilbert's corps. No one I saw knew anything about the enemy, though Colonel Starkweather told me that there had been large fires on the edge of the wood, probably not more than one-third of a mile from him, and that he supposed the enemy had bivouacked there. I asked him if he had seen any one moving about these fires during the night, but he had not observed any one there, and did not know whether the enemy had gone or not. The only one from whom I obtained any information was Captain Wickliffe. He told me that some guns of Parsons' battery which had been captured the day before were several hundred yards in advance, and if a brigade was advanced they could bring them in. I looked for General Rousseau and found him asleep. I awoke him and told him about these guns. He referred me to General McCook. I went in search of him, and told him that by advancing a brigade he could get these guns again; that a less force might attract the notice of small bodies of the enemy's cavalry who were moving about upon this open space in front of this line. General McCook called an aide, but I do not think he gave him any orders. I do not remember what he said to him. I told him it would be well to have another brigade to support this. He then said he would not send any. Afterward Lieutenant Parsons went out with, I think, Captain Wickliffe and drew in these guns without being molested. There were, I believe, three or four guns, though I did not see them. I tried to find out whether rations had been issued to the command or not, but no one could tell me. I went from regiment to regiment and found that some had received them and others had not, but no officer from any one's staff could tell me anything about it.

General Buell having finished his examination-in-chief, the Commission adjourned to meet on Monday, April 6, 1863, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, April 6, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Major WRIGHT'S examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Take up the report for the 1st of September* and state, if you please, what the whole effective force was, according to that report, including the First Division, which does not appear on that report.

* Not found.

This report is incorrect.

Question. Point out the error and explain it, if you can.

The report gives the total effective strength as 52,526. There is an error in summing up the totals of the divisions; it should be 47,711. (Major Wright, continuing the examination of the report.) I am mistaken; it is right as it stands in the report. I did not include the regiments which were in Kentucky. Including the First Division there are 53,526.

Question. Now see what effective force there was on the south of the Cumberland River at that date.

Forty-seven thousand six hundred and fifty-seven.

Question. Do those reports show the actual strength at the date of the report?

These consolidated reports were made up from the reports of the division commanders, which were forwarded as regularly as possible but were received in Nashville very irregularly. Sometimes the reports were two or three weeks old from which these reports were made up.

Question. In your statement of the effective force south of the Cumberland have you deducted the regiments which on that report are reported as belonging to Nashville when in reality they were not there?

I have deducted them.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Who was in command of the First Division; and can you explain why that was not included in these reports; and from what did you make up the number to be 6,000?

When General Thomas was put in command of the Army of the Mississippi, in front of Corinth, his division (the first which he commanded) went with him, and did not rejoin the Army of the Ohio until it entered North Alabama. This is the reason it does not appear in these reports. They either joined subsequent to the dates of most of these reports or his reports had not probably been received at Nashville. I said on Saturday that I had no report of General Thomas' division. I got its strength from reports at Nashville, and said its effective strength was about 6,000.

Question. Had Brigadier-General Schoepf the command of a division at that time?

No, sir; he was commanding a brigade of the First Division.

Question. Where were the two divisions that joined you subsequently from Grant's army on the 1st of September, 1862?

General Mitchell's division was near Murfreesborough, where they joined us. Paine's division was marched directly to Nashville. I do not know where it was on the 1st of September.

Question. What time did it reach Nashville?

I do not know the exact date; I think, however, it was after we left there.

Question. What was the number of these two divisions?

I never saw any official report of the strength of these divisions. General Mitchell told me on his arrival at Murfreesborough that he had about 5,000 men. The other division, I suppose, numbered about the same.

Question. At the date at which you give the effective force south of the Cumberland what force was there between Nashville and Bowling Green and at Bowling Green?

The reports of the troops at Nashville and north of the Cumberland were all sent to the office at Nashville and never came into my hands, and I never saw them. I remember, however, from dispatches I have read, that Colonel Bruce had, I think he said, 500 or 600 men at Bowling Green; probably not so many as that. I know that on the 20th of August he had not that number; probably not more than 450.

Question. Have you not included the troops at Nashville in your estimate of the forces north of the Cumberland?

Yes, sir.

Question. From what did you make it up?

I made it up from these reports before me, which include the whole command. These reports are tri-monthly reports of the whole command, which were forwarded to Washington. They were not sent down into the field at all. One was kept on file at the office in Nashville and the other was sent to Washington.

Question. Do these reports show upon their face where the troops were located?

These I believe do not. It is the intention, however, in the form in which they are furnished, that they should do so.

Question. Between what dates did the Army of the Ohio leave Nashville when it fell back to Bowling Green?

The troops moved forward from Nashville between the 5th and 11th of September.

Question. At what time did they arrive at Bowling Green?

The divisions arrived at Bowling Green successively. General Buell's headquarters arrived on the morning of the 14th; at that date two divisions had arrived, I think; two others had been there a day or two.

Question. What two divisions did you find there and what two divisions arrived there on the 14th?

Rousseau's and Wood's divisions were already there. General Ammen's and General Crittenden's divisions arrived that day.

Question. What time did General Wood's and General Rousseau's divisions arrive there?

I do not know the exact date; they preceded us by but a few days.

Question. At what time did McCook's division arrive there?

I think they came very near Bowling Green on the night of the 14th.

Question. Between what dates did the Army of the Ohio reach Munfordville?

I think it must have been between the 20th and 23d of September. The divisions arrived there nearly together, as they had taken up positions in front of Munfordville as they approached it, in anticipation, as I suppose, of a fight.

Question. What was the strength of the Army of the Ohio that marched into Louisville?

I have no means of giving the exact number, though in round numbers it was about 45,000 strong.

Question. Are not the returns made of new troops, when ordered into the field immediately, very unreliable, from the fact that many officers make no return at all, and those above them send in what they can get, if they give any report whatever?

I do not think they are reliable; as a general thing I think they overestimated the strength, from the fact that they took no report of the alterations occurring from day to day.

Question. Would they not rather underestimate them, or would they not in making up the force from the returns make an underestimate of that force, from the fact that many officers make no return at all?

I presume where officers do not make a return the strength is taken by the higher authorities from the average of the other regiments. The reason why they overestimate their strength is that they take no report of the alterations that occur, and in the new regiments more frequently than in the old ones. The officers of the new regiments do not fully appreciate the importance of having accurate reports, and frequently, to save time and trouble, would merely make a copy of their old report from day to day.

Question. Did not the difficulty with the new troops that you received at Louisville originate from the fact that many companies and some regiments made no report at all, neither old nor new?

I do not know what difficulty you refer to.

Question. In estimating the number of new troops you received at Louisville.

My understanding was that the authorities at Louisville had received reports from most of the new regiments. I was told by the general commanding that army very confidently what the strength of the troops was. I got no reports from them, because as soon as we moved into the field we were ordered to move light; that is, to leave all the unnecessary baggage; and many of the regiments left all their papers too. They did afterward join us at Lebanon. The troops had moved very rapidly in marching from Louisville, and could not carry all of their baggage, or even all of their office furniture and desks; indeed, after leaving Louisville no one had time to make up a report, as they were almost constantly on the march.

Question. What do you estimate the force under General Buell at subsequent to the battle of Perryville, including General Sill's and General Dumont's divisions?

General Dumont's division did not join at all. I think with the addition of General Sill's division it was not over 59,000 men. The army with which we marched from Louisville was estimated at 58,000. As I said, the new troops broke down very rapidly and fell out. There were a great many stragglers from the new regiments, and after the battle I do not think there were more than 50,000 of the army which appeared in front of Perryville. General Sill's division numbered between 8,000 and 9,000.

Question. You estimate the stragglers, then, at something like 16,000?

There were 58,000 men marched from Louisville, as I represented on paper; after the battle I supposed there were 50,000. There were several thousands killed, wounded, and missing at the battle of Perryville. I do not know how 16,000 stragglers are to be accounted for.

Question. I understand you to include Sill's division?

I spoke of the army that appeared before Perryville.

Question. I understood you to say that the explanation given you by Colonel Fry of the cannonading on the front on the morning of the 8th was that it was guarding the water that had been secured by our troops; is that correct?

On the night before the battle of Perryville Captain Gay, who had the advance with his cavalry, advanced to this water and held it until some time after dark. General Gilbert was ordered to throw forward a brigade at 2 o'clock in the morning to hold that water; it went, and the next morning the enemy made some demonstrations in front as if to recover the ground occupied by this brigade, and they commenced cannonading with a couple of batteries they had with them. Colonel Fry merely expressed his opinion on the subject when I referred to it. I asked if we were going to the front at that time—I presume it was not later than 12 o'clock then—and he said it was merely cannonading in front to hold the water we had secured in the morning. Captain Gay had been on this front, I think, but at the time this brigade was advanced his pickets were occupying it; his main body was farther back.

Question. Was it because of this explanation from Colonel Fry that you did not know that a battle was in progress until you saw General McCook?

No, sir; I heard no indications of the battle. I merely spoke to Colonel Fry in reference to the matter because I supposed he would have some information of what they were doing in front and why they were firing at intervals all the morning.

Question. Do I understand you that that firing of artillery was not unusual?

Do you mean the firing at different times during the morning?

Question. Yes, sir.

They very frequently had skirmishes in which a small number of pieces of artillery were engaged. We had been skirmishing all the afternoon before the battle.

Question. Was there no difference between the sound of the firing of these skirmishes and that of the 8th?

I remarked no difference between the sound. I only noticed it because it was continued longer. I do not think I paid any attention to it until toward the afternoon, when I remarked that it had been continued some time, and asked Colonel Fry what it was and what they were doing.

Question. Did you hear General Buell say that that was a waste of ammunition and should be stopped?

I do not think I heard him say so. I do not think I was near enough to General Buell that morning to hear him speak. I was busy attending to my own business. This was possibly the reason I did not inquire sooner what the noise was about.

Question. Did you not know that the enemy was in force at Perryville and that a fight at that place was anticipated?

I had no positive information of it. My understanding was that the enemy were not in force, and although I did not see the orders sent to the corps commanders I understood that they were ordered to approach to a convenient distance that day, and I supposed that we were to attack them on the following morning.

Question. And yet the cannonading in that direction caused no remark at headquarters?

It caused no remark, because the brigade was ordered to hold this water, which was very essential to us, as we had been without water, and it was absolutely necessary to our troops.

Question. At what hour in the afternoon was it that the officer arrived there demanding re-enforcements for General McCook?

I did not see the officer. As I was starting Colonel Fry told me that an officer had just been there; that was probably 4.30 in the afternoon that I started.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, I was instructed by the Commission to inquire into the facts relative to Captain Gay's being placed in command of a brigade. I was under the impression that I could get those facts from General Wright, but I find he knows nothing about it. I suppose Major Wright could give us some light upon the subject, and I would suggest that the Commission ask the necessary questions.

General BUELL. I have no objection to the judge-advocate asking the questions.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You will please state what you know of Captain Gay being put in command of a brigade.

General BUELL. I do not know that Major Wright knows anything about it, but I would like to ask him such questions, that his testimony may be clear upon this point.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have no objection.

The WITNESS. When we arrived in Louisville we found Captain Gay in command of a brigade. I was told that he had been recommended as brigadier-general and was expecting his appointment; that the colonels of the regiments which he commanded had yielded in expectation of his being made a brigadier-general. When we started from Louisville his appointment had not been made, but no objection was offered to his commanding the brigade. I heard one of his colonels say that he deemed him better qualified than himself. No difficulty arose in regard to this matter till the campaign was over and we were marching back to Louisville. As long as we were in the presence of the enemy the officers of the command never objected to his commanding the brigade, but after they got back to Lebanon I believe they did offer some objection to it, and he was removed for that reason.

By General DANA:

Question. Do you know whether Colonel Milliken, of the First Ohio Cavalry, gave his consent to being under the command of Captain Gay?

I do not know whether he objected to it or not. When we were at Lebanon he had been sent off to Munfordville with a separate command. If he had objected he was, I presume, relieved from duty under Captain Gay.

Question. Do you know by whose authority Captain Gay was first placed in command of the brigade at Louisville?

I always supposed it was by General Wright's authority; but I do not know.

Question. Do you know anything of the circumstances of Capt. C. C. Gilbert being placed upon duty as major-general in command of an army corps?

Previous to our arrival at Louisville I remember seeing one or two dispatches which were signed "C. C. Gilbert, major-general, commanding." When we arrived at Louisville, though he had then been superseded by General Nelson, he had been previously in command of the Army of Kentucky as major-general. He wore the uniform of a major-general, and in the reorganization he was made one of the corps commanders. Before the death of General Nelson he was left in charge of Louisville, and being next in rank he was placed in command at Louisville. When General Nelson was killed he was given the command of one of the corps. I always supposed he was a major-general until some circumstances arose and I was directed to call upon him for his commission and the date of his appointment, and it was found that he had been appointed a major-general by General Wright, subject to the confirmation of the President. He was then called upon for the date of his commission as brigadier-general, which was found to be September 25. We were then marched back to Lebanon, and a few days after he was relieved from the command of his corps—not more than three or four days afterward. I think in the order relieving him from the command of his corps and assigning him to a new command, which included the troops on the line of railroad, he was styled brigadier-general. I did not hear General Buell say anything about it, but I remember Colonel Fry expressing his astonishment that he was not a major-general. He told me he supposed he was, as he had worn the uniform and styled himself major-general.

Question. Do you remember the date of General Nelson's death?

I think it was the 30th September.

Question. During the time that General Gilbert was acting as a major-general in command of the Army of Kentucky was he then a captain in the regular service and not a general officer?

I am not positive as to the date of his appointment as a brigadier-general, but I know it was some time in September. I suppose at the time he was in command of the Army of Kentucky he was only a captain in the Regular Army.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Was he captain of an infantry regiment or in the quartermaster's department?

He was captain of an infantry regiment.

By General DANA:

Question. On the 8th of October did you receive from General Gilbert any message directed to General Buell? If so, what was it and did you deliver it?

As I came back from General McCook I met General Gilbert and stopped to speak to him for a moment. He spoke of a fight which was going on on the left of General McCook. There was a battery which we could see firing across in reply to one of General McCook's batteries, and he told me it was evident the enemy were massing their troops against McCook's, and he said "Thomas is the man that ought to be pushed forward." I told him that an officer had already been sent to push General Thomas' troops forward, and he said he doubted if they would get there in time or some remark to the same effect. This was just after sundown.

Question. To whose corps did Dumont's division belong and where was his division during the battle of Perryville?

It belonged to no corps; it was an unattached division and was in Frankfort.

Question. Where and at what date did General Sill join the Army of the Ohio after the battle of Perryville?

He joined us just beyond Perryville, on the 10th, I think.

Question. By how many regiments was the Army of the Ohio re-enforced at Louisville?

There were about thirty-eight regiments that entered into the organization of the army. There were two or three other regiments, which were unattached, under the command of General Buell, but were left in Kentucky, where they were when this army marched to Nashville.

Question. Does this number of regiments include infantry and cavalry?

There were thirty-eight infantry regiments.

Question. How many cavalry regiments?

I do not know. I did not get any reports and know little about them.

Question. Can you state whether there were many or few?

There were a few, I think.

Question. How many batteries of artillery were added to the army at Louisville?

There were not more than three or four. One of these batteries, Parsons', which belonged to the Tenth Division, was not regularly organized. It was manned by detachments from new infantry regiments.

Question. Would the number of cavalry regiments added to the army at Louisville exceed six?

No, sir.

Question. What in your idea was the maximum strength of the cavalry added to the army at Louisville?

I think there were not more than three regiments.

Question. Do the forty-one regiments of infantry added at Louisville embrace those that were placed in Dumont's and Sill's divisions also?

Yes, sir. Sill's division got no more than other divisions of the army. There was one new regiment attached to each old brigade. General Dumont's division was composed entirely of new regiments, as well as the Tenth, General Jackson's.

Question. What was the average strength of those forty-one regiments?

I suppose from the fact of the whole number of troops being 32,000 that they were about 800. General Nelson told me that his command was 32,000 strong.

Question. Would 32,000 men for the effective force of forty-one new regiments be a large or a small estimate?

I think that under the circumstances it was a large estimate. These troops were hurried into the field as soon as their organization was sufficiently complete to enable them to be on duty at all.

Question. Do you know whether any of these regiments were of the maximum standard?

I do not know, sir; I never saw a report of any of them.

Question. Do you know anything of any deserters and unwarranted absentees from the Army of the Ohio after its arrival on the Ohio at the mouth of Salt River?

I know that there were a great many absentees, particularly officers; but every precaution was taken at General Buell's headquarters to prevent it and very stringent measures were adopted, but I do not think these orders were fully carried out by brigade and division commanders. I heard that officers were absent with the permission of the brigade commanders. They got across the river by other means than those used by the public (ferry-boats), because there were guards to prevent them.

Question. Have you any means of arriving at an estimate of the number of officers and men absent without leave from the Army of the Ohio on its arrival at Louisville? If so, state the number.

In August there was an order issued from General Buell's headquarters calling attention to the number of absentees, officers and men, and putting it at 14,000.

Question. The question refers to the number of officers and men who absented themselves without leave from the time the army arrived at the mouth of Salt River until its arrival at Louisville—officers and men who were supposed to have gone to their homes without proper authority.

I have no means of ascertaining the number, but I suppose that in nearly every case the officers who went did so with the permission of their colonels, and they of course would not report it, and no reports were made up at that time which would show how many of these officers were absent.

Question. Is it or is it not a notorious fact that the Army of the Ohio during that interval suffered a great diminution of its numbers from this cause, and do you know anything about the facts?

It was not noticeable from the diminution of its numbers as much as from the fact that almost all those who went away without authority were officers and that these officers took advantage of their position to go off without permission and it was well known throughout the States where these officers went that they were absent without permission.

Question. In estimating the strength of the Army of the Ohio on its arrival at Louisville at 45,000 have you made any allowance for these absentees?

The estimate of 45,000 is taken from the report of the strength of the army before it left Nashville; it therefore does not include the absentees. I presume that in the Kentucky regiments there were more absentees when we left Louisville than from other regiments, as I know that one or two regiments raised near Louisville had a great many absentees, some of whom had to be brought in by force. Even after they had been searched for there were a great many still absent.

Question. Taking 45,000 as the number of the troops of the Army of the Ohio that left Nashville and deducting from them the losses from all causes on the march from Nashville to Louisville what would be the number of the old troops of the Army of the Ohio which left Louisville on its march toward Bardstown?

I presume there were about 43,000. On our march from Nashville we left quite a number at different points on the road, at Bowling Green and at other stations where there were hospitals. Many broke down from forced marches. The roads were very dusty, and we had a great many sick who had given out from exhaustion, and these were left behind on our march toward Louisville, and they did not rejoin us in time to march with the army towards Bardstown.

Question. Does this estimate include the old troops of Sill's and Dumont's divisions?

There were no old troops in Dumont's division; it was composed entirely of new regiments. It does include the old troops of Sill's division.

Question. What, then, was the aggregate effective strength of General Buell's army, including General Sill's and General Dumont's divisions, when he left Louisville?

I estimated it at 77,000. It is not more than 75,000. The estimated strength of the different corps averaged 22,000, as near as the corps commanders could make it; that would give the strength of the three corps at 66,000. Dumont's division had about 9,000 (and a few odd hundreds), making up a total of 75,000.

Question. Was the garrison at Munfordville ever embraced in any of the estimates of the strength of the Army of the Ohio at any time after it left Nashville?

No, sir.

By General TYLER:

Question. Were there any additions made to this 75,000 men that could be made available to the army before you reached Perryville by detachments left at Munfordville or at any other point?

No, sir; this estimate included everything.

Question. In your direct testimony you stated that you went to General McCook on the morning of the 9th to inquire whether he had rations, &c., issued to his men and that he would not give you any satisfaction on the point; did he understand that you were sent from headquarters to ascertain those facts?

When I met General McCook I told him that General Buell had sent me to learn the positions of the troops, how he progressed in issuing rations, and to learn what I could of the enemy. I first asked him some questions about his troops; he did not give a satisfactory reply. I asked if he knew anything of the enemy, and all he told me was that his brother, Colonel Dan. McCook, was skirmishing through the woods with them in his front. He said he was issuing rations to his troops. I asked one or two questions and he made some other remark about the skirmishing in his front, and I got on my horse and went to find out for myself what I could. I do not think it was General McCook's intention to avoid giving me information. He told me that he had been up nearly all the night; he was at the time lying on the ground, and he said he was almost worn-out. I think it arose more from that than any desire not to send information to General Buell.

Question. In your estimate of the effective force of the army in these reports submitted to you do you include all reported present, excluding the sick in hospitals, &c.?

The numbers which I gave were the effective strength for duty; the form gives "Present for duty."

Question. What did you do with the "extra-duty" men who were present?

The extra and special duty men are all included in the number reported as fit for duty. I suppose there were 25 or 30 men in each regiment who were on special and extra duty throughout the army.

Question. But those are included in "Present."

Yes, sir; but they are not available for duty as soldiers.

Question. Why are not these men available for duty?

They were detailed as teamsters, clerks, nurses in the hospital, and to perform all other little duties about the regimental camps.

By General DANA:

Question. In the march of the Army of the Ohio from Louisville to Perryville were not troops left at Bardstown, Springfield, or other places to occupy positions before the army reached Perryville? If so, how many?

There was a regiment left at Bardstown. The other points below that, I think, were not occupied.

Question. How many of these men reported as on extra and special duty were there in the whole of the Army of the Ohio at that time?

There were about 4,000.

Question. What would be the whole number to be deducted from the line of battle owing to this item and the detachment at Bardstown?

I should say about 4,400.

By General TYLER:

Question. Do I understand you to say that there were 4,000 men engaged as wagoners and hospital nurses, belonging to the army, that could not have been brought into line of battle?

There were nine divisions, with three brigades each, each brigade having five regiments—one hundred and twenty-two regiments. There was one unattached division which had twelve regiments. The one hundred and thirty-four regiments with 30 men in each regiment would be 4,020; I put it at 4,000. Those men were not available as soldiers; they could not leave their teams, and their service as hospital nurses could not, of course, be dispensed with, and those engaged as clerks never left the trains.

Question. Then one hundred and thirty-four regiments embraced the whole of General Buell's command, including those at Cumberland Gap and everywhere else?

No, sir; it included the three corps and General Dumont's division.

General BUELL. I should like the witness to verify his statement in regard to the arrival of General Sill's division with reference to the time the army marched.

The PRESIDENT. There is no objection, general, to your asking the question.

By General BUELL:

Question. In reference to taking up the march after the battle of Perryville, when did General Sill's division join?

The day after, I think.

Question. Explain what date you understand the question to refer to. The question refers to the time when the army continued its movements after the rebel army, subsequent to the 9th of October.

I answered in reference to our own movements and the movements of our own headquarters.

Question. How long was it before the headquarters went to Harrodsburg that General Sill's division joined?

We started on the morning after the evening of his arrival. I am speaking now from memory, and have nothing by which I can recall the exact time. I am quite certain, now that I reflect, about its not being on the 10th, as we remained in camp one day after the battle of Perryville, on the 9th, and on the 10th we moved forward to a camp beyond Perryville, where General Sill overtook us. I think it was on the 11th that he arrived.

General Buell here introduced the deposition of Captain Morton, which was read before the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. As this closes the evidence for the defense, with the exception of Colonel Fry, I propose to-morrow morning to commence with such rebutting evidence as I have on hand and proceed to a close.

The Commission adjourned to meet on Tuesday, April 7, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Tuesday, April 7, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

A communication from General Buell was read, desiring that the testimony of Lieutenant Fitzhugh might be taken as to the instructions that were sent to Major-General Thomas on the afternoon of the 8th of October.

After discussion it was decided in the affirmative.

Lieut. C. L. FITZHUGH (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and your position in the service of the United States; whether you were on duty with the Army of the Ohio at the battle of Perryville and in what capacity, if you please.

My name is Charles L. Fitzhugh; first lieutenant Fourth Artillery; aide-de-camp to General Buell. I was on duty at the battle of Perryville as an aide-de-camp.

Question. At what time was it first known at headquarters that a battle was raging on the left at Perryville on the 8th of October?

At about a quarter after 4 in the afternoon.

Question. Did you on that occasion carry any instructions to Major-General Thomas. If so, state what they were, whether you delivered them, and any circumstances of interest connected with your visit to General Thomas' headquarters.

One of General McCook's aides-de-camp came to our headquarters and reported the state of affairs on the left about a quarter past 4 in the afternoon. I was immediately ordered to ride over, with a guide who was at headquarters and who belonged on the right, and order an advance on the right at once, and "press the attack on the right"—those were the words of the order—as General McCook had been driven back on the left; also to order a brigade to move at once over to the Springfield road, which was the road we were encamped on. I left our camp about half past 4 with this guide, and we reached the right and found General Thomas out in front at about half past 6, as well as I can judge. It was about an hour after sundown. I gave him the orders. He asked me then if it was intended to advance that night after dark, and I repeated the order and left him to draw his own inference from the order, which was to advance at once. I came back with him to his headquarters, which were half a mile to the rear of the place where we then were, and took tea with him. When I was about to ride home again he told me to tell General Buell that the enemy were in strong force right in his front, and that an advance of 100 yards on his part would bring on an engagement along the whole line; but that he would advance the next morning at the first sound of an action on the left; that he would advance with the first gun; and he told me to ride over and report that to General Buell, which I did. I suppose the ride took me an hour and a half. I reached our camp about half past 9, and reported to General Buell. As I rode out to the front on my way over in the first place I met Brig. Gen. William S. Smith, who I believe commanded the advance division on the right in that corps. He said that the enemy were only a few hundred yards from him, and had thirty pieces of artillery in position right on his front. I told him that they had had work on the left, and he said they would have harder on the right; that all the hard fighting was to be on the right. I reported that also to General Buell when I returned to camp.

General BUELL. I wish, Mr. President, to question the witness with reference to the circumstances of my visit to the camp of the First Division about the 23d of August last.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I shall object, Mr. President, to going into an examination of that.

General BUELL. I will explain more fully the object of this testimony. I expect to show by this evidence the ground for the prejudice which certainly existed subsequently to that time in the minds of certain witnesses who have appeared before this Commission, quite enough prejudice to sway their judgment upon any matter of opinion where my official acts were concerned. The material part of the testimony of these witnesses—if a mere opinion can be considered material in such matters—is made up of opinion. I believe that this prejudice has rendered them incompetent to give a sound, impartial opinion. The evidence may or may not, depending upon the restriction which the Commission places upon it, extend to the motive and the disposition of Brigadier-General Schoepf, recently a member of this Commission. The Commission, however, have ruled out evidence upon that point heretofore. I do not know whether they will admit it now or not.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would like to remark in this connection that so far as any prejudice that might influence these witnesses goes General Buell is precluded from bringing forward anything to impeach them. General Buell in his cross-examination of these witnesses went outside of the examination-in-chief and made them his own. He now proposes to come in with other evidence to attack them before this Commission. He proposes to impeach his own witnesses. So far as General Schoepf is concerned I do not propose to occupy your time at all, but I will merely say that had that investigation gone on it would have shown a very different result from that which the record now implies.

General BUELL. I have no doubt of the propriety and admissibility of any evidence which shall affect the value of testimony that has been given before the Commission. I am satisfied of that without citing any authority. With reference to the motive that has been ascribed to Brigadier-General Schoepf, I challenge the judge-advocate or any other person to pursue that investigation.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the objection should be sustained.

By General TYLER :

Question. Did you hear General McCook's aide make his report; and, if so, to whom?

I did not hear him make his report.

Question. Do you know to whom he reported?

I do not know of my own knowledge whom he reported to, but I suppose he reported to Major-General Buell in person.

Question. Whom did you receive the order from that you carried to General Thomas?

From General Buell.

Question. Was it written or verbal?

It was verbal.

Question. Was it usual to send an important order of that kind by verbal messages through an aide-de-camp?

It was done occasionally when there was great necessity or great hurry?

Question. What time, as near as you can make it, did you receive that verbal order?

About quarter after 4 in the afternoon.

Question. How long after General McCook's aide arrived in your camp?

I suppose while he was still there; immediately on his arrival.

Question. What is the distance from General Buell's camp to the point where you met General Thomas?

I suppose it was about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; as near as I can judge.

Question. Did you consume all the time from a quarter past 4 to half past 6 in accomplishing that $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles?

I stated that I left our camp at about half past 4.

Question. Did you require all the time from half past 4 to half past 6 to accomplish $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles?

I was all that time hunting up the general, and discovered him accidentally. He was not at his own headquarters; he was out in front, and I lighted on him accidentally about the time I stated, which was about two hours after I left our own camp. He was off the road then in the field, and no one on the road knew anything of his whereabouts at all.

Question. How was he engaged at the time you met him?

He had his aide-de-camp and was riding to his own headquarters; at least I suppose so, as he went straight there as I joined him.

Question. Did you receive this verbal order directly from General Buell or from his chief of staff?

I have answered that already, that I received it from General Buell.

Question. Repeat as near as possible the exact phraseology you used in communicating General Buell's order to General Thomas.

I repeat the words of the order exactly, which are: "To press the attack on the right, as General McCook had been driven back on the left, and to send a brigade on the Springfield road at once." I found at the time that I reached there that a brigade was on its way to the Springfield road.

Question. Had any attack been made on the right at that time?

They had had skirmishing on the right; that was all I knew of it.

Question. Did that skirmishing amount to an attack?

I heard it called heavy skirmishing, and that is the name I give it.

Question. How long did you remain at General Thomas' headquarters and what time did you leave there?

I must have staid there three-quarters of an hour, I think. I ate my supper, gave my horse a feed, and then started for home about 8 o'clock perhaps.

Question. Did you suppose the nature of the order you carried to General Thomas was to attack the enemy after dark?

I supposed when he received the order that he would advance at once; that was my own idea. There was a bright moon and it was almost as light as day.

Question. Would you infer from General Thomas' character as a soldier that if he received a positive order and understood the order to be positive to attack the enemy, he would not do it, night or day?

He received the order in the words I stated before. It could be judged whether the order was positive or not. The advance was not made.

Question. Did any conversation take place between you and General Thomas, after he received the order, by which you would infer that he understood the order to attack the enemy to be positive? Repeat any conversation as literally as possible.

I gave him the order at once when I reached him, and told him how long I had been gone from General Buell at his own headquarters; and he asked if the attack was to be made at night. I repeated the order to him at once, and left him to judge whether the advance was to be made at night. I carried him the words of the order right off in a great hurry.

Question. What observation did General Thomas make at the time as to the order?

I do not recollect that he made any observation at all.

Question. What time did you report to General Buell on your return to camp?

I have already stated, about half past 9, I should judge.

Question. Did you report that General Thomas had not obeyed the order?

I did not report in those words. I have already told how I reported.

Question. Have the goodness to repeat it.

He said that the enemy was in strong force on his front and that an advance of 100 yards would bring on an engagement all along the line, and that he would advance in the morning with the first sound of an action on the left; and I was given to understand that he would ride over to our headquarters himself in the course of the night; I so understood, though I do not know how I got the impression; and he did come to our headquarters.

Question. What comments were made by General Buell on the message you delivered to him from General Thomas; did he express any dissatisfaction?

I do not recollect whether he did or not.

General BUELL. I wish, Mr. President, in justice to General Thomas, to explain what interpretation I put upon this order myself. I never anticipated when I gave the order that it would be executed after night; and I think that under the circumstances General Thomas would have been justified in determining according to his own judgment whether it was necessary for him to undertake the execution of the order. If he thought it was impracticable he ought not to have undertaken it. I will add that I was apprehensive that very little could be done so late in the afternoon. I did not know how well General Thomas was prepared for such a movement. I will call your attention, furthermore, to the fact, which is shown upon your record, that owing to the cessation of the fight on the left and the change of the condition of affairs after the order which the witness has testified to was sent to General Thomas written instructions were sent to him at half past 6 o'clock. Those instructions required him to press his command forward as much as possible that night and be prepared to attack at daylight in the morning. I do not pretend to investigate whether he was to blame for not attempting it in some measure, nor do I charge anything upon him. I have not introduced this evidence for the purpose of attaching blame to General Thomas for the non-execution of that order.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose to introduce as a witness this morning a Mr. McElwee, a gentleman from near Chattanooga, who is in possession of some intelligence in reference to the force there previous to and subsequent to the evacuation of Corinth. I wish to ask him a few questions in reference to that. He is in the employ of General Burnside, and is going away to-morrow morning. For that reason I wish to examine him to-day.

General TYLER. Is this the first rebutting evidence that is introduced?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir.

General TYLER. Then it is understood that General Buell is through?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir.

General BUELL. I think I must object to the introduction of this witness. I shall be very glad to have information on that subject, but the quality of information I expect you will derive from this witness can be multiplied to any extent. I doubt very much whether it will tend to enlighten the Commission. It is a subject that the judge-advocate ought to have exhausted before, I think.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion whether the witness should or should not be introduced, it was unanimously decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JAMES B. McELWEE (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and place of residence.

James B. McElwee, residing in Rhea County, East Tennessee.

Question. What distance is that from Chattanooga?

I think it is about 60 miles by land.

Question. State whether you were at Chattanooga or in its neighborhood in the spring or summer of 1862, when the Government forces first threatened it.

I was at Chattanooga when the Government forces were said to be near Bridgeport and they said there was to be a fight there.

Question. State as near as you can at what time that was and what occurred and all you know about it.

I am a bad hand to recollect dates; I cannot give them. It was at the time they had a fight at Bridgeport. I left Chattanooga and went down to Dalton, and part of the rebel force came there that night. My understanding was that they were taking the sick and wounded away. They stopped all the rolling stock on the road; they brought down all the rolling stock that was at Chattanooga and stopped any from going up. My understanding from rebel soldiers and others was that they were going to surrender Chattanooga.

Question. What was the number the rebels had at Chattanooga at that time?

I cannot tell what the number was, but it was not very large.

Question. What do you mean by saying that it was not very large; were there a thousand men?

There were not more than 1,000 or 1,500 men. That is my understanding; I am not positive. The force at Bridgeport retreated back to Chattanooga. I asked some soldiers how many Yankees they saw, and they said they only saw three or four on the other side of the river when they commenced retreating, and before the rebel infantry got across the bridge they turned a car loose and knocked several off into the river.

Question. Had the victory at Bridgeport been followed up what would have been the consequence to Chattanooga?

Why Chattanooga, I think, would have surrendered.

General DANA. I take an objection to that question, that it is not rebutting evidence. If there is anything on the record to show that there has been a fight at Bridgeport I am mistaken.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not recollect in what part of the testimony, though I think it can be found.

The PRESIDENT. It appears to me to be important to fix the date, so that it may be known whether the fight the witness speaks of was on the part of General Mitchell's or General Negley's forces or those of General Buell. I think it will be found by reference to General McCook's testimony that when his advance came to Bridgeport he saw the enemy's pickets, but it makes no mention of a battle; so if this fact occurred it must have had reference to General Negley's or General Mitchel's forces.

General BUELL. If it is admissible I request that he may be permitted to continue.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I wish to fix the date if possible. State in what month this affair that you speak of occurred.

I cannot state the time. I do not think General Buell's forces were up there at that time. I think it was the force under General Mitchel. But I do not know much about the forces save what I heard reported throughout the country.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It will be observed that the documentary evidence introduced on the part of the defense before the Commission takes us back to a period anterior to this affair of General Mitchel's at Chattanooga, for the purpose, I suppose, of giving us as clear a history of all the transactions connected with that campaign as possible, and that can only be effected by taking the events in connection with those that immediately preceded them. Now, it has been held that Chattanooga was a place of so much importance—the complaints from Washington that the Army of the Ohio did not advance with sufficient rapidity for the purpose of taking that place before the enemy could get there and fortify it or strengthen it by re-enforcements is responded to in this documentary evidence that it was a place of so much importance and the facilities for getting there were so great that it made no difference what time they got there; that Chattanooga would be defended to the best of their ability. In that light this evidence is important, because it shows that at that time the rebels made no efforts to defend the place, and that had our forces been pushed on Chattanooga would have been in our possession. I think it might be proper to go on and show what the condition of that place was and what was the character of its fortifications, for if there were any he certainly must have had some knowledge of them.

General DANA. In relation to rebutting evidence, if documentary evidence has been introduced here by the defense, and has not been examined by the Commission, which is irrelevant to the subject we have under consideration, it is only a reason why that much of it should be thrown out, because we do not wish to extend our investigations further than we are ordered, and it is not a reason for us to introduce irrelevant testimony, which is of no importance to us at all.

The PRESIDENT. Allow me to suggest that the court be cleared.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was resolved that the examination of the witness should proceed.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Were you in Chattanooga subsequent to the arrival of Bragg and his forces?

Yes, sir; I was.

Question. State what the condition of that place was as a place of defense. Were there any fortifications? If so, state their extent, how many guns they had, and all you know about it.

I do not know whether they had any fortifications or not; I never heard any one say; nor do I know anything about their guns.

Question. If there had been any fortifications there would you not have known it?

I think I would.

Question. Do I understand you that at the time Bragg arrived there there were no fortifications?

I did not mean to say that. (Mr. McElwee here explained.) I did not understand the question as to whether I was in Chattanooga subsequent to the arrival of Bragg. I was not there.

Question. At what time were you there previous to the arrival of Bragg's forces?

I do not know, sir.

Question. I have no further questions to put to the witness, and under the ruling of the court, as I have elicited nothing, there is no ground on which a cross-examination can be had.

General BUELL. When did you leave your home in East Tennessee, Mr. McElwee?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I shall have to object to this, Mr. President; there is really no evidence before the Commission on which to base a cross-examination. We occupy the position of having no witness at all before us, and General Buell, by going into new matter, will be making this witness his own.

General BUELL. I claim that under the rules of proceeding governing all courts it is my privilege to examine the witness on any subject connected with the pending examination. The position assumed by the judge-advocate that there is nothing to cross-examine upon I cannot admit at all. There is nothing in the question which I have asked to show that it may not be pertinent to a cross-examination.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was unanimously decided that the objection should be sustained.

It was further decided that the witness' whole statement having been excluded with the consent of the judge-advocate there could be no cross-examination by General Buell.

Vote unanimous.

On the opening of the court—

The PRESIDENT. The Commission have decided, general, that as the testimony of the witness is so far immaterial it will be excluded from the evidence, and that therefore there is no ground for cross-examination.

General BUELL. Do I understand the Commission to decide that I have not the privilege of examining a witness except upon questions that are introduced by the judge-advocate?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

General BUELL. I should like to ask whether this ruling is based upon any authority or whether it is arbitrary?

The PRESIDENT. It is based upon a rule of law which applies in all cases of this kind. For instance, the judge-advocate introduces a witness in the way of rebutting testimony; after he has examined in chief you have by the rule of law the right to cross-examine, but you would not have the right to make him your witness originally. The same rule precisely applies to rebutting witnesses as to witnesses originally introduced, and the cross-examination of such witnesses is confined, as a matter of course, to evidence developed in the examination-in-chief.

Rev. W. G. BROWNLOW (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Please state your name, occupation, and place of residence.

William G. Brownlow; Knoxville, Tenn.; editor and publisher of a newspaper for about a quarter of a century.

Question. State what you know of the resources of East Tennessee in reference to the wants of an army and what was the condition of the crops in the summer of 1862.

I could not say anything definite as to the crops of 1862. They put me in jail, and my information was therefore derived from hearsay and from newspapers. From these and from refugees I learn they were not so favorable as in former years. They started me out, before the crops were pitched or planted, on the 3d of March, and I cannot therefore say anything about the crops of 1862 of my own knowledge. The crops were not so good and the laborers not so abundant. The rebels had gone into the Southern army, and the Union men had absconded and broke over the mountains and joined the Federal army. There were not a great many slaves in East Tennessee—never were; the farming was chiefly done by white folks. I would not be surprised if not half the ground was occupied in 1862 that there was in 1861.

Question. State what you know of the resources of East Tennessee in the summer of 1862 as made up from the crops of 1861.

In 1861 I recorded as a journalist, on the authority of my correspondents from the various counties, unusually fine and abundant crops. We hardly ever had such a crop year. The corn was never so abundant; hay, timothy, and clover were abundant; so were oats; and wheat, the great staple of the country, was very fine, and reached an average crop. The rebels were engaged the latter part of the summer and fall and early winter of 1861 in gathering up the corn and wheat. The wheat they ran down to Atlanta, Ga., to the steam-mills. They boasted of salting down half a million of hogs. They said they had depots at Chattanooga, Athens, Sweetwater, Knoxville, and clear up to the Virginia line. Of hog-killing the largest was at Knoxville. We used to look out of our jail window upon the river, where they were killing hogs for weeks together, and as a matter of punishment they forced us to send our buckets and dip up our water below where they threw all their offal and refuse. We begged the officer of the jail to allow us to get our water from above, but he refused us the privilege. The rebels were alarmed at the result of the Fishing Creek fight, and, in expectation of the Federal army, threatened to burn the large stores of meat and grain in Knoxville; at least so they said. It was an abundant country for hogs and corn.

Question. If it had been possible for the army of the Government to seize and hold Chattanooga in the summer of 1862 what reliance could be placed upon East Tennessee for supplies?

That would depend entirely upon the extent of the crop, and I have no knowledge of that except from hearsay and from newspapers. The inhabitants, the owners of farms, were five to one on the side of the Union in the thirty-two counties of East Tennessee, and as long as they had anything they would have contributed it to the Government army. It could have had what there was, but to what extent they could have supplied the army I do not know. I was not there; I was in the North during the whole summer and fall. I was absent for thirteen months.

Question. State what opportunity you had of judging of the effects of the different policies exercised by our Government toward the disaffected districts and places. What, so far as you have observed, is the result of a kind and conciliatory policy?

In the winter and spring I was a good deal in Kentucky and Tennessee, at Murfreesborough and Nashville, and I saw and conversed with gentlemen from all parts of Tennessee—East, West, and Middle—and I consider—that is the impression made upon my mind—that a conciliatory forbearance would not work advantageously for the Union cause. It is proper to qualify that by stating that I am an ultra; that I would have ultra, stringent, measures used against them.

Question. So far as you have observed has not the effect of the policy that makes war upon the rebel in arms and gives the same protection to the man who sympathizes openly with the rebellion that it does to the good citizen been to convince the rebels that it arose rather from our weakness than from our sense of justice?

Yes, sir; this has been the result of my observation. They attribute our forbearance toward them to cowardice and think that we are afraid of them. It disheartens and discourages the Unionists. I heard them complain at Nashville even of Governor Johnson's forbearing and conciliatory course toward the rebels.

Question. Has this amiable policy been practiced by the rebels to any extent?

That is not my experience, sir; just the reverse.

Question. In disaffected districts, occupied first by one army and then another, has not the effect of the two policies, that is, the policy exercised by our Government heretofore and that of the rebels, been to make it much safer for a man to be a rebel sympathizer than to sympathize with the Union?

I have heard a leading and influential Union man assert that. I could not say of my own knowledge how it is. It is a very common remark, however, among the Unionists in Tennessee and Kentucky.

The court then adjourned to meet on Wednesday, April 8, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Wednesday, April 8, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I propose sending the following questions to General Thomas:

"Did Lieutenant Fitzhugh, aide-de-camp on the staff of Major-General Buell, bring you an order on the night of the 8th of October, at Perryville, commanding you to attack the enemy? If so, why was not that order obeyed? Give as nearly as you can the conversation between you and Lieutenant Fitzhugh in reference to that order and its meaning."

General BUELL. I shall make no objection to the question if it is put in the form in which the evidence has presented the matter to the Commission. General Thomas' position was not known to be such that he could instantly attack the enemy when that order was sent to him. The order, as testified to by Lieutenant Fitzhugh, required him to press forward and attack the enemy, or some such phraseology as that. The testimony of Lieutenant Fitzhugh explains that this order was given in the afternoon, and your record shows that General Thomas was not necessarily expected to execute that order after night. As the question now reads it will convey to the mind of General Thomas the impression that it has been asserted in evidence before this Commission that he was ordered to make an attack on the night of the 8th, whereas I have explained that that was not contemplated in the order when I gave it. If the question is amended so as to read "afternoon" instead of night I have no objection to it.

General DANA. I think it would be better for the question to read "afternoon or evening." As it stands at present it conveys the idea of a night attack.

The PRESIDENT. As that order is quoted by Lieutenant Fitzhugh it leaves a clear impression on my mind that General Thomas was ordered to make an attack as soon as he received that order. The words, I believe, were "to advance and press the attack." General Buell's explanation is that he was not expected to make a night attack, but the order, as conveyed by Lieutenant Fitzhugh, without General Buell's explanation, would leave only the impression that he was ordered to advance and press the attack, whether it was night or day. The nature of the order as given by Lieutenant Fitzhugh allowed no discretion to General Thomas that I can see.

General TYLER. It looks very much as if General Thomas was guilty of a disobedience of orders, and the only evidence showing he was not guilty of disobedience is the exculpation or explanation now offered by General Buell. There is no proof before the Commission that General Thomas is not guilty of disobedience of orders, and there is nothing to do away with the testimony of Lieutenant Fitzhugh except it is General Buell's admission.

General BUELL. I have not undertaken to exculpate General Thomas, but I have stated that it was not my expectation when that order was given that it would be executed after night. If General Thomas had seen that the execution of the order was feasible after night, that he could accomplish the object, and that the thing he was ordered to do was desirable and expedient at the time, I should say that he ought to have done it. But if he had considered it impracticable and injudicious I should have blamed him for executing it at that time. It was explained to him that a considerable time had elapsed since the order was given and the circumstances had very materially changed.

The question was then amended to read as follows:

"Did Lieutenant Fitzhugh, aide-de-camp on the staff of Major-General Buell, bring you an order at half past 6 o'clock on the 8th of October at Perryville commanding you to advance on the right at once and press the attack? If so, why was not that order obeyed. Give as nearly as you can the conversation between yourself and Lieutenant Fitzhugh in reference to that order and its meaning."

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the question as amended should be forwarded to Major-General Thomas.

On the opening of the court the following additional question to be forwarded to Major-General Thomas was read:

"How far are you responsible for General Crittenden's corps not being in line on the morning of the 8th of October, and what reason existed, if any, why that corps was not in line at the time ordered by General Buell, on the night of the 7th?"

General BUELL. There was no particular time ordered for General Crittenden's corps to be in line. He was ordered to march at a particular hour on the morning of the 8th, but there was no particular time appointed for him to be in line. I therefore object to the question in that shape. I would state also, Mr. President, that I might reasonably object to the whole of this matter. These are facts that were stated in my official report and in my telegraphic dispatch to the general-in-chief, and they should have been investigated by the judge-advocate at the time. However, I waive that. General Crittenden was not required, and there is nothing in the evidence before the Commission that states that he was required, to be in line at a particular time.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not think, Mr. President, that this second question is a matter of much importance. General Thomas, I think, in his testimony states why they did not march at the time ordered and how they arrived there at the hour they did, and with the explanation now made by General Buell I see no object in asking the question. If, however, the Commission determines to ask either or both the questions of General Thomas they have the right to do so. These facts make a part of General Buell's defense, and I have a right to explain it away or contradict it if I have the evidence. Still I do not think the second question is of sufficient importance to press upon the Commission.

General BUELL. I have not introduced the testimony of Lieutenant Fitzhugh on that point in defense. As far as that matter is concerned I do not put myself in that attitude. I introduced it as a fact for the consideration of the Commission.

The question as amended read as follows:

"How far are you responsible for General Crittenden's corps not being in line on the morning of the 8th of October, and what reason existed, if any, why that corps was not on the march at the time ordered by General Buell, on the night of the 7th?"

General BUELL. I think it is all explained in General Thomas' testimony and in General Crittenden's too.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the second question should be put to General Thomas.

The cross-examination of the Rev. W. G. Brownlow was then proceeded with.

By General BUELL:

Question. You have stated, I believe, Mr. Brownlow, in your direct testimony, that the rebel army drew freely upon the supplies of East Tennessee. What surplus above what would be required for the subsistence of the people until the new crops came in do you suppose there was on hand of the crop of 1861 at the time you left your home?

It was, as I remarked, a very abundant year, but the rebels had seized upon all they could find and had agents out purchasing. They ran it out of the country or stored it in various depots in great abundance in Knoxville, New Market, Greerfield, Bristol, Sweetwater, Cleveland, Chattanooga, &c. They had it in charge; it was out of the hands of the people; a great deal of wheat had been run off to the steam-mills at Atlanta. I should not consider that there was a great deal available outside of their hands. There was great complaint on the part of the people that they were oppressing them. Some men were put in jail for refusing to sell to the Confederate agents; that was the only offense they had committed. I could not say to what extent there were supplies. For three months of close confinement I could only learn from my fellow-prisoners, as they came in, what was going on out of doors. There was scarcely a day but there were accessions to our numbers in the jail, and they would give us the latest news.

Question. Considering the general scarcity of provisions in the South and the harsh policy which the rebel authorities practiced toward the loyal people of East Tennessee do you think it probable that there was any considerable surplus of provisions in the country as late as March of last year?

I should say not outside of what the rebel authorities had, for they bought it all up. There was a great deal, but they had it in their depots, and threatened to burn up and destroy it if the Federal army got in. There was also quite an abundance of beef cattle, hogs, and mutton which they seized upon; in addition to the abundance of grain hogs and cattle were abundant, but the rebel authorities had them all. I have been accustomed to lay in my pork, and never had to give $10 per hundred till then, which was the price I had to pay then.

Question. Have you frequently seen people from your country since you left there; and do they now give, as recently as you have seen any of them, any account with regard to the condition of the people and the abundance of their supplies?

I have seen them all the time; they come to see me here. I met with them at Nashville and Murfreesborough, and I went through the army and talked to them. They all agree, are harmonious in one tale, and that is that they are threatened with starvation all over East Tennessee; that destitution is very great, and they are very anxious that the Federal Army shall enter the country or they will starve. The labor, as I said, is chiefly performed by whites, and these have mostly gone into one army or the other or have absconded, and my information is that the present spring no crops of any consequence will be planted. This whole past summer was a season of great destitution and want. I think no people on this continent have suffered as severely as they have.

Question. Do you think that a temporary advance of our troops in East Tennessee would be wise or merciful to the people, as a general policy?

I think not, sir. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that if we are only to make a temporary advance upon them we had better stay away. Unless we go in and get possession of the country, leave it alone by all means. When we burned their bridges, a little over a year ago, they took our men and hung them in retaliation. I would deprecate our army going there, under the command of any one, only for a temporary hold of it. If it is not to be permanent I hope they will stay away. It would be better for the people to be left as they are.

Question. Have the Union people of East Tennessee generally remained loyal in spite of the cruel treatment they have received from the rebel authorities?

Yes, sir; I should say so. They have never shrunk from their devotion to the Government and to the Union.

Question. Suppose it had been evident that the Government which the rebels desired to establish would secure perfectly the equality and liberties of the people as well as under our Constitution, and that then the rebel authorities had pursued a mild course toward the people instead of a very severe one, would they be in a better or worse disposition toward the rebel Government and the rebel authorities than they are now?

If they had adopted a more kindly course of conduct toward the people, instead of exasperating them, they would have felt more kindly toward them; but I have no idea that they would have indorsed secession or the rebel Government; that is, the Union portion of them. We held two large conventions for East Tennessee in May and July; we had Nelson, Johnson, and others speaking, and they were ultra men, and we had some conciliatory men, Colonel Baxter and others, who proposed that we should ground our arms, but the crowd would not listen to such a proposition, and called out, "They are damned secessionists; let them go and join them." The masses of the people were ahead of what we call the leaders. I witnessed those demonstrations. They sent Colonel Bell up there to set us right because we had voted largely, but we drove him back indignantly to Middle Tennessee. The people refused to hear him speak at all.

Question. Have you seen anything of the effects of the presence of large armies in a country, and is it or is it not your observation that under a system which requires that an army should live upon the country and its inhabitants, friends and foes suffer alike, as a general rule?

Yes, sir; the only fair view I have ever had of anything of that kind was in the vicinity of Murfreesborough, Nashville, and Gallatin, a country I was very familiar with. I have traveled over it in years gone by on horseback and by stage and rail, and I found, in returning from that country in the fall, in the winter, and again in the spring, all destroyed, and everybody's property suffered alike. There was a general using up of everything and everybody, a general deprecation of war, and a general wish with those I talked to that peace should be restored. All deprecate the war and devastation alike now, rebels and Unionists. This was the first manifestation of war I had ever witnessed. I have not been accustomed to war or to armies.

Question. Suppose our army should enter East Tennessee and should practice there a system which results in such universal devastation and ruin, do you think the affections of the people toward our cause would be strengthened by such a condition of things?

I think that in East Tennessee there would be a division. The Union party would submit to anything and indorse anything almost that the Federal Army did, and the other party would complain. I do not think the Federal Army could do anything there that would be offensive to the Unionists, provided they inflicted punishment upon the rebels in a spirit of retaliation.

Question. Suppose that in the execution of this system of retaliation the Union people should find that they suffered as much as their traitorous neighbors, do you or do you not suppose that they would soon learn to regard their friends with almost as much animosity as their enemies when they saw that they had no more protection under one than under the other; is that human nature or not?

Yes, sir; that is human nature. And if they were to suffer as much under the Federal Army as they have done under the other they would feel very greatly disappointed and it would have the tendency to cool them off. This is an opinion founded upon what I think human nature is.

Question. Do you believe that there are a great many people in the Southern States who are loyal at heart but compelled under the circumstances to acquiesce in the rebellion?

I do believe that the number is much greater than our friends and intelligent men here in the North suppose it to be, and that they are prevented from coming out for fear that when we take a place we shall not continue to hold it and that they will suffer for it afterward. It is fear that keeps them down. I would designate the State of Georgia as having a great many men loyal at heart, but who are crushed down. It may be that I am better acquainted with Georgia than with any other State out of Tennessee. I know they very reluctantly went into the rebellion.

Question. Do you think those people deserve punishment for a state of things which it was not in their power to prevent and which they still deprecate?

No, sir; I do not think they do. I should be sorry to have them punished if it could be avoided. I blame them, the whole of them, for not standing out and squarely avowing their sentiments. I censure them for knocking under rather than submit to punishment. I would rather be hanged myself.

Question. But is it not a very rare thing to find in human character firmness and constancy enough to endure such trials?

I could not say; it seems so to me, sir. In East Tennessee there were thousands of the most remarkable cases, that never came before the country, of men firm, unyielding, and spirited to the last, even under the lash and whip. They put them in jail, they starved them, and hung them under the gallows trying to extort confessions from them, but they said they would rather die first.

Question. Have you known of any policy practiced by any of our armies which regarded loyal people and traitors in the same light and treated them alike under all circumstances?

No, sir; I have not known anything of the kind personally. I have heard complaints, but they are matters of hearsay only. I have no knowledge of anything of the kind.

Question. What was the extent of these complaints, what did they amount to—those that have most attracted your attention?

Not very extensive, I think. I have heard our folks complain that a man to have his property and rights protected had better be a rebel. I heard it in reference to Cumberland Gap last year, but how well founded I do not know. I always thought it well to discourage grumbling both among citizens and soldiers, and when I heard anything of the kind among our East Tennessee troops I tried to reconcile them to their condition.

Question. Have you heard any of those complaints recently?

Yes, sir; on my last visit to Nashville. The complaint seemed to apply to the city authorities there—complaints of the military authorities in charge of the city and of Governor Johnson. But such complaints are always more or less going on; a great deal of such has come under my notice.

Question. Has Governor Johnson, as Governor of the State of Tennessee and in other prominent positions, been considered to have exhibited remarkable administrative and other qualities which fit a man to govern wisely, to shape a wise policy for the government of men?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question, Mr. President. It certainly is traveling out of the examination-in-chief; and even if it were not, Governor Johnson is not on trial before this Commission.

General BUELL. A similar question was asked of a former witness by the judge-advocate himself. I do not know whether in putting that question the judge-advocate considered that it placed Governor Johnson on trial before this Commission. I do not think it did, nor do I think that this question places him on trial. I ask the question because it has been asked before by the judge-advocate in a somewhat different shape, because it is connected with the question of policy, and because I understand from the judge-advocate's question that Governor Johnson's opinion and practice may be supposed to have some importance in your deliberations on this question.

The PRESIDENT. When was the question asked, general?

General BUELL. It was asked of one of my witnesses.

The PRESIDENT. Was it asked in the examination-in-chief?

General BUELL. No, sir.

The court was cleared; when it was unanimously decided that the question should not be put.

By General TYLER :

Question. Was this devastation of which the people complained in the vicinity of Gallatin and other parts of Tennessee, that you speak of in your testimony, the result of regular foraging under the direction of proper officers of the army or was it occasioned by the plundering of our troops?

I could not say, sir; it was just a general complaint in a spirit of grumbling, but I heard nothing said of its being done either in a regular or an irregular manner. It was looked upon as the effects and consequences of the war, and I would infer that the people there were all very sick of it.

Question. Supposing that the Federal army should go to East Tennessee, and should, through the regular departments of the army, strip the country of all that is necessary to support that army, paying those men who could prove their loyalty and refusing compensation to those who were disloyal, do you or do you not suppose that such a course of policy would strengthen the hands of the army in East Tennessee?

It would meet with the hearty approbation of the whole Union population and would be doing just what they would expect.

Question. From what you know and from what you hear of the campaign of 1862 in Kentucky and Tennessee was that the policy pursued by the Federal army?

I know nothing personally, but from what I have heard they complained that it was not. It was merely a matter of complaint and rumor of those I heard talking about it.

General BUELL. I object to the question and to the answer. It is on record that an order was issued requiring certificates to be given to persons from whom supplies were received. The condition of payment upon those certificates is that the claimant shall prove his loyalty; so that no mere matter of opinion or hearsay evidence can be of any value or validity upon that point. I am willing it should pass.

By General DANA :

Question. Do you know whether, prior to the issue of an order by the Government making payment for produce or articles taken by the army for its use conditional on the loyalty or disloyalty of the parties from whom the articles were taken, there was any authority for any general commanding an army in the field to adopt that policy?

I am not able to answer the question satisfactorily.

Question. Do you know whether the policy of the Government of the United States in regard to the treatment of the population of States in rebellion to the United States has been changed since the first outbreak of the rebellion, so far as taking supplies from them and giving them vouchers with the conditions of payment predicated upon their loyalty or disloyalty is concerned?

I do not know, sir, of any change in the policy.

Question. Is it or is it not notorious that at the outbreak of the rebellion the policy of the Government toward the people residing in rebellious districts was what is termed a conciliatory and kind policy?

That was my understanding, sir, at the outbreak of the rebellion—that that was the policy of the Government and would continue to be. I have individually looked upon it as a mistaken policy.

Question. Are you informed whether the present policy of the Government is more or less severe than it was?

I cannot say that I am. I do not know whether the policy of the Government has been changed or not.

The court then adjourned to meet on Thursday, April 9, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Thursday, April 9, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There are three witnesses that the Commission and General Buell have expressed a desire to examine, whose evidence I have some difficulty in procuring—Major-General Halleck, Governor Johnson, and Colonel Fry. I would like to have some advice from the Commission as to what steps to take to procure their evidence. I presume I can get their depositions. I have about made up my mind that I cannot get them before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I thought you had forwarded questions to Major-General Halleck to be answered.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I notified General Buell that I would take the depositions of Major-General Halleck and Governor Johnson, but by some irregularity of the mail the questions did not reach Washington until after the date of the notice. I certainly shall have him before the Commission or get his deposition on the same notice if General Buell does not object.

General BUELL. I have stated frequently and earnestly to the Commission my wish that Governor Johnson should appear before the Commission, and my conviction that for the sake of justice he ought to appear; and I must insist that he shall come or that the Government shall refuse to permit him. It is undoubtedly in the power of the Commission to bring him before them if they are not restrained by higher authorities.

The PRESIDENT. Has the judge-advocate heard from Governor Johnson?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, Mr. President; and I see I cannot get either of these witnesses before the Commission in any reasonable time. Governor Johnson is engaged in organizing some expedition in Tennessee; and I have received directions from Secretary Stanton that he will not permit me to take any officer out of active service to appear before this Commission when a deposition can be had.

General BUELL. Has the judge-advocate been informed by the Government that Governor Johnson is employed on such active service that he cannot appear before the Commission?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir.

General BUELL. Then the instructions of the Secretary of War to which the judge-advocate has referred do not apply to him. I take it that there must be some evidence of his being so employed before he can be considered within the prohibition of the Secretary of War.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Governor Johnson, I believe, is brigadier-general of the volunteer service and Military Governor of Tennessee; he is not connected with Ohio in any possible form, and I have no process by which I can bring Governor Johnson before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. Aside from these what other witnesses are there?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Those are all.

General DANA. As soon as this documentary evidence is indorsed I propose to inform the Government that the Commission is through with this investigation, except receiving the testimony of Major-General Halleck, Governor Johnson, and Colonel Fry; and the Government must then let us know distinctly whether we can have those witnesses or not; if we cannot, we shall proceed to take their depositions.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The Government will throw the responsibility of obtaining the evidence of these witnesses upon my shoulders; and why I do not take their depositions may be very pertinently asked by the Department, and unless I am prevented I shall proceed to take those depositions without delay. I understand you, general, that the wish for personal examination was more particularly confined to Governor Johnson?

General BUELL. Yes, sir. I do not know what deposition the judge-advocate proposes to take from Major-General Halleck.

The questions proposed to be submitted to General Halleck were here read by the judge-advocate, as follows:

"1st. What was the cause of the delay in the march of the Army of the Ohio from Corinth to North Alabama and who is responsible for that delay?

"2d. What were the circumstances attending the dispatch sent by General Buell from Nashville to the Department at Washington asking for instructions and what was the response and the circumstances connected with it?"

The PRESIDENT. Have you heard from General Halleck.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Not directly. When I was in Washington he told me that he had too much business on hand to be taken before any court for examination.

The PRESIDENT. How about depositions?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. As I have stated, the questions arrived at Washington too late, and I have nothing definite to place before the Commission.

General BUELL. The first question of the judge-advocate is decidedly objectionable. It asks merely for the expression of an opinion on a question the Commission is to investigate. The business of the Commission is to inquire into the causes of the delay, and not to ascertain them by the expression of the opinion of any person. An expression of General Halleck on that question could be only one of opinion. He has not as good an opportunity of knowing the facts as the Commission, for they have all the records and the testimony of as many witnesses as they choose to call. The question calls for an opinion in regard to facts of which he has no knowledge. The second question refers to documentary evidence, and that evidence, I understand, has been furnished from Washington, and is to be presented this morning. So that of the two questions one is improper and the other is superfluous.

General DANA. It appears to me that we are now running against difficulties which I have seen all along we should encounter; and it appears to me that it is the most serious difficulty that can arise in our proceedings. I have remarked before this that there are no witnesses that have been introduced before the court whose testimony the court has a right to suppose will be more important than the testimony of Major-General Halleck and Colonel Fry. I do not believe there will be a dissenting opinion in the court as to the propriety of examining those two witnesses, but as to examining them by deposition I do not believe that any member of the court can consider that method will be satisfactory to either side in this case. I certainly would prefer not to have General Halleck examined at all than in the way proposed by those two questions, which do not reach the two important points that we have a right to investigate. Now, we all know that General Halleck cannot be brought here nor can Colonel Fry. The exigencies of the service will not permit it, and we find ourselves situated just as I feared we should be. I think, then, that in this case we ought to make such a representation to the Department of the actual necessity of having those two gentlemen before this Commission as has not heretofore been made to them. There has been no full representation made to the Department at Washington of the reasons which compel the Commission to feel the necessity of the presence of those two witnesses, and I think before we give up the expectation of having those witnesses present before the court that it is our duty to make a full representation of the necessity to the Government, and let them take the responsibility, where it properly belongs, of saying whether this Commission shall or shall not have this evidence that they consider so very important. Now I am unwilling to close this case without having the full evidence of these two witnesses. What their evidence will be I do not know, but I cannot believe that there is any evidence before the Commission that will be more important in this investigation than that of the general-in-chief, and who then commanded in front of Corinth, and who gave the orders to the Army of the Ohio which started it on its mission, and the testimony of the chief of staff of that army. As to the testimony of Governor Johnson, I have no very definite opinion about that, but if he is going to remain in Washington long enough for this Commission to get there I think his case may also be embraced in the representation that ought to be made of the absolute necessity that exists why this court should adjourn to where they can get the testimony of these witnesses; and if it cannot be obtained in that way I do not think it ought to be obtained at all.

The PRESIDENT. It is a matter of the most ordinary justice that, if these questions which have been read by the judge-advocate be submitted to General Halleck, General Buell should have the right to cross-examine. I am decidedly in favor of insisting that he should have that privilege; it is but a matter of justice to him, and if this evidence is taken by deposition he cannot have that permission.

General DANA. I imagine it would not be necessary to bring General Halleck into court. If the judge-advocate and General Buell were at Washington they could obtain his evidence from him at his own office. I think General Halleck's examination would be a very long one before the court.

General TYLER. I do not think we can judge whether General Halleck's testimony will be wanted till we have read this documentary evidence that is now before the Commission. It might fill up the gap for which his testimony is now required. And as to calling Colonel Fry before the Commission, I should be very glad to have him examined personally, but we have had Major Wright before the Commission. He was on General Buell's staff, was second in command, and is probably as conversant with the operations of the army at that time as Colonel Fry himself could be. As far as my recollection is concerned he has been examined on the main points on which it is proposed to examine Colonel Fry. As to making a proposition to adjourn to Baltimore, I think, the Government having rebuked that so positively, I am not myself willing to again place myself on the record as advising the Government as to the course of proceeding on the part of the Commission. We have our orders to remain here till our business is closed, and I for one am for obeying those orders.

General DANA. I suppose that that willingness would be made so by compulsion. We are here and ordered to remain here, but I wish to put myself on the record as representing the necessity of having the testimony of these two witnesses, and leaving the Government to take the responsibility of telling us to stop here and close up our case or ordering us to Washington, one of the two. When they are told of the necessity of the case they will know, but they cannot know till a full representation is made to them.

The PRESIDENT. I am opposed to taking the depositions of Major-General Halleck and Colonel Fry, and I am not in favor of asking the "powers that be" the privilege of going to Washington to take their testimony. The simple question now before us is whether we shall be allowed to take the depositions of these gentlemen, and I believe with General Dana as to the importance of the testimony of General Halleck. I have read the documentary evidence General Tyler alludes to with a great deal of care. It is very satisfactory in every respect save in one important particular, and that is, whose plan of operation that was; that can only be told by General Halleck himself, who was then commander of the Department of the West, as I think it was then called. We were ordered to remain in Cincinnati till our examination was completed. That is settled. The question now is whether we shall have the depositions of General Halleck and Colonel Fry, or shall the judge-advocate ask if we can have the testimony of these gentlemen. If there is no other way in which it can be done, the judge-advocate and General Buell can go to Washington and there conduct the examination. We may thus avoid disobedience of orders and accommodate the witnesses.

The documentary evidence received from Washington, and marked*—

Documentary evidence from Headquarters, Washington, for the Government, A ;

Documentary evidence from Headquarters, Washington, B ;

Documentary evidence from Headquarters, Washington, C ;

Documentary evidence from Headquarters, Washington, D ;

Documentary evidence from Headquarters, Washington, E ;

Letters marked No. 1 to 4, from Headquarters, Washington, F—was here presented to General Buell for his examination and his assent to its introduction as evidence before the Commission.

Glancing over the documentary evidence from Washington proposed to be submitted to the Commission General BUELL remarked:

* See note on page 690.

Of course I have no objection to these documents. They are more complete than my own files. I should desire them myself if they were not to be introduced by the Government. I find some verbal inaccuracies, which can perhaps be corrected as we go along. Before any decision is given as to the full effect of the recent act of Congress with reference to the testimony of absent witnesses I should like to have an opportunity to submit my views on that question. I am not prepared to do so at this moment with as much care as it requires. I will merely say now that if a literal interpretation is to be placed upon the wording of the law, it amounts to an abrogation of every principle of justice, as far as securing evidence is concerned. Justice could never be secured by any such practice as that. I do not suppose any intelligent man will pretend that that law would permit such a thing as this; that this Commission, sitting here, could compel me to submit to the introduction of evidence by deposition when the witness, living on the other side of the river, could be brought here in half an hour. If that is the case, an accused person could be prevented from ever confronting his accusers. The evidence of witnesses on the other side of the river having been admitted by deposition, the court could be transferred to that side, and the same process executed with reference to witnesses on this. The case of Governor Johnson presents almost such an example, though I do not wish to assert that it was so designed. I think I may say that it was the intention of the judge-advocate to call Governor Johnson at first. He failed to do so when the Commission was sitting in the same city and in the same building with him, and now, having gone beyond the State or district in which he lives, his deposition is insisted upon.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. So far, Mr. President, as any discussion upon that law would go, of course General Buell has an entire right to call your attention to it; but so far as my conduct is concerned I must beg leave to differ as to his right. There has been nothing before this Commission, that I can perceive, that would authorize such remarks. I inquired of Governor Johnson what he knew, and came to the conclusion that the testimony was not important. Since then, since our arrival in Louisville, documents and facts have come to my knowledge which I think make his examination important, and I proposed to call him. There is no wish on my part to take his deposition; I should infinitely prefer to have him before the Commission; but I shall take his deposition, as it seems I cannot get him.

General BUELL. The questions presented to the Commission by the judge-advocate to be submitted to Governor Johnson do not refer to any documents. If Governor Johnson's evidence is required with reference to any documents, I shall insist that the judge-advocate produce the documents or make his explanation more complete, and then we can judge whether Governor Johnson's evidence is necessary.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The Commission can judge of the importance of that evidence when they get it and not before. I have already stated upon what points I wish to examine Governor Johnson. I submitted these questions in writing and had the action of the Commission upon them. As to how he will respond to them, it is of course impossible for me to say, but the Commission can judge of his reply after they get it.

General BUELL. The Commission will remember that in my presence the judge-advocate was asked by the President as to whether he was ready to call Governor Johnson in Nashville and he answered that he was not prepared to call him at that time. I inferred from that that he had given notice to the Commission that he intended to call him, and I have no doubt he did give that notice; and I shall be compelled to say that if Governor Johnson does not come before this Commission it will appear very badly in some respects at least. I wish to call the attention of the Commission again to the fact that I am notified now that the judge-advocate will on the 13th of April proceed to take depositions of Governor Johnson and Major-General Halleck. I call your attention to the fact that the Commission has not been informed that the presence of these witnesses cannot be obtained. If the Commission has not the power to bring them before it the Government certainly has the power, and the Commission has not been informed yet that the Government will not exercise that power. I therefore state my protest against the taking of the deposition of Governor Johnson; at all events as intimated in the notice of the judge-advocate. The judge-advocate has undertaken another responsibility in this matter, and that is to fix the notice that may be deemed sufficient under the law. I should like to know by what authority he limits that notice to three days after to-day.

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Under the law governing the taking of depositions in the State of Ohio that is the notice I have to give; that is the practice in civil courts.

THE PRESIDENT. By the law governing the practice in civil courts that would be a sufficient notice; it is only required to give a reasonable time for the parties to attend at the place where the deposition is to be taken. There being no allusion to the length of notice made in this act of Congress, I presume that the customary practice would be followed.

General BUELL. Does the Commission understand that after this notice I am authorized to proceed to Washington to conduct this investigation as far as I am concerned?

THE PRESIDENT. So far as I am concerned, the Commission would give you the privilege to go there at once in person or employ an attorney, or both.

General BUELL. I should like a decision on that question.

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Before any steps are taken in that matter I wish to say to the Commission and General Buell that he is laboring under a misapprehension in reference to Governor Johnson. I am expecting Governor Johnson here every day, and the moment he makes his appearance I will stop him. I am merely making every effort possible to get his evidence. If he remains in Washington I shall try to get it; if he come through Cincinnati I shall endeavor to examine him. There is no preference for taking his deposition instead of having him before the Commission, nor can I understand why General Buell is so anxious to have him before the Commission instead of taking his deposition. The Department at Washington does not recognize any difference between taking a deposition and having the witness in open court. The exigencies of the service forced that law. The first great difficulty was to get a court, and the next difficulty was to get witnesses from the Army. Many flagrant cases have occurred in which nothing could be done in consequence of the difficulty of getting a witness, and if I did not apply this law of the Government I do not know how I should proceed. I have no wish to take the deposition of Governor Johnson.

General BUELL. No doubt the law was adopted for the very reason that the judge-advocate has stated; but that does not authorize the judge-advocate or any tribunal to set aside without necessity the principle that a person accused has the right to confront his accusers. The law, I suppose, only applies to those cases where the public service or other circumstances render it impossible to procure the attendance of witnesses. That is not the case with Governor Johnson. Governor Johnson has been traveling through the States for a month; he could as well have been here as elsewhere, and I venture to say with as little detriment to the public service. It is a notorious fact that he could have been, and there is no excuse for his not having been, brought before the Commission. The Government has not undertaken to say he shall not appear.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Nor has it.

General BUELL. Governor Johnson has no right to say he will not appear.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Nor has he.

General BUELL. Nor has the judge-advocate the right to assume it.

With reference to the notification of the judge-advocate that he would take the deposition of General Halleck I wish to call the attention of the Commission to the fact that he has not been authorized to take General Halleck's testimony at all. He has stated the proposition this morning, but it has not yet received the sanction of the Commission. I mention this in answer to the notification which has just been served upon me that his testimony will be taken by deposition, and I call your attention again to the objections which I made to the questions themselves and upon which no decision has been given by the Commission.

General TYLER. The order of the Commission with respect to Governor Johnson is that he shall, if possible, be brought before it. If he is not I do not see that we can take any action upon his deposition till it is brought before the Commission.

General DANA. I have no doubt it is General Buell's right to appear when the deposition is taken if he considers it necessary; and when the deposition is before the Commission I do not see that we can take any action upon it without some representation from General Buell himself, to which the court has to accede and by which it must shape its course.

The PRESIDENT. The language of the order authorizes General Buell to appear before this Commission. Now the word "appear" has a legal signification. Nothing is better defined than this word. To "appear" in a court of law is attended with certain consequences, certain rights, and when General Buell is ordered to "appear" before this Commission he is invested with all the rights and privileges of an accused party. Under these rights he can produce witnesses and examine them, both those introduced by himself and those of the Government. The result of this is that if General Buell thinks it necessary for him to go to Washington, where it is proposed to take these depositions, it would be our duty, under the order calling the Commission, to accede; we could do nothing else. I understand the notification was given to the judge-advocate when he was in Washington that officers would not be allowed to leave their commands to testify. Under the provisions of this act he is compelled, where their testimony is necessary, to take it by depositions; and when these depositions are taken General Buell has unquestionably the right to appear to cross-examine the witnesses, and it would be our duty in such cases to suspend the proceedings of the Commission while he was so engaged; so that, if the depositions of General Halleck and Colonel Fry be taken at Washington, General Buell has unquestionably the right to be there to cross-examine.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The order "to appear" does not actually require that he should be present; he may appear by attorney.

The PRESIDENT. But if he thinks it necessary to be present he can do so.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The wording of the order in the instructions given by the Government to the Commission is that General Buell would be ordered to Cincinnati, and have the privilege of appearing before the Commission and of examining witnesses, but it does not place General Buell in the position of a party accused or of having all the rights of an accused. To do so it would be necessary to make of the board a court, which it is not, and instead of permitting General Buell to appear he would be ordered to appear. In the investigation of these facts it may be found that blame should be attached to other officers of the Army or soldiers who have not the privilege of attending here. Under the correct reading of the order General Buell is permitted to attend, not to answer specific charges, but rather for the purpose of assisting in the investigation. General Buell has elected to appear in the light of a defendant, but it does not follow that all the belongings, attributes, and privileges pertaining to a person in that position are to be granted to General Buell. For instance, if General Buell was to go to Washington the proceedings of this Commission would have to be suspended till he returned.

The PRESIDENT. General Buell is authorized to "appear" before this Commission to examine witnesses, not only his own but those of the Government, and this clothes him with all the rights of a "party defendant." Were we to strictly follow the proceedings of courts of law notice would have to be given before the trial commenced of any deposition to be taken. Such a proceeding cannot be entertained in this case; it would be impracticable. Depositions not being possible to be taken before the trial, they must be taken during the trial, and the right of appearance follows as a matter of course. I suppose that no one would attempt to disguise the fact that this is an inquiry with special reference to General Buell's operations. When we speak of the operations of the Army of the Ohio they are the operations of the army as conducted by his command. The Government, therefore, gives special privileges to General Buell to appear and examine witnesses, &c., because he is more particularly interested in this investigation than any other officer in that army. Secretary Stanton is a lawyer; he knows the effect of the language employed in that order, which gives General Buell all the rights of a "party defendant" in this case.

The court was then cleared; when, on motion that the testimony of General Halleck and Governor Johnson should be taken by deposition, it was put to vote and decided in the affirmative.

After the decision was announced to General Buell the court adjourned to meet on Friday, April 10, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Friday, April 10, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

The following deposition was read to the Commission by the judge-advocate:

Deposition of Mr. John H. Cooper.

Mr. JOHN H. COOPER, of Lexington, Ky., being duly sworn by the judge-advocate of the Commission called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio in Kentucky and Tennessee, responds to the questions submitted by the judge-advocate and the cross-interrogatories by Major-General Buell as follows:

Questions by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

1. State your name and place of residence, and whether you have once before been called and examined in this investigation.

I reside in Lexington, Ky., and was once before examined in this investigation, at Cincinnati, Ohio, and my statements reduced to writing. My name is John H. Cooper.

2. State what you know of Bragg's retreat after the fight at Perryville; at what time and by what route his forces reached Camp Dick Robinson, and whether after marching toward Camp Dick Robinson they returned through Harrodsburg and formed a line of battle between Harrodsburg and Perryville.

I was a mere spectator at Perryville and saw some of the fighting. On the day of battle I returned to Harrodsburg, and the next morning, after breakfast, went back in company with some others toward the battle-field, and met Bragg's army, or a portion of it, in full retreat, who turned us back toward Harrodsburg. The enemy, or this portion, retreated through Harrodsburg, and from the latter place to Camp Dick Robinson, by a new turnpike road crossing Dick's River at King's Mill, intersecting the turnpike from Lexington to Danville at Bryantsville, which is in Garrard County, a few miles from Camp Dick Robinson. Whether they, the rebel army or any portion of it, returned through Harrodsburg and formed a line of battle between Harrodsburg and Perryville I don't know.

3. State what you know of the number of Bragg's entire force after its junction with Kirby Smith's and others at Camp Dick Robinson and how you came by your information. What was, if you remember, the number of rations?

I was informed, either by Major Thomas or Captain Williams, both of whom were commissaries in the rebel army, that after the junction of Kirby Smith's forces with Bragg's they were issuing rations to 60,000 men. This is all I know, and I think is the substance of my former answer to this question when propounded to me at Cincinnati. Whether this number included all his forces I cannot say, but think it included all; and whether the officers knew or not I cannot say. And further saith not.

JOHN H. COOPER.

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

Fayette County, set.:

I, Charles D. Carr, presiding judge of the Fayette County court in and for the State and county aforesaid, do certify that John H. Cooper, the witness to whom the foregoing questions were propounded by me, was first duly sworn by me that the evidence he should give in answer to said questions should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and that his answers were reduced to writing by me in his presence.

Given under my hand this 9th day of April, 1863.

C. D. CARR,
Presiding Judge Fayette County Court.

The Commission adjourned to meet on Monday, April 13, 1863.

CINCINNATI, Monday, April 13, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BUELL. The documents which I submit in evidence, including orders, letters, and telegraphic dispatches, are numbered from 1 to 716, inclusive, in addition to the fractional numbers $1\frac{1}{2}$, $3\frac{1}{2}$, $72\frac{1}{2}$, $80\frac{1}{2}$, $131\frac{1}{2}$, $138\frac{1}{2}$, $145\frac{1}{2}$, $218\frac{1}{2}$, $284\frac{1}{2}$, $327\frac{1}{2}$, $344\frac{1}{2}$, $469\frac{1}{2}$, $510\frac{1}{4}$, $510\frac{1}{2}$, $510\frac{3}{4}$, $511\frac{1}{4}$, $511\frac{1}{2}$, $511\frac{3}{4}$, $512\frac{1}{4}$, $512\frac{1}{2}$, $512\frac{3}{4}$, $549\frac{1}{2}$, $565\frac{1}{2}$, $673\frac{1}{2}$. Besides these I desire to include the dispatches received from Washington and submitted by the judge-advocate for the Government; they embrace many dispatches which I find have been lost from my files.* It will be seen that my file of dispatches to and from General Halleck embraces some that are not included in the file submitted for the Government. Some of the documents submitted do not come within the period to which the investigation has been confined. They might at first view not seem to have any immediate bearing upon the subject submitted to it; they, however, relate to circumstances which are general and permanent in their bearing upon my military operations, and to a greater or less extent entered into the plans which determined the operations of my army for the time to which the investigations of the Commission legitimately extend.

The Commission adjourned to meet Thursday, April 16, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, April 16, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the president (General Wallace), General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

The judge-advocate read the following letter to General Buell and the reply thereto:

COURT-ROOM OF COMMISSION,
Cincinnati, April 14, 1863.

Major-General BUELL, U. S. Army, &c. :

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that I have submitted to General Wright the questions authorized by the Commission, which asked him:

1st. As to the number of troops turned over to General Buell in Louisville.

2d. As to the number of enemy under Bragg after a junction with Kirby Smith and after the battle of Perryville.

3d. The circumstances attending the surrender of Munfordville and why that garrison was not relieved.

4th. The circumstances attending the illegal appointment of Captains Gay and Gilbert to the positions of brigadier-general and major-general.

If you will favor me with the cross-interrogatories I will have them asked and answered.

I have the honor to be, general, yours, respectfully,

DONN PIATT,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Judge-Advocate.

CINCINNATI, April 14, 1863.

Lieut. Col. DONN PIATT,
Judge-Advocate of Military Commission :

SIR: I have received your letter informing me that you have submitted certain questions to General Wright to be answered by deposition. It will be impossible for me to propound any cross-interrogatories until I know what is elicited from the examination-in-chief.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL.

* The copies substituted for the documentary evidence lost with the original record have been arranged either as "reports" in connection with the events to which they relate, or in chronological order in the "correspondence, orders, and returns." Such of these documents as relate to operations prior to March 4, 1862, are printed in Vol. VII of this series; those relating to operations between March 4 and June 10 appear in Vol. X, and the remainder appear in this chapter.

The following letter from General Buell was received and read :

BURNET HOUSE, April 16, 1863.

Lieut. Col. DONN PIATT, Judge-Advocate:

SIR: As soon as the Commission has finished with the proceedings which require my presence here I will proceed to Washington City to take the deposition of Colonel Fry, to be submitted in evidence to the Commission.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

There being no business before the Commission requiring the presence of General Buell, it adjourned to Friday, April 24, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, April 24, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the president (General Wallace), General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. After the close of our last session I received the following letter from General Buell:

BURNET HOUSE, April 16, 1863.

Lieut. Col. DONN PIATT, Judge-Advocate:

SIR: I will on Monday, the 20th instant, at 10 o'clock a. m., before some competent officer, commence, and continue from day to day until completed, to take the testimony of Col. J. B. Fry, Provost-Marshal-General, at Washington City, D. C., in the investigation now in progress concerning the operations of the Army of the Ohio in Tennessee and Kentucky, under my command.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. To this letter I replied as follows:

LUDLOW, April 16, 1863.

Major-General BUELL, U. S. Army, &c.:

GENERAL: I have the honor to call your attention to the fact that the notice served upon me to-day to take the deposition of Colonel Fry is defective in two particulars: it does not state at what place the deposition will be taken nor does it give me time to reach Washington.

I have the honor to be, general, yours, respectfully,

DONN PIATT,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Judge-Advocate.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Buell then wrote as follows:

BURNET HOUSE, April 16, 1863.

Lieut. Col. DONN PIATT, Judge-Advocate:

SIR: I informed you this morning of my purpose to take Colonel Fry's deposition in Washington as soon as the business of the court would permit me to leave, and as soon as I was advised of the adjournment of the Commission until the 24th I notified you of the day. The deposition will be taken before the Judge-Advocate-General or other suitable officer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would state to the Commission that after the adjournment on Thursday, the 16th, I followed General Buell to Washington City, and on Wednesday, the 22d, we took two depositions, one of Colonel Fry and the other of Governor Johnson; but for the purpose of being back here by the 24th it was necessary for me to leave

Washington on Wednesday night, so that I had no opportunity to cross-examine Colonel Fry. However, I have no objection to receive his deposition as it stands without cross-examining, if there is no objection on the part of General Buell to the deposition of Governor Johnson as it stands, General Buell having no time to cross-examine him.

The PRESIDENT. How was that?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. We had only one day, and some forty or fifty questions were put and answered. The examination was held on Wednesday, and we had to leave that night in order to be here to-day. As I left Cincinnati without any authority from the Commission to go to Washington, I would like, if it is not too late, to have some authority for my being in Washington at that time.

General TYLER. I move to amend the minutes of the 16th as follows:

"That we adjourn to Friday, the 24th of April, to allow General Buell and the judge-advocate to proceed to Washington for the purpose of taking the depositions of General Fry and Governor Andrew Johnson."

Carried.

The deposition of General H. G. Wright was then read by the judge-advocate:

Deposition of General H. G. Wright.

Questions by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

1. State what you know of the capture of Munfordville by the forces under Bragg, and why that post, being in your department at the time, was not sufficiently re-enforced by you or Colonel Wilder was not ordered to evacuate in time to prevent a capture.

The first attack on Munfordville was made on Sunday, the 14th of September, by a portion of Bragg's army, which was repulsed; and the garrison did not surrender, I believe, till the morning of the 17th, when, surrounded by Bragg's entire force, a retreat or further defense was impracticable.

The place was not further re-enforced because its garrison was as large as the importance of the place would justify. It consisted of upward of 4,000 men, which, considering the strength of the position, was strong enough to hold the place against any force likely to be detached by Bragg to attempt its capture. Any large force would not have accomplished more, as none which I could have furnished could have successfully resisted Bragg's army, which was finally brought against it and compelled its surrender.

Orders were not given for the evacuation of the place because it was intended to hold it until General Buell's army came up, as had been done in the case of Bowling Green; and from the information we had concerning the relative positions of his army and the rebel forces it was believed it could be held successfully. It was not supposed that Bragg could bring his entire force against the place without coming in contact with Buell, though it was believed possible for him to attack with a strong detachment while watching General Buell with his main force. This was exactly what he attempted in the first place; but on being repulsed he fell upon the place with his entire force.

I may have been in error in supposing it in the power of General Buell to relieve the place, but I fully expected it, or I should have withdrawn the garrison before the first attack. As showing why Munfordville was held and General Buell depended on at all for its relief, I would state that after the defeat of our forces under Major-General Nelson at Richmond, Ky., it became necessary to concentrate all the forces of the department at points where a successful resistance could be made. The points naturally selected, considering the strength of our forces and the character of the troops, all of which were new levies, were near Cincinnati (or more properly Covington and Newport) and Louisville. Troops were accumulated at the two points as rapidly as possible till after the withdrawal of Kirby Smith's force from the front of Cincinnati, when all the available force was sent to Louisville, which in consequence of the advance of Bragg had become the important point. During this time the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad as far as Bowling Green had been held as a part of the line of communication of the army under Major-General Buell in Tennessee. At Bowling Green had been accumulated a large supply of rations (a million and a half, I believe) for General Buell's army, which could not be forwarded farther.

Satisfied of the impossibility of maintaining this long line with the force I then had, I applied to the general-in-chief for information regarding the whereabouts of General Buell and the importance of holding the line for him. On the receipt of his answer I ordered the withdrawal of the stores and the evacuation of Bowling Green, designing, if necessary, to evacuate Munfordville at a late day. On the same day I believe on which the order was given I received information regarding General Buell's position and movements which induced me to countermand the order and determine to hold both Bowling Green and Munfordville. The information in effect was that General Buell with his entire force was moving into Kentucky via Nashville, where, leaving a garrison, he was to proceed with the remainder of his troops into Kentucky to oppose Bragg, who was moving in the same direction that General Buell's army was without supplies, and I presumed would count on finding them at Bowling Green. In holding the line of road I therefore held it for him at some risk of the garrison being cut off, as I could not re-enforce them to such an extent as to secure them against an attack of an army. Their security against such an attack must depend upon General Buell's own movements, and, right or wrong, I relied upon it.

3. State as nearly you can the number of troops turned over to Major-General Buell at Louisville previous to his marching out to attack Bragg at Bardstown.

I cannot answer with any certainty, as I was never able to get a return of the troops at Louisville under the command of General Nelson. The regiments, with the exception of those sent from General Grant's army under General G. Granger, were all new, and General Nelson was not able to get returns. On the 15th of September there were at Louisville 18,250 infantry, 1,930 cavalry, and 550 artillery, according to General Gilbert's report. Subsequently there were sent from Cincinnati twenty-four regiments of infantry, two batteries of artillery, and one regiment of cavalry; from Illinois five regiments of infantry, and from Michigan one regiment of cavalry. I cannot say whether these were all or not, as the Governors of the States in the department were sending their troops as fast as they could be got ready, and may sometimes have neglected to notify the headquarters of the department.

4. State what you know, if anything, of the number of men of all arms combined under Bragg at or after the battle of Perryville?

I know nothing of the strength of Bragg's force except from reports which cannot be considered reliable. General Nelson furnished me the report of a friend of his who saw the troops at Munfordville, and gave their number as "about 30,000, a few more or less;" say they have "other troops coming on." He also reported that previous to the surrender of Munfordville certain officers demanded to see whether the enemy really encompassed the works with the force they pretended to have, and three officers went through their lines and reported as follows: "Total strength 45,000 men; eight batteries on the south side; on the north side they professed to have thirteen regiments and three batteries, about 10,000 men."

5. Inform the Commission what you know of C. C. Gilbert, U. S. Army, being placed and continued in command as a major-general without being legally appointed; also what you know of Capt. E. Gay, U. S. Army, being given the position of brigadier-general without legal authority.

I know nothing in regard to Captain Gay's being given the position of brigadier-general. Captain Gilbert was appointed by me a major-general subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and this was done upon the written request of Brigadier-Generals Jackson and Cruft, neither of whom desired to take the command of the forces after Major-General Nelson had been disabled in the battle of Richmond, Ky. A certified copy of the order appointing him is herewith, marked A, and a copy of the letter of Generals Jackson and Cruft, above referred to, marked B. This appointment was at once reported to Washington, and General Gilbert was subsequently appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers by the President, as was also General Terrill, who were appointed in the same order.

H. G. WRIGHT,
Brigadier-General Volunteers.

Subscribed and sworn to before me by H. G. Wright, brigadier-general, this day, 15th of April, 1863.

JOS. CLEMENT,
Justice of the Peace, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

Document marked A, September 1, 1862, and document marked B, were also introduced and read.*

The deposition of Col. JOHN F. DE COURCY was then introduced by the judge-advocate and read, as follows:

Col. J. F. DE COURCY, U. S. Volunteers, being duly sworn, responds to the questions submitted by the judge-advocate of the Commission called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name, present address, and your position in the United States service.

John F. De Courcy; colonel of the Sixteenth Ohio, commanding a brigade of five regiments near Vicksburg; present address, Lexington, Ky.

Question. State what occurred to the forces under General Morgan while on the march to and while in possession of Cumberland Gap, in the summer of 1862, and why that officer did not operate offensively with his forces in Eastern Tennessee.

The march undertaken by General Morgan to Rogers' Gap for the purpose of entering Powell's Valley, Tennessee, thereby turning the position of the Gap and cutting off the enemy from their communications with Knoxville, was suddenly arrested, when General Morgan's forces had nearly all concentrated at Rogers' Gap, by a telegraphic dispatch from General Buell, ordering a retrograde movement and stopping all further operations on the Tennessee side against the Gap. The countermarching began immediately, but owing to the narrowness of the road, proceeded very slowly. I was ordered by General Morgan to cover the movement, and to be the last to leave with my brigade. About thirty or forty hours after the main body of the force had retrograded I received the information that the enemy was evacuating the Gap. I immediately informed General Morgan of the same, and stated that I should not continue the retrograde movement with the troops under my command without further orders from him. General Morgan approved of this course, and sent me word that he would recommence the forward movement. The troops were once more reconcentrated at Rogers' Gap, and on the 18th of June the whole force moved and marched into the Gap, my advance guard entering the same a very few hours after the rear guard of the enemy had departed from it.

While in possession of Cumberland Gap General Morgan effected very little more than sending out some foraging parties on different occasions. I commanded two of those parties, and took the direction of Tazewell, about 13 miles south of Cumberland Gap. The first foraging expedition was perfectly successful; the second one, which began on the 3d of August and operated around Tazewell until the 6th, was also successful, the enemy always retiring and being evidently in very small force. On the 6th, however, my advance posts, composed of the Sixteenth Ohio, were very suddenly attacked by a very superior force, which I afterward discovered was under the command of General Stevenson, and which I have every reason to believe, from the reports of the enemy and from our own officers, prisoners in their hands, was composed of about 20,000 men, with a large amount of artillery. This force we held in check on the 6th of August from 11 o'clock a. m. till half past 3 p. m., when they retreated from my front, and merely continued an artillery fire until 6 in the evening, when I made my return to the Gap unmolested or without even an attempt being made by the enemy to follow me.

Two days afterward the Gap was invested on the southern side; and I believe about the 11th or 12th of August the investment of the Gap on both sides, on the Tennessee and Kentucky sides, was completed by the forces of Stevenson and Kirby Smith.

The success of the previous foraging expeditions will go far to show that Eastern Tennessee was not occupied in force by the enemy between the dates of the 18th of June and on or about the 15th of July. I remember distinctly asking General Morgan, shortly after our occupation of the Gap on the 18th of June, to allow me to proceed with my brigade toward a point near Morristown, Jefferson County, Tenn., to there tap the railroad, believing that said operation would have materially interfered with the commissary arrangements of the enemy. This permission was refused me by General Morgan, owing, I believe, to his instructions or orders from General Buell not allowing him to undertake any very decided initiative steps toward Knoxville.

* Not found.

I finally state that I believe General Morgan had every wish, inclination, and power to operate offensively in Eastern Tennessee, but was prevented by general instructions or orders, always premising, however, that this officer could not have undertaken any successful operation after the 15th of July.

Question. What was the force under General Bragg after the junction of all the rebel forces in Kentucky?

I can only answer this question on the basis of the opinions of others. I have now been two months in Kentucky, and from what I can gather of well-informed persons who saw a great deal of Kirby Smith's, Bragg's, and Stevenson's forces, and from what I can remember while we were at the Gap after the 6th of August and the information we gathered during our retreat toward the Ohio River, my opinion is that Bragg never could have concentrated at any one time a larger force than 60,000 men, and this is including the recruits he picked up in Kentucky during the rebel raid. I am more inclined to believe that Bragg had a force inferior to that number by several thousand, because I am of opinion that Stevenson never formed a complete junction with him, that officer being afraid to uncover the road to Cumberland Gap, and must therefore have kept a large fraction of his forces in that position in order to maintain it, to keep open their lines of retreat.

Question. Do you believe that Knoxville could have been taken by our forces after we had possession of Cumberland Gap?

I do. I believe, further, with most complete success could General Morgan have operated toward that town in co-operation with a real advance toward the east by the forces under Major-General Buell. For several weeks after our occupation of the Gap we received constant information that the enemy had never more than 6,000 or 7,000 men in and around Knoxville.

General BUELL. I must, Mr. President, object to this deposition. I could properly object to this testimony in any form. This officer, it appears, has the command of a brigade at Vicksburg, but at the time he gave this deposition he was at Lexington, I suppose on leave of absence. I understand moreover that he has been before the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The deposition was taken in this room.

General BUELL. Then with what propriety is his deposition taken? Moreover the evidence is made up of opinion merely, without giving in any respect the ground upon which the opinion is based. Besides, it is not the best evidence upon some points it bears upon. He asserts that General Morgan received certain instructions. General Morgan's evidence is the best upon that point; at least better than Colonel De Courcy's. The statements, too, are untrue, many of them, and can be proved to be so. The documentary evidence shows that General Morgan had no such instructions upon that point; and there is a good deal of evidence before the Commission as to the movements of Stevenson's force which shows that this testimony is untrue, so that the whole matter is improper as evidence. But this cannot be fully shown without a close examination in court or the introduction of other evidence. It would afford an admirable text for a newspaper article, and that is the substance of its value. I could object to it also on the ground that whereas it is introduced as rebutting evidence it is not so at all in some essential particulars, but is purely original matter. That is particularly the case with reference to the possible movements of General Morgan's force from Cumberland Gap. If the deposition is admitted as evidence I shall desire the evidence of General Morgan upon points to which it relates, particularly as to the instructions he received. Whatever instructions he had were written and can be easily produced. They are in fact on your files, though there is perhaps nothing to show that they are all there. Upon that point General Morgan is the best witness. I do not suppose such testimony as this deposition contains would be received as evidence by any competent court.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There is one portion of General Buell's remarks that I am compelled to notice, and that is as to the form in which this testimony appears before the Commission. As to the weight to be attached to Colonel De Courcy's affidavit, that is further along and for the Commission to determine. So far as the deposition itself is concerned I asked and obtained permission to introduce it. I forwarded certain queries to Colonel De Courcy at Lexington, where he was on sick leave, after having submitted them to General Buell. To my surprise Colonel De Courcy made his appearance here after we adjourned on the 16th, but it was too late to secure his evidence, and I proceeded to take his affidavit as it now appears before you. I do not care to go into an argument as to whether it is rebutting evidence or not or whether it is evidence worthy of belief; the first was argued before, and the last is out of my province and not pertinent to the objections raised by General Buell. I will say, however, that General Buell misapplies the term "better evidence." General Morgan's evidence might be more satisfactory, but could not be legally termed "better evidence," so as to bring it within the rule appealed to by General Buell.

General BUELL. The excuse for not taking Colonel De Courcy's evidence before the Commission when he appeared here is certainly not satisfactory. With reference to the evidence of General Morgan, it is only of value as verifying the documentary evidence that has been submitted and as showing whether he received any other instructions than those on record. I do not desire it for any other purpose, nor do I desire to have the opinion of General Morgan as to what operations could have been attempted by the force under his command in contradiction to the opinion of Colonel De Courcy. As far as my instructions are concerned they were determined by the dispatches I received from him. Most of these dispatches I have submitted to the Commission. I have more to submit this morning, and they give the Commission all the information I had from General Morgan so far as I know. I received information from another quarter which had some influence upon my instructions, but it is immaterial here. If the judge-advocate admits that the documentary evidence I have submitted includes all the instructions that were given to General Morgan it is sufficient; if he does not admit it, it is proper that General Morgan's evidence should be had before the Commission on that point. General Morgan's evidence is certainly better than Colonel De Courcy's in regard to it.

The court was then cleared; when, on vote, it was decided that the deposition of Colonel De Courcy should be received.

On the opening of the court—

General BUELL. I request the evidence of General Morgan. I wish General Morgan to produce any and all orders that he received while in command of the Seventh Division there, and that controlled his actions in any manner in moving on Cumberland Gap and while there. I request also that Colonel De Courcy may be called before the Commission for cross-examination. I understand he is still in the city. I request also that Col. John Coburn, who was an officer in General Morgan's command, and was with Colonel De Courcy in some of his operations, may be called before the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I shall oppose going into any further evidence in this connection or disturb the resolution passed on the 16th. It is a matter of regret to me that I did not have General Morgan before the Commission and go into the operations of the army in Tennessee; but it is too late now to do so. There is nothing whatever, as General Buell says, in this deposition of Colonel De Courcy that would require such an investigation as General Buell now calls for that I can discover.

General TYLER. I wish to inquire whether these interrogatories were submitted to General Buell before they were answered by Colonel De Courcy?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The whole matter connected with Colonel De Courcy and his testimony is a matter of record. Half a dozen witnesses were proposed to be examined by deposition, and the questions which were read before the Commission were decided to be very proper. I asked General Buell at the time to add any cross-interrogatories he might wish to put to the witnesses, not only to Colonel De Courcy, but to all the witnesses I proposed to examine, and he returned me answer that he had none to ask.

General BUELL. I gave that answer because I did not admit the propriety of taking the evidence of these witnesses in this way. I asserted before that it was proper to have them before the Commission, and I will say now that it would be impossible to frame any system of questions that would meet such evidence as this. It would be impossible to cross-examine on evidence that never could have been anticipated.

The court was cleared; when, on vote, it was decided that the rule which prohibited the introduction of further testimony should be suspended, and that Colonel De Courcy be subpoenaed before the Commission.

On vote it was further decided that no other witnesses should be called.

On the opening of the court the judge-advocate introduced and read the deposition of Governor Johnson, as follows:

Deposition of Hon. Andrew Johnson, Military Governor of Tennessee, April 22, 1863.

HON. ANDREW JOHNSON, Military Governor of Tennessee and brigadier-general U. S. Volunteers, being duly sworn, responds to the questions submitted by the judge-advocate of the Commission called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio and the cross-interrogatories of Major-General Buell, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADOCATE:

Question. State your name, present address, and position in the service of the United States.

Andrew Johnson; Nashville, Tenn. I was brigadier-general in the volunteer service and Military Governor of Tennessee.

Question. State what you know of Major-General Buell proposing to evacuate Nashville in the summer of 1862 on the approach of the rebel forces under Bragg.

In September, 1862, General Buell, on his retrograde move with his army from Huntsville, Ala., Decherd and Battle Creek, Tenn., reached Nashville. Upon General Buell's arrival in Nashville I sought and had an interview with him in regard to the army falling back and giving up the country we had once been in possession of. With the retreat of the army the rumor came, and it was repeated by the rebels, that Nashville would be evacuated and surrendered to the enemy in the same condition we had received it. It was also understood that a number of prominent persons who had formerly resided in Nashville, in Tennessee, were returning with Bragg and in the retreat of General Buell's army, with the understanding that Nashville was to be surrendered. These rumors caused me to be exceedingly solicitous as to what was to be done. In the first interview with General Buell, after some conversation in regard to the policy of a retreat, I asked him the question directly whether Nashville was to be given up to the enemy or evacuated without making resistance. I urged at some length and with much earnestness the great importance of holding Nashville at all hazards, and in the end, rather than it should be retaken and held by the enemy, that it should be destroyed. This interview ended and another was had, in which the same arguments were repeated and urged as to the propriety of holding Nashville. General Buell replied with some little warmth that he was indifferent as to the criticism that might be made in regard to his policy or manner of conducting the campaign. He should rely upon his own judgment and convictions, without regard to consequences. The holding of Nashville in a military point of view was of no very great importance; that in fact upon military principles Nashville should have been abandoned or evacuated three months ago. In the third interview with General Buell, after repeating and urging again the importance of holding Nashville, he then stated that he had come to the conclusion to leave a force for the defense of Nashville, in answer to which I expressed my gratification and thanked him sincerely for doing so. He stated, though, in leaving a force for the defense of Nashville that he did not do it so much from military as from political considerations which had been pressed with so much earnestness upon him. We then separated. I think this was on Wednesday. On Thursday he left in pursuit of the army, which was then advancing toward Bowling Green, Ky.; on Friday a courier returned with a dispatch to General Thomas, who had been left in command of the forces for the defense of Nashville, notifying him to be in readiness to march with his division and General Palmer's on Sunday morning. Another dispatch was received from General Buell by General Thomas to march unless a certain portion of Bragg's army should be in striking distance of Nashville, and in that event he (General Thomas), in his discretion, to leave General Palmer with his command, which he did. It was understood, though, at this time that Bragg's army had passed into Kentucky. General Thomas, notwithstanding Bragg had passed with his forces, upon my earnest solicitation left General Palmer with his division and marched with his own in compliance with General Buell's dispatch. With the courier returning to General Buell on Sunday morning I forwarded a letter, in which I urged and pressed the importance of General Thomas remaining at Nashville or his being returned in the event he marched before the letter reached him; but General Thomas and his command did not return. There was much said pro and con by General Buell and myself in regard to the evacuation of Nashville which is deemed immaterial in this deposition. This deposition has been made in the absence of dispatches and letters which would be important to refer to as to dates and days, which are not remembered by me at this moment.

ANDREW JOHNSON,

Military Governor and Brigadier-General of Tennessee.

I hereby certify that the above-named Andrew Johnson, Military Governor of Tennessee and brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States service, was on the 22d day of April, A. D. 1863, at the city of Washington, duly sworn previous to responding as above.

DONN PIATT, U. S. V.,

Lieutenant-Colonel and Judge-Advocate.

General BUELL. I urge that the deposition of Governor Johnson shall be received. I also urge that he shall be called upon for the dispatches referred to in the deposition.

General DANA. I should like to ask if that last question is rebutting evidence?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir.

General DANA. Then, if the court is cleared, I will make a motion in regard to that deposition.

The court was cleared; when, on motion, it was decided that, the deposition of Governor Johnson not being in the nature of rebutting evidence, it be excluded from the record.

On the opening of the court—

The PRESIDENT. It is decided, general, that the deposition of Governor Johnson shall not be received.

General BUELL. I am very sorry for it, sir; I request that I may be allowed to take a copy of it.

General DANA. I move that the original be turned over to General Buell.

General TYLER. The Commission has no control over that document.

General DANA. I am of opinion that, an attempt having been made to introduce it, it is the property of the court.

The PRESIDENT. The practice of civil courts would make that the property of the judge-advocate.

General BUELL. Is it not a fact that that paper is before you as evidence, that it belongs to your records, and that you have decided not to recognize it as evidence? It has been read before the Commission, it was brought before the Commission in pursuance of its orders, and is it not properly a part of your record?

The PRESIDENT. It was read to the Commission, not as testimony, but for the purpose of gratifying your request, to see whether you would consent to receive it or object to it; but it was not received as evidence. It stands, then, in this shape: it is a deposition taken by order of the Commission; it was presented to it with a view to a decision whether it was to be received or not, and the Commission has decided not to receive it; and that at once makes it the property of the judge-advocate.

General BUELL. This appears to be a different case, sir. This paper stands precisely in the light of any evidence taken before the Commission. The Commission authorized and ordered it. The judge-advocate superintended it. I think, sir, that it belongs to your records.

General DANA. The record will show the fact that this deposition of Governor Johnson, like other documents prepared by the judge-advocate and presented to the court, belongs to the Commission; that upon the question being raised as to whether it should be received or not it was rejected. It presents the fact that it was offered as evidence and was rejected; not that it was received as testimony or that it becomes part and parcel of our record.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate has offered it to you as evidence; if it is not valuable to you it may be to me. The paper forms part of your record; you may determine not to receive it as evidence for any reason you may think proper; but I am of opinion that it forms part of your record.

The court was cleared; when it was moved to reconsider the vote taken in regard to the deposition of Governor Johnson and carried.

It was then moved that the deposition of Governor Johnson be admitted.

Carried.

On the question whether the dispatches referred to by Governor Johnson in his deposition and asked for by General Buell shall be called for it was put to the vote and negatived.

On the court being opened—

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. This deposition of Colonel Fry, Mr. President, was taken at Washington in an informal manner, and I had no time to read it over or prepare a cross-examination. I desire to read it over, Mr. President, before I submit it to the Commission.

General BUELL. I am astonished at the proposition, sir. This evidence is as valid as though it had been delivered by the witness before the Commission. As for the judge-advocate not cross-examining him because he had not time, I do not know any reason why he had not. If he had started twenty-four hours after I did he could have been at Washington on Sunday at 1 o'clock. We delayed two days in Washington for him.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I will ask why there was a delay of two days in Washington for me?

General BUELL. Because the judge-advocate gave the excuse that sufficient time was not allowed him when I served the notice upon him. I therefore did not know but there might have been something to interfere with his journey, and I therefore delayed till the last moment when the evidence could be prepared.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I see nothing unreasonable in my request. I have had no opportunity to read it.

General BUELL. I notified the judge-advocate that the examination would continue from day to day.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Did the examination commence on Monday the 20th of April?

General BUELL. No, sir; it did not. I am astonished at this objection.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I make no objection. I simply desire to have an opportunity of reading the deposition. All that I have yet seen was the rough draught I read over at Colonel Fry's office.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate fails to be present at the taking of the deposition and then takes advantage of the informality.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The informality was not on my part. The informality was in General Buell's not beginning the examination when he should have done so. The examination was not commenced when I got there, and then it occupied all the time we had to spare before leaving.

General BUELL. Did you not read this evidence?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Certainly; but I had no time to form a cross-examination upon it.

General BUELL. How could you have done it, then, had the examination been commenced in advance?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It would then have been completed, and I would have had the whole of Wednesday to myself. I was surprised to find on reaching Washington that no steps had been taken to get Colonel Fry's deposition. But I say now I make no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT. Why do you wish to read it before reading it to the Commission?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. To see if there is anything requiring cross-examination.

General BUELL. I have several other papers to present, as this is the last day on which you have decided to receive them. Some of these papers may appear in the files already presented; others do not.

The PRESIDENT. Are they copies or originals?

General BUELL. Some of them are copies and others are originals. Some of them are copies made at Washington, and of whose existence I was not aware till my late visit there.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I shall object to the introduction of any evidence except such as is included in the resolution of the Commission, and that is Colonel Fry's deposition only. It was understood that General Buell had introduced all his documentary evidence. To come in now with additional evidence is to open up the whole case.

General BUELL. These are papers that came into my possession at Washington; they were not within my reach before.

The PRESIDENT. What is the subject of these papers, general, that you propose to introduce?

General BUELL. They are upon different subjects connected with the operations of the army under my command. Some of them are dispatches from General Morgan at Cumberland Gap.

The PRESIDENT. Is not your file complete without them?

General BUELL. No, sir. These (a portion of the papers held by General Buell) are dispatches I found in Colonel Fry's possession at Washington; another is a dispatch to me from the Secretary of War, dated the 12th of May, representing the necessity of increasing the Government forces in East Tennessee and Kentucky; another is a dispatch from General Thomas to General Halleck, requesting that the order as signing him to the command of the army at Louisville shall be revoked. I desire this dispatch to be received particularly, as it has been represented that that request was made from motives of generosity. The dispatch gives a different reason for it. I have another paper which I have been advised by my friends to submit. I should not otherwise have done it. It is a copy of some resolutions which were passed at the recent session of the Legislature of Kentucky, expressive of thanks for the services which were rendered to Kentucky by the army under my command.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have no objection to that last-named paper being introduced, but I shall object to the others. I see no reason for violating the practice of civil courts and certainly none for violating the decision of the Commission. That dispatch of General Thomas makes it incumbent upon me not to admit it. It is really opening up the whole case again, and I do not think it would be proper at this late day. The resolutions passed by the Legislature of Kentucky I have no objection to. I would introduce them myself as to that matter.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that, the judge-advocate having objected to the introduction of the papers offered by General Buell, with the exception of the resolution of thanks by the Legislature of Kentucky, the objection be sustained.

On the opening of the court—

General BUELL. As you have refused to receive the other documentary evidence I offered, I decline to present the copy of the resolution of thanks offered by the Legislature of Kentucky for the services performed by my troops in Kentucky last fall.

Col. JOHN F. DE COURCY was then introduced, and his cross-examination proceeded as follows:

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. You have stated in your deposition presented to this Commission that the march of General Morgan to turn the enemy's position at Cumberland Gap last summer was suddenly arrested, when General Morgan's forces had nearly all concentrated at Rogers' Gap, by a telegraphic dispatch from General Buell ordering a retrograde movement and stopping all further operations on the Tennessee side of the Gap. State what knowledge you have of such instructions.

I was in the same house at Rogers' Gap with General Morgan the day when his troops were nearly all concentrated there. I may as well state that we marched by two routes, some by Rogers' Gap and some by Big Creek Gap, and we were expecting to move next day on toward the Gap, when General Morgan sent for me some time in the afternoon and showed me a telegraphic dispatch which he had just received from General Buell. The dispatch was to the effect that he should not proceed with the enterprise, and compelled him to give us orders to countermarch all the troops. I read the dispatch myself, but do not remember the exact wording of it.

Question. Do you mean to say that that was the necessary effect of the dispatch or that that was the result?

I do. I remember distinctly discussing with General Morgan whether the order could be read in such a manner as to allow him to carry on the operations after having carried them to that point. I remember, further, even discussing whether it was necessary to return to the Cumberland Ford, or whether he might not change his base of operations and take a base more toward the west, somewhere near Barbourville, so as to threaten more continually the enemy's communications with the Gap and Knoxville.

Question. Did you concur with General Morgan in the interpretation of that dispatch that it required him not only to cease further operations in advance but to fall back?

I did interpret it as General Morgan did, but deemed that General Morgan's not strictly obeying the orders was almost imperative on him at the time, owing to the demoralization that had come over his troops on receiving this order. I deemed, further, that had General Morgan disobeyed the order he would not have been blamed by General Buell, because our information of the enemy's weakness in the Gap was so certain (I may say) that we felt equally certain of taking possession of it as soon as we had cut off that communication, which we did the very day we appeared on the south side of the Gap. This discussion was a very long one, and General Buell's interests in the matter as a soldier were as much looked to as General Morgan's. I felt convinced at the time, and I believe so expressed it to General Morgan, that General Buell would have approved of the course of conduct under the circumstances, as General Buell could not have known when he sent his dispatch that General Morgan had advanced so far on so long and so difficult a march. One part of the march, I being in advance with my brigade, we had to construct 2 miles of road, besides cutting out about 6 miles of blockade, extending with interruptions about 6 miles. If my memory serves me, I believe no communication had taken place between General Buell and General Morgan for several days previous to the receipt of the dispatch now in question.

Question. Were those instructions executed according to the interpretation you placed upon them?

They were to a degree.

Question. Was the enemy supposed to be in possession of Cumberland Gap at that time?

He was.

Question. Did General Morgan subsequently depart from those instructions, according to your interpretation of them, by going to Cumberland Gap?

Strictly speaking he did, and I was the principal cause of it. Immediately after the receipt of the dispatch General Morgan ordered a counter-march of all the troops then assembled at Rogers' Gap, and directed me to cover the movement with my brigade, the enemy then being in the valley skirmishing with my advance post. The movement began and was completed, so far as the other brigades were concerned, and I had ordered one regiment of my brigade to follow. This regiment had proceeded about half a mile on its way back when a well-known Union man, a Tennessean, arrived at the mill at Rogers' Gap, where I was staying, with information that the enemy was leaving the Gap. I made inquiries of this man, and his answers were of such a nature as to convince me that he was telling the truth. I immediately stopped the movement of my brigade and of two batteries which were to move through Rogers' Gap, and forwarded a dispatch of my action to General Morgan, who had been then gone about twenty-four or thirty hours, I believe. He answered, approving of what I had done, and informed me that he would return and concentrate there once more all our troops.

Question. If those instructions were of so vague and indefinite a character that General Morgan could depart from them when there was no enemy to oppose him, do you not think that he could with greater propriety have departed from them when there was some danger but great advantage to be gained by such departure?

I do not think the instructions were vague. The discussion which took place as to obeying was not so much a question of interpreting the order, but respected more the necessities of the case as it then stood, keeping in view that General Buell probably could not have been at that time well informed as to the position of General Morgan's troops. The disobedience of the order, if disobedience there be in the act, after we had heard that the Gap was evacuated, was, in my opinion, imperative on General Morgan, because the enemy would certainly hear of our retrograde movement that evening and might have returned to the Gap and we should have had all our trouble over again, whilst by marching directly upon him from Rogers' Gap—a much shorter route than the other one would have been and a much easier one—we made certain of taking and holding the position. There were also some political considerations connected with this: the appearance of Union troops in that valley was necessary to give encouragement to the loyal Tennesseans, who had been suffering for a long time from the enemy's occupation of Cumberland Gap.

Question. Was there any reasonable doubt of the success of your movement against Cumberland Gap when General Morgan received those instructions?

I for one had none; not that I supposed we should take the Gap by assault from the south side, but I deemed that our appearance there would so embarrass the enemy, by cutting off his line of communication, that before many days he would have to capitulate or retreat by one of his flanks along by the train of one of the Cumberland Mountains.

Question. Which would have been the greater advantage, that which resulted from the occupation of Cumberland Gap by the capitulation or the forced withdrawal of the rebel garrison—which you have supposed probable—or the marching into that position and occupying it when there was no enemy there to oppose you?

Taking possession of the Gap after the capitulation of the enemy would have been the most advantageous.

Question. Do you not think, then, that the circumstances which justified the departure from those instructions for a lesser advantage would have justified a similar departure for a greater?

I can only answer this question by stating that when discussing General Buell's dispatch at Rogers' Gap with General Morgan I was in favor of considering that General Buell did not know the difficult marching we had pursued for so many days on our way to attack the Gap, believing and trusting that General Buell would have approved of the conduct after our success.

Question. Can you give the date of these instructions, colonel, and state by whom they were signed?

I cannot, sir.

Question. Can you give the date approximately?

Approximately about the 10th of June; but there may be a difference of two or three days in the date.

Question. How soon after the receipt of those instructions did General Morgan assume the offensive against Cumberland Gap?

He had reconcentrated all his troops by the evening of the 17th of June, when we marched on the morning of the 18th, my brigade being the advance guard, and the cavalry of my advance entered the Gap about 2 o'clock p. m. the same day, the infantry about 6 o'clock.

Question. Do I understand you that the 17th was the date when the retrograde movement was suspended and the advance resumed?

Several days took place betwixt the suspension of the movement and the resumption of the advance.

Question. Can you state about how many days?

It was a very confused backward and forward movement. I could not state positively.

Question. Can you state the date of your recommendation of the resumption of the march?

I did not recommend the resumption of the march, and informed General Morgan that I had not obeyed his order, but had halted with my brigade and some artillery. I believe this took place about the 12th of June. It took place about forty-eight hours after the receipt of General Buell's order.

Question. Were you ever informed that General Morgan was authorized to act on the offensive or not, at his own discretion, after the receipt of the instructions you have referred to?

I do not remember his receiving such distinct instructions before our occupation of the Gap.

Question. Read this dispatch, if you please, colonel, and see if this is the one you have in your mind.

The dispatch presented to the witness was as follows :

“HEADQUARTERS, June 10, 1862.

“General MORGAN, Cumberland Ford :

“Considering your force and that opposed to you, it will probably not be safe for you to undertake any extended offensive operations. Other operations will soon have an influence upon your designs, and it is therefore better for you to run no risk at present.

“JAMES B. FRY,
“Colonel and Chief of Staff.”

This does not appear strongly enough worded to have allowed General Morgan to doubt for one moment the advisability of his advancing on the Gap, considering the difficulties he had to overcome, unless the word “other,” which appears in this dispatch, may have had an influence at the time in inducing General Morgan to obey strictly the slightest wish, for fear of embarrassing the movements of General Buell; and yet I must believe that this is the identical dispatch which caused the retrograde movement, because I cannot now remember any other dispatch similar to this, and I do remember the latter part of the dispatch, namely, “other operations will soon have an influence upon your designs, and it is therefore better for you to run no risk at present,” having been read by me in some dispatch shown to me by General Morgan.

Question. I wish to submit this dispatch to you also, colonel, and ask whether in view of this dispatch the other ought not to have been considered suggestive rather than imperative :

“CUMBERLAND FORD, June 8, 1862.

“Major-General BUELL :

“Baird’s brigade marches this morning and Carter will close up the rear to-morrow. It has become necessary to station the Forty-ninth Indiana, with two pieces of artillery, at Barbourville. On yesterday a spy, pretending to be a deserter, was brought into camp. He left Cumberland Gap on the day before yesterday at 2 o’clock a. m. He reports the enemy’s force at Cumberland Gap at over 5,000; at Big Creek Gap at 18,000, with troops at Clinton and Knoxville. Should their forces concentrate they outnumber us nearly three to one. What is General Negley doing? Answer at once, as I start at noon to go to the head of the column. I send copy of this to Governor Johnson and to the Secretary of War.

“GEORGE W. MORGAN.”

After reading this communication from General Morgan I consider the dispatch from General Buell as suggestive rather than a direct order.

Question. Colonel, look at this dispatch also, if you please, and state whether you ever saw it or were informed of its contents :

“HEADQUARTERS, June 10, 1862.

“General MORGAN, Cumberland Ford :

“Your information with regard to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap may be true; and, if so, it probably resulted from General Mitchel’s force appearing before Chattanooga. If the Gap is evacuated you should seize and hold it and take any other advantage that may present itself, but not advance to points from which you would have to fall back.

“JAMES B. FRY,
“Colonel and Chief of Staff.”

I think I have seen this dispatch before.

Question. Do you consider that this dispatch restrained General Morgan from pursuing any advantage that might present itself to him?

I cannot answer the question in relation to the dispatch, but I can remember distinctly General Morgan telling me, shortly after the occupation of the Gap, that he was restrained from acting offensively by the orders or instructions contained in a dispatch that he had received from General Buell. Whether General Morgan referred to the dispatch just read or some other received previous to our conversation I cannot say. But he gave me this information in consequence of my asking him to allow me to proceed and tap the railroad at Morristown.

Commission adjourned to meet on Saturday, April 25, 1863, at 11 o'clock a. m.

[APRIL 25, 1863.]

Testimony of Col. J. B. FRY, Provost-Marshal-General.

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States; whether you were on duty with the Army of the Ohio, under the command of Major-General Buell; in what capacity and for what period.

My name is James B. Fry; I am lieutenant-colonel in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army, and additional aide-de-camp with rank of colonel, and at this time I am Provost-Marshal-General of the United States. I was on duty with the Army of the Ohio, commanded by General Buell, from the time he assumed command of that army, on 15th of November, 1861, until he relinquished the command of it, on 30th October, 1862, and during this period I was assistant adjutant-general and chief of staff of that army.

Question. State what you know of the movement of the Army of the Ohio from Corinth to North Alabama in June, 1862, the orders under which it marched, the points from which it marched, the dates of arrival and departure, the causes of any delay that may have occurred on the march, the strength of the army, the measures taken by its commander to supply it on the march and after its arrival, and whether the march and the measures on which it was dependent were prosecuted with industry.

Corinth fell into our hands on the 29th of May; within two or three days from this time Wood's division of the Army of the Ohio was by order of General Halleck pushed to the east and along the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, with orders to repair the railroad as it proceeded, the intention being, as it was understood, to establish railroad communication with Mitchel's division, then in North Alabama; and General Halleck intimated his intention of sending the Army of the Ohio to operate against Tennessee. On this intimation orders were at once, about June 1 or 2, sent to the staff officers at Louisville and Nashville, warning them to be ready with supplies to meet such a movement, and orders were given to send supplies at once to Eastport, the highest point at which the Tennessee is navigable for ordinary boats, to meet Wood's division, and be in readiness for the rest of the army when ordered to the eastward. On the 4th of June, General Buell, with Nelson's and Crittenden's divisions, started, in pursuance of orders from General Halleck, to join General Pope, who was pursuing the enemy down the Mobile and Ohio Railroad and who asked for re-enforcements.

The pursuit of the enemy ceased near Booneville, Miss.; and on or about June 10 orders were received for the Army of the Ohio to proceed to North Alabama. Orders were immediately sent to officers of the supply department in Louisville and Nashville directing them to throw forward supplies to meet the now actually ordered, and General Mitchel was again directed to push repairs on Nashville and Tennessee River Railroad and to accumulate supplies as rapidly as possible. The two divisions above mentioned marched from Booneville on the 10th of June; McCook's division marched from Corinth on the 11th of June. McCook and Crittenden, according to orders, proceeded to and reached South Florence on the 15th of June. Nelson was halted at Inka to guard the railroad and aid in repairing it and wait until the ferry should be ready at Florence. The preparation of a suitable ferry was at once commenced under Lieutenant Morton, the engineer, and by the 22d was completed, and was capable of crossing a division a day, with its transportation, and perhaps more. No other delay occurred on the march but that required to arrange this ferry; the labor was pushed with industry and energy, and no time was lost. The Memphis and Charleston road and our forces working upon it were at this time threatened by the enemy, who lay within striking distance to the south of us, and considerable apprehension was felt for the safety of Wood's division if it should be left scattered along the railroad at the work required of it after the rest of the army had crossed the river. It was therefore doubted whether if the ferry could have been completed in less time than it was it would have been judicious to cross until Wood's division had pushed so far along toward Decatur as to be out of danger. A demonstration actually made upon the line by the enemy was checked or watched by the movement of a division from Corinth under the orders of General Halleck. The divisions of the Army of the Ohio at the time of crossing the Tennessee at Florence averaged a little less than 6,000 effectives. The crossing was commenced on the 23d and continued as rapidly as the troops could take up the line of march with proper intervals on the opposite side, Nelson's division being brought forward from Iuka to the ferry. Baggage was reduced at Florence before crossing, the surplus being sent off by water. All the wagons that could be spared from the troops were sent from Florence to Reynolds' Station to haul supplies over the break in the Nashville and Decatur road, a break of about 40 miles by the route which had to be taken. The leading division (McCook's) camped near Huntsville on the 28th of June; the other two (Crittenden's and Nelson's) were at prescribed distances in rear. The distance marched in the twenty-four days between the 4th and 28th of June was about 150 miles. During this time the ferry was constructed on the Tennessee River, and the troops, animals, and wagons crossed by means of it. I am therefore of opinion that the march was prosecuted with industry and energy. Among the causes of the delay, if there is deemed to have been any delay in the march herein referred to, may be mentioned the suffering of the troops and animals from extreme heat and from dust and a scarcity of water. During all this march forage was obtained from the country.

Question. After the arrival of the four divisions of the Army of the Ohio in North Alabama, about the last of June, what further obstacles were to be overcome in a farther advance upon Chattanooga; what supplies could be procured in the country through which the army had to march; what difficulties interfered with the ready procuring of supplies from Louisville or other points where they could be obtained; what were the natural obstacles to be overcome between North Alabama and Chattanooga; what measures were taken to overcome the difficulties above alluded to; were those measures prosecuted with zeal and energy; and, under the circumstances, was it possible for the army to pursue its march uninterruptedly to Chattanooga, its point of destination?

The third brigade of Wood's division did not complete its labor on the railroad and cross the Tennessee River until about the 6th of July. The further obstacles to be overcome in a farther advance on Chattanooga were a want of supplies and a want of means to procure them. The country between Huntsville and Chattanooga is poor; in fact is almost destitute of supplies. No provisions of consequence could be obtained, and forage enough to subsist the animals in the move could not have been procured along the line. It was expected that the railroad to Nashville would have been completed by 1st of July. General Mitchel reported that such would be the case, but it was not so, and the ready procurement of supplies from Nashville was prevented by the condition of the railroads; supplies did not go from Louisville to Nashville as rapidly as they should have done for some reason not known. The commissary at Louisville reported that he could send but 75,000 rations per day over the Louisville and Nashville road. That was not more than the daily consumption. I know the accumulation at Nashville was not as rapid as it should have been. No proper effort seemed to have been made in North Alabama before the arrival of General Buell to hasten and husband the supplies from Louisville or gather the few which were in the country, and I am satisfied that army transportation, which should have been hauling corn from the country and provisions over the break in the railroad, was hauling cotton, and that this cotton passing over railroads under military control interfered with the accumulation of supplies in anticipation of the arrival in North Alabama of the forces under General Buell. The natural obstacles to be overcome between North Alabama and Chattanooga were the Tennessee River (which had to be bridged, as there was no means of constructing an adequate ferry) and the broken nature of the country. All the material for a bridge had to be got out of the standing timber, and the work done by men not schooled in that species of labor. This required some time, and the labor was prosecuted with zeal and energy. All the spare wagons in the army were necessary in hauling supplies over the break in the railroad heretofore mentioned. No advance from the Tennessee River could therefore be made until the break was repaired, so as to release the wagons and leave them free for hauling from the depot at Stevenson or the river to supply the army as it moved forward. South of the river, on the line to Chattanooga, the country is very barren and broken; the roads are difficult; the march of an army over them would necessarily be slow and its progress could readily be impeded by a very inferior force. Supplies and transportation and means of crossing the river were [not] there, being absolutely necessary in an advance on Chattanooga, and it was impossible for the army to have pursued its march uninterruptedly to Chattanooga. It may be proper to state that there was not much subsistence in North Alabama, and what there was was so scattered as to render it impracticable for a concentrated army to gather enough for its daily use. There was no salt meat, but few cattle, and the corn was standing in fields often at a considerable distance from each other.

Question. When did the division of General Thomas join the army in North Alabama and what delayed its arrival? Pending the preparation to advance on Chattanooga, and before the rebel army crossed the Tennessee River in force, what were the operations of the enemy's cavalry on the lines of communication of the army and with what effect, and what dispositions were made of the troops comprising the army; for what reasons and with what object?

The division of General Thomas joined the army in North Alabama on the 2d or 3d of August. I understand its arrival to have been delayed because it was deemed necessary to keep it west of the river. On the 30th of June General Halleck telegraphed General Buell that General Thomas' division could not join him, and that he (General Halleck) might have to take another division from General Buell. I understood this to be in consequence of some orders or contemplated orders for the movement of a large part of General Halleck's force to some other field of operations. Pending the preparation to advance on Chattanooga the enemy's cavalry and guerrillas operated boldly and effectively on the lines of communication of the army. The first bridge was destroyed on or about the 9th of July, and from this time to the end of the campaign the road was destroyed almost as fast as it was repaired. On the 13th of July the enemy's cavalry captured our forces at Murfreesborough, and destroyed the road the next day after it was in running order for the first time. Other less important breaks were made and important bridges were twice injured by floods. The success of the enemy's cavalry at Murfreesborough not only destroyed the Chattanooga Railroad just completed and disorganized our forces at that place, but endangered Nashville. The dispositions made on this account were to send one division and all the available cavalry from the main army to Murfreesborough via Nashville. The reasons for this were that the state of affairs required it, and in addition to this General Halleck telegraphed that these raids should be stopped even if the Chattanooga expedition had to be delayed. The object was to re-establish the line of communication and establish a force at McMinnville to cover this line and Nashville. The brigade captured or broken up at Murfreesborough was to have taken post at McMinnville for this purpose. The cavalry was to operate directly against that of the enemy. It was found impracticable to hold the road against large columns of cavalry, with field batteries, by small infantry posts, however well intrenched. After capturing Murfreesborough and disposing of the prisoners and stores the enemy's cavalry proceeded to the Louisville and Nashville road, captured a regiment of infantry at Gallatin on the 10th of August, and soon after met and defeated our cavalry column, and were thus at liberty to complete the destruction of our lines and ride over Kentucky. In answer to that part of this question which calls for a statement as to the effect of these operations I will state that in my opinion they constrained, in fact controlled, all the subsequent operations of the Army of the Ohio, for they cut it off from its depots, and it was not possible for the army to maneuver in the face of an enemy equal or superior in numbers and gather its supplies daily from the fields in a sparsely settled country, even if the country afforded enough.

Question. When were the railroads from Nashville to the Tennessee River completed; what further preparations were made to advance, and why did not the Army of the Ohio then at once advance on Chattanooga?

The first freight train passed from Nashville to Stevenson on 28th July. Supplies were immediately sent by rail to Stevenson, which was selected as the depot for the advance on Chattanooga, and further detailed preparations made for the advance. On the 10th of August, however, as previously stated, the post of Gallatin was captured and our cavalry soon after defeated and the Louisville and Nashville road completely destroyed, and a large cavalry force of the enemy was in Kentucky and not an adequate amount of supplies in Nashville. It was also known at this time that the enemy was strong at Chattanooga. Not more than four divisions (Thomas', Wood's, McCook's, and Crittenden's) could have been carried against him at this time. If the condition of affairs in our rear had permitted the advance I do not think this force was sufficient at this time.

Question. From what points did the rebel forces come which were collected to oppose the advance of the Army of the Ohio into East Tennessee; by what means were they moved, and, considering the railroad facilities which the enemy possessed, what was the probability of his being able to concentrate at Chattanooga all his available force not required for defense at other points before the Army of the Ohio could march to that point from Corinth, a distance of — miles, crossing the Tennessee River twice by means which had to be created?

The rebel forces collected at Chattanooga to resist the advance of the Army of the Ohio came mainly from Northern Mississippi (from Beauregard's Corinth army). The infantry moved by railroad; the cavalry and part of the artillery marched. I have no doubt of the enemy's ability to have concentrated at Chattanooga or any other point in East Tennessee all the forces he could spare from other operations before the Army of the Ohio could march from Corinth to the point in question, it having to march 200 miles and cross the Tennessee River twice by means which it had to create, the second crossing being probably opposed by the enemy.

Question. Under such circumstances what probability was there of the successful advance of 25,000 or even 30,000 men into East Tennessee unless the enemy was occupied by offensive operations at other vital points, and to what extent, as far as you know, was the large force of the enemy which retired from Corinth so occupied while the advance toward East Tennessee was being made?

Under the foregoing circumstances I think there was no probability of a successful advance of 25,000 or even 30,000 men into East Tennessee unless the enemy should be so occupied at other points as to be unable to spare troops to oppose this advance. To the best of my knowledge and belief the force of the enemy which withdrew from Corinth was not so occupied as to prevent its concentration for the purpose named, and I am satisfied that not as much as four regiments of that army was sent to Virginia.

Question. When did the rebel forces in East Tennessee commence their advance; at what points were they understood to have crossed the Tennessee River; what, according to the best information, was their immediate object; what route or routes did they intend to pursue, and what steps were taken by the commander of the Army of the Ohio to oppose the designs of the enemy?

From my recollection of the best information received at the time I should say the rebel forces in East Tennessee commenced their advance early in August. They were understood to have crossed the Tennessee River at Harrison, Blythe's Ferry, and Kingston. Their immediate object was understood to be the reoccupation of Middle Tennessee and capture of Nashville. The evidence on this point was as strong as could well be obtained on such a subject. There was reason to believe that they would pass into the Sequatchie Valley by the Poe and Anderson roads, and move thence down the valley by Jasper and Battle Creek, or continue on the Poe and Anderson roads and pass by Altamont or McMinnville, and thence by Winchester. Steps as follows were taken by the commander of the Army of the Ohio to oppose the design of the enemy. The Decatur road was abandoned; two divisions (Nelson's and Wood's) were sent to McMinnville; two (McCook's and Crittenden's) were already at Battle Creek; one (Schoepf's) was near Decherd, and the other (Rousseau's) was in part at Decherd and in part guarding the Chattanooga Railroad. After the movements to take these positions were completed and before the enemy had commenced to cross to the Sequatchie Valley the two divisions at Battle Creek were ordered to dispense with baggage, take only enough wagons to gather supplies, and move up the Sequatchie Valley, which is productive, subsist themselves on the valley as far as possible, and take a strong position near them, so as to control the valley and render the enemy's retreat to it unsafe. If forced back, these divisions were to retire on the Thermian road via Altamont and join the main army. This movement was commenced, but the senior general received information which led him to fear that it could not be completed in time, and he abandoned it and returned to Battle Creek and moved thence to Altamont. When it was known that the enemy was not going to pass down the valley via Battle Creek the Chattanooga road was abandoned as far north as Decherd, and soon after as far as Murfreesborough, the army being concentrated at that point.

Question. While the rebel army was advancing in front were the communications of the Army of the Ohio unmolested. If not, how were they interfered with and what cavalry force had the commander of the Army of the Ohio to guard against the danger from that cause?

As heretofore stated, the communications of the Army of the Ohio were molested by the rebel cavalry while the main army advanced. The cavalry force of the Army of the Ohio was insufficient to guard against the dangers to which the army was exposed by the operations of the rebel cavalry. The commander of the Army of the Ohio was able to concentrate only eight regiments of cavalry, and this was done by stripping the divisions; the regiments were much reduced in numbers, were run down by having been overworked, and in some cases not well managed and cared for, and in most cases having been insufficiently well armed, equipped, or instructed.

Question. What, according to the best information, was the strength of the rebel force which advanced into Middle Tennessee under General Bragg; when did the two divisions of the army under General Grant join the Army of the Ohio, and prior to that time what force of the Army of the Ohio could have been concentrated at a point as far in advance as McMinnville to oppose the enemy?

The accounts in regard to the strength of the rebel forces were various, eye-witnesses of their columns having given their numbers as high as 150,000 men. I think, however, their strength was quite accurately determined. The various items of reliable information were collected and reasonable calculations made, and from these and the accurate knowledge of the organization, chief officers, &c., it may be safely stated that their strength was between 45,000 and 60,000 men; probably something over 45,000. One division from General Grant's army joined the Army of the Ohio at Murfreesborough on September 1. Previous to this time the divisions of McCook, Nelson, Wood, Crittenden, and Schoepf, between 25,000 and 30,000 men, could have been concentrated at McMinnville if the question of forage and provisions were disregarded. The other division from General Grant's army entered Nashville about the 12th or 13th of September, after the main army had gone into Kentucky.

Question. Read the dispatch now shown you, dated the 22d of August, from Major-General Thomas; repeat the dispatch in your answer, and state what its meaning was according to your knowledge of the circumstances which gave rise to it.

I have read the dispatch, which is as follows:

"McMINNVILLE, August 22.

"Major-General BUELL, Decherd:

"By all means concentrate here. The enemy cannot reach Nashville by any other route across the mountain unless by Sparta or Altamont. I am positively informed that the enemy would have an equal advantage with ourselves here. We will have a most decided advantage, and by being here, should he march by Sparta, we can meet him either there or at Allen's Ford, across Caney Fork. He is obliged to pass Sparta to reach Nashville. I have six days' rations and plenty of ammunition. Did you get my dispatch of to-day? I cannot think that Bragg is coming here either by the Hill or by Therman road. My reconnoitering party went into Dunlap yesterday.

"THOMAS."

I was aware of the circumstances which gave rise to it, and its meaning was that concentration at McMinnville was preferable to concentration at Altamont, and it was written in connection with a consideration of those two points with regard to each other.

Question. Was it supposed or was there any ground to suppose that the rebel force which was in the Sequatchie Valley under the immediate command of General Bragg would cross the mountain to Sparta, and when was it known that that was his route?

It was not to my knowledge supposed, nor was there any ground to suppose, that the rebel army immediately under Bragg in the Sequatchie Valley would cross the mountains to Sparta; nor do I believe that that army intended to do so until it entertained the belief that its enemy were in force at Altamont and McMinnville. It was supposed that a force heard of as crossing at Kingston, and having a temporary depot at Crossville, might pass by Sparta. To the best of my knowledge and belief it was not known that Bragg was moving by Sparta until his advance actually reached that place early in September.

Question. Do you know any reasons for the belief that General Bragg changed his plan of campaign after leaving the Tennessee River, making Kentucky instead of Nashville his immediate object? If so, state what they are and when the change probably took place.

I have expressed the belief that General Bragg's object was to retake Middle Tennessee. Among other reasons for this opinion I give the following letters from Isham G. Harris and General Beauregard and telegram from Jefferson Davis, captured by our forces. I think the change took place after General Bragg crossed the Tennessee River and ascertained the disposition of troops made to meet his advance in Middle Tennessee. The communications referred to are as follows:

"Confidential.]

"CHATTANOOGA, July 28, 1862.

"Hon. ANDREW EWING:

"MY DEAR SIR: I have just returned from Tupelo, where I had a full and satisfactory conference with General Bragg, the result of which has made me very hopeful, if not entirely confident, as to the early consummation of our hopes.

"I succeeded in getting the general to send two brigades of Cheatham's division of Tennessee troops (General Maury's and General Donelson's) to this place, the two amounting to about 5,000 effectives; with this force added to General Kirby Smith's command we can successfully prevent Buell from crossing the river, and indeed defend our line of railroad from this to the Virginia line.

"I shall return to Tupelo in a few days, to accompany General Bragg in his forward movement. He assures me that he will carry me to Nashville before the last of August, and I have every confidence in his assurance. The army is greatly improved in health, discipline, and spirit, and is in better fighting trim than it has ever been before, while the Federal Army is evidently greatly demoralized and discouraged, in addition to which they have divided the army they had at Corinth, until there is no doubt about our ability to whip them at any point we may attack them before they can concentrate.

"The only difficulty between Tupelo and Nashville is the crossing of Tennessee River, but the general is confident he can cross his army over without serious loss or difficulty, and is at present delayed in his movement north for want of transportation, which he is collecting rapidly and will doubtless be in motion in a few days. He was not determined when I left as to the point at which he would cross—I suppose at Tusculumbia or Florence, but this must of course depend somewhat upon the position of the enemy, &c.

"I should be much pleased to have you go with me to Tupelo and from thence forward to Nashville, but I am satisfied that you can perform more important service by remaining in Middle Tennessee and rallying all the men that can possibly be raised to re-enforce Forrest. It is of the highest importance that Forrest should remain in that country at some point from which he can strike their lines of communication and keep them constantly cut, so as to prevent the concentration of troops upon us as we advance. His success thus far has been brilliant. He has proved himself a scourge to the vandal cut-throats. God grant he may continue so. He should be very active now for the next few weeks, burning bridges and attacking all small parties of the enemy, which will divert their attention from our movements at Tupelo and perhaps make the impression on their minds that they are to be attacked from this quarter. Our forces from Tupelo will destroy the Memphis and Charleston road, while Forrest is expected to keep the Tennessee and Alabama and the Nashville and Chattanooga roads useless to the enemy. If General Bragg succeeds in crossing the Tennessee River and marching rapidly through Middle Tennessee it places him in rear of Buell's force, now threatening Chattanooga, and compels Buell to fall back, if indeed we do not cut him off. When he falls back General Smith will probably concentrate and pursue him vigorously.

"You will see the propriety of not saying a word to any one as to the concentrated movement of the army, as much depends upon perfect secrecy in these matters. I have written to Forrest fully and inclosed to him full instructions from General Bragg. Col. John H. Morgan will be with him soon.

"I am pleased to learn that a firm spirit pervades the whole country, and that our people have not been seduced into error or won from their allegiance to the Government of their choice by the short-lived tyranny of that infamous wretch Andy Johnson or the treachery of Brown and Campbell. I have sent General Bright to you with funds for the support of such men as may organize for State service, while Forrest will provide for those going into Confederate service, though those in State service must be ordered for the present to report to Forrest for duty. Send couriers there as often as you have anything to communicate, and if I have left here let dispatch be telegraphed to me at Tupelo. I will make arrangements there to have them forwarded to me promptly.

"Hoping that we may soon, very soon, meet under our own flag within the walls of our own capital, and rejoice together at the redemption of our beloved State from the thralldom of the invader, I subscribe myself, very truly, your friend,

"ISHAM G. HARRIS.

"P. S.—How did the Herald learn that we were at Altamont and Beersheba, planning the Forrest raid on Murfreesborough? Some traitor in that country must have given the correspondent information. I care nothing for the fact disclosed, yet would like to know the traitor.

"I. G. H."

CULLUM'S SPRINGS, BLADEN, ALA.,
"28th of July, 1862.

"General BRAXTON BRAGG,

"Commanding Department No. 2, Mobile, Ala.:

"MY DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of the 22d instant was only received last night. I give you with pleasure the following views on your proposed operations from Tupelo, for I wish you the amplest success, both on your and the country's account.

"You had evidently but one of four things to do:

"1st. To attack Halleck at Corinth.

"2d. To attack Buell at or about Chattanooga.

"3d. To attack Grant at or about Memphis.

"4th. To remain idle at Tupelo.

"From what you state the first is evidently inadmissible and the last cannot be entertained for one moment, for action, action, and action is what we require. Now, with regard to the other two propositions, it is evident that unless you re-enforce General E. K. Smith at Chattanooga he will be overpowered by Buell, and then our communications with the east and our supplies at Atlanta, Augusta, &c., will be cut off; also that a partial re-enforcement would so weaken you at Tupelo as to paralyze you for any other movements from there; hence you have adopted the wisest course in sending to Smith all your available forces, except just enough to guard your depots, &c., to the rear of your present position at Tupelo.

"The third proposition would have afforded you some success, but not as brilliant or important in results as the second one, if the newspapers will permit you to carry it successfully into effect, for Halleck and Buell, occupying the base of a long isosceles triangle, of which Mobile is the apex, could get to Chattanooga before you, if they should become aware of your movement, and you would then have to contend again with superior forces, as usual to us. The moment you get to Chattanooga you ought to take the offensive, keeping in mind the following grand principles of the art of war: 1st. Always bring the masses of your army in contact with the fractions of the enemy. 2d. Operate as much as possible on his communications without exposing your own. 3d. Operate always on interior or shortest lines. I have no doubt that with anything like equal numbers you will always meet with success.

"I am happy to see that my two lieutenants, Morgan and Forrest, are doing such good service in Kentucky and Tennessee. When I appointed them I thought they would leave their mark wherever they passed. By-the-bye, I think we ought hereafter in our official papers to call the Yankees "Abolitionists" instead of "Federals," for they now proclaim not only the abolition of slavery, but of all our constitutional rights, and that name will have a stinging effect on our Western enemies. I intend to issue a general order on the subject whenever I assume a command again.

"Sincerely, your friend,

"G. T. BEAUREGARD."

"For Brig. Gen. Thomas Jordan's files. (Private.) Chattanooga, Tenn., from General G. T. B.

"Received at Knoxville, September 4, 1862, at 10 o'clock p. m., by telegram from Richmond 4th.

"To General BRAXTON BRAGG,

"Care General J. P. McCown:

"I approve of your alternative in relation to General Smith, and hope you will be able to execute the movement in time. We heard last night of the glorious result at Richmond, Ky., and anticipate the accomplishment of much in that direction. You have the field before you, and I rely upon your judgment.

"JEFFERSON DAVIS."

Question. Supposing it had been known that General Bragg designed to cross from the Sequatchie Valley to Sparta, what would have been the effect of concentrating the Army of the Ohio at that point?

The effect would have been to divert him from the difficult road from the valley to Sparta and leave open to him the better and parallel roads to Altamont and McMinnville, thus throwing him between Sparta and Nashville and other points in Middle Tennessee and on the best roads in that country. That is to say, it would have opened the route the enemy most desired, and probably been fatal to the army at Sparta.

Question. What would have been the effect of dividing the Army of the Ohio between Sparta and McMinnville, with the view of opposing him at either of those points?

The effect of this division would have been but little different to that of concentrating at Sparta. By moving to Spencer the enemy would be at liberty to overwhelm the force at McMinnville and would probably subsequently destroy that at Sparta. A rapid advance to Spencer on the part of the enemy, with suitable demonstration on Sparta, would have prevented that force from getting back to McMinnville before the force there should be overcome.

Question. What circumstances or considerations induced the concentration of the Army of the Ohio at Murfreesborough?

The operations of the enemy's cavalry, affecting the means of supply of the Army of the Ohio, rendered any extended offensive operations of that army impracticable; a want of forage about McMinnville and Altamont rendered it impossible to keep a large force there for any length of time, and if the enemy did not choose to give battle the army would have been compelled to go to Murfreesborough, and perhaps Nashville, to restore the line to Louisville. It was hence best to put it at Murfreesborough at once and watch the further movements of the enemy.

Question. What do you know of the determination of General Buell to hold Nashville when the bulk of the Army of the Ohio moved north into Kentucky after Bragg, and have you any reason to believe, or do you believe, that he was influenced in that determination by any expostulations or persuasions of Governor Andrew Johnson?

As the army was concentrating at Murfreesborough about 1st September it was learned that Kirby Smith, with a strong rebel force, was in Kentucky and had defeated Nelson at Richmond, and that the State was pretty much in his hands. This, added to the fact that the Army of the Ohio was already cut off from Louisville, imposed the necessity of turning attention immediately in that direction. It was therefore with great pleasure and satisfaction that the Army of the Ohio learned about this time that Bragg was moving toward Kentucky. This enabled the army to cover and restore its line from Louisville to Nashville and hold the opportunity of fighting Bragg. In determining the disposition of the army to meet this new state of affairs I know that the first question the commander of the Army of the Ohio entertained was, what arrangements should be made to hold Nashville. I know he was determined to hold it; he told me he considered this necessary. As soon as he got to Nashville he rode over the line of defense to designate the points to be held; some of them were already in process of being fortified in pursuance of previous orders. The troops to garrison the place were designated and organized, and after considerable deliberation the commander was named and received his instructions. I have no reason to believe, and I do not believe, that he was influenced in his determination in this matter by Governor Andrew Johnson. I know that after these arrangements were all completed he informed me that he was going to tell Governor Johnson what he had determined to do, and that he went out and returned and told me that he had informed Governor Johnson of his determination, and gave me an account of the interview. I know of no other interview than the one just mentioned between the commander of the Army of the Ohio and Governor Andrew Johnson on this subject.

Question. Do you identify the letter now submitted to you as one received at Bowling Green by General Buell from Governor Johnson? If so, state what action was taken on that letter, and whether it in any manner changed the dispositions previously made for holding Nashville. Repeat the letter in your answer to this question.

I identify the letter as one received at Bowling Green by General Buell from Governor Johnson. It is as follows:

"STATE OF TENNESSEE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
"Nashville, September 14, 1862.

"Major-General BUELL,
"Commanding, &c., District of the Ohio:

"GENERAL: It is all-important that Major-General Thomas and his forces, as now assigned, should remain at Nashville. There is the utmost confidence in his bravery and capacity to defend Nashville against any odds. I am advised that, including your division of the army, there are not less than 75,000 men in Kentucky and the number increasing, so that you will be enabled to meet Smith and Bragg successfully.

"I was reliably informed on yesterday that a portion of Bragg's forces were lingering about Carthage and the Cumberland River, Bragg no doubt with them, daily informed as to the number of our forces passing into Kentucky and the forces left here. If our strength is much reduced at this point he will be induced to attack Nashville as a matter of course.

"In conclusion I express the strong and earnest hope that the present assignment of forces under General Thomas for the defense of Nashville may not be disturbed.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"ANDREW JOHNSON,
"Military Governor."

It in no manner changed the dispositions made previous to its date for holding Nashville.

Question. What was supposed to be the position of General Bragg's army when the Army of the Ohio marched from Bowling Green on the afternoon of the 16th of September; with what object did the Army of the Ohio start on that march, and what dispositions were made with a view to that object? When was it first known that the rebel army had left Glasgow? When was it first known that the garrison at Munfordville had surrendered to the rebel army, and where was the Army of the Ohio at that time? How far from Munfordville?

When the Army of the Ohio marched from Bowling Green, on the 16th of September, Bragg's army was supposed to be at Glasgow, and the object was to attack it at that point. I have no notes in reference to this part of the campaign and do not recall distinctly the dispositions made. The orders for the first day's march, however, I remember, placed the troops the first night at Dripping Springs, on the main Louisville pike, and Wright's store, on the direct road from Bowling Green to Glasgow. A brigade of cavalry was in advance on each of these roads, and the brigade on the Glasgow road had orders to push forward to Merry Oaks, the enemy's outpost from Glasgow, and ascertain the state of affairs and act accordingly. This brigade drove in the rebel cavalry at Merry Oaks and pushed on to Glasgow, learning that the main body had left. An important rebel mail was captured by it. This cavalry reconnaissance developed the fact that the rebel army had gone toward Munfordville. According to my recollection we heard of the surrender of Munfordville on the second day after leaving Bowling Green and while we were at Dripping Springs, about 26 miles from Munfordville.

Question. Do you know anything of the opinions of the higher officers of the army as to the desirability or expediency of attacking the rebel army in its position at Munfordville? If so, state what that opinion was and whether you heard of any difference of opinion on that point among the higher officers.

I heard the opinions of the highest generals in the army as to the expediency of attacking the rebel army in its position at Munfordville. The opinion was unfavorable to such attack, as the position was known to many of our officers to be one of unusual strength. I heard no difference of opinion on this point.

Question. Was the post of Munfordville under the command of General Buell at the time it was threatened? Had he any knowledge of its defenses or control over the strength of its garrison or over its action?

I answer no to all the branches of this question.

Question. What route did the extra wagon train of the Army of the Ohio pursue on the march from Bowling Green to Louisville?

According to my recollection it marched from Bowling Green to Brownsville, Litchfield, and West Point, to Louisville.

Question. What were the evidences of disorganization in the Army of the Ohio on its march from Nashville to Louisville; was the march conducted in good order and in proper preparation for battle; were the troops obedient and prompt in the execution of orders; were there many deserters and stragglers during the march?

I saw no evidence of demoralization in the Army of the Ohio during the march from Nashville and Louisville; the march was conducted in good order and in proper preparation for battle; the troops were obedient and prompt in the execution of orders. I heard of no desertions, and there was but little, if any, straggling. This was commented upon at the time.

Question. How can the absence of so large a number of men from the army after its arrival at Louisville be accounted for?

I account for the absence of men who left the army after its arrival at Louisville by the fact that they had come near their homes; that they had been a long time absent and passed through many dangers and hardships, and they knew that they were going in a few days to encounter new dangers and hardships in another campaign, and they could not resist the temptation to absent themselves.

Question. How is the large amount of straggling from the consolidated army on the march from Louisville against the rebel army under Bragg to be accounted for and were any efforts used by General Buell to prevent that evil?

I account for the large amount of straggling on the march of the consolidated army from Louisville against Bragg by the fact that many of the troops were entirely raw and undisciplined and that they had been raised under a state of feeling in the country which was unfavorable to regularity and discipline in armies in the rebel States, and which, in favoring a rigorous policy toward the rebels, led the men to think they were justified by their friends at home in indiscriminate plunder when operating in the seat of war. Straggling was a natural and necessary consequence of this state of feeling. General Buell was very active in trying to prevent this evil.

Question. At what hour on the 8th of October was it known that a severe conflict was going on between the rebel forces and the left corps under Major-General McCook; how was the information received; what action was taken by Major-General Buell in consequence of it, and what was the result of his orders with reference to it?

It was about half past 4 in the afternoon of the 8th of October, 1862, when it became known to General Buell that a severe conflict was going on between the rebel forces and the left corps under Major-General McCook. The information was received by an aide-de-camp from General McCook. Major-General Buell immediately on receipt of this information gave orders for two of General Schoepf's brigades to be sent to re-enforce General McCook. An aide-de-camp was mounted immediately and sent to General Thomas, commanding on the right, with information as to the state of affairs on the left, and with orders to push forward an attack as rapidly as possible and to send a division to the center column to replace the strength it would lose by re-enforcing McCook on the left. The result was that the re-enforcements sent to McCook, part of them however by General Gilbert before he received General Buell's order to send them, checked the enemy on the left, and night came on before the order to attack on the right could be executed.

Question. What were the reasons in the mind of the commander of the Army of the Ohio, as far as you know, which caused the delay of the army in advance of Perryville after the battle; when did the division of General Sill join the army; how soon after its arrival did the army march, and how, pending that delay, was the time employed in bringing forward necessary supplies and ascertaining the movements of the enemy?

To the best of my knowledge and belief the reasons in the mind of the commander of the Army of the Ohio which caused the delay of the army in advance of Perryville after the battle were that the left corps was badly crippled, and that the division of General Sill, which belonged to that corps, had not yet joined it. General Sill's joined in the afternoon of the 11th and the army marched next morning. The time between the 9th and 11th was occupied in bringing forward necessary supplies and in reconnoissance.

Question. When was it first ascertained that the rebel army was retreating from Camp Dick Robinson; what movement was the Army of the Ohio executing when that information was received, and what steps were taken in consequence of it to pursue them?

It was known on the evening of the 13th that the enemy was retreating from Camp Dick Robinson; the Army of the Ohio was then moving to attack at that place; the main features of the plan of attack having been determined on, orders were given for the pursuit to be commenced at 12 o'clock that night.

Question. When did Major-General Buell first see Major-General Thomas after the battle of Perryville? Did General Thomas at any time recommend the movement of the corps which he was with to Danville; and, if so, when and in what manner.

I do not think General Buell saw General Thomas after the battle of Perryville until they met at Danville on the evening of the 13th. I was hardly out of General Buell's presence during this time, and hence give an opinion on this point. The only recollection I have of a recommendation from General Thomas to move the corps he was with to Danville was one made on the 13th after orders had been given by General Buell for that move.

Question. What instructions were given to General Morgan at Cumberland Gap relative to his operations in that region; upon what grounds were those instructions based, and did they restrain him from operations against the enemy's forces on his railroad communication through East Tennessee which might have been undertaken with a reasonable prospect of success?

I have no means of reference to the instructions given to General Morgan at Cumberland Gap, but they were made matter of record, and I should prefer that they be referred to in answer to the thing in question. I, however, distinctly recall their general tenor. They left it discretionary with him whether to act on the offensive or defensive; he was told he could not be re-enforced from the main army; on reports from General Morgan that the enemy in his front was vastly superior to him in numbers cautionary orders were given; he was told that he was not required to attempt any desperate operations, &c., but on his reporting that he had abundance for a cavalry raid on the railroad, which he had planned, he was told expeditions of that kind were thought to be within his power and were deemed sufficiently safe and promised good results.

Question. Were your relations with General Buell such as enable you to say that you had full and unrestricted access to the information which influenced his actions and a full knowledge of his views and plans?

My relations with General Buell were such as to make me say that I had full and unrestricted access to the information which influenced his actions and full knowledge of his views and plans.

I hereby certify that the above-named J. B. Fry, colonel and Provost-Marshal General, and in the service of the Government of the United States, was duly sworn previous to the responses given by him to the questions asked by Major-General Buell on the 22d of April, 1863, at the War Department, in the city of Washington, D. C.

DONN PIATT,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Judge-Advocate.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, April 25, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Members present, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. JOHN F. DE COURCY's examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. How long was it after the receipt of the first telegraphic dispatch from General Buell's headquarters to General Morgan, of the 10th of June, before the orders were given for the retrograde movement?

Almost immediately.

Question. Can you state with reference to the date of this telegraphic dispatch of the 10th when it was received by General Morgan—about how long after its date, as accurately as you can?

I cannot state accurately, but I think it must have been some time in the afternoon of the 11th or 12th.

Question. On the 13th of June General Morgan telegraphed to General Buell's chief of staff as follows: "On yesterday I received your telegram, giving me authority to operate offensively or not, according to my judgment." How happened it that it required till the 18th of June to recover the ground which had been lost in those few hours between the telegraphic dispatch upon which General Morgan commenced his retrograde movement and the telegraphic dispatches of the same date which authorized him to act at his discretion?

Because General Morgan had been concentrating his troops at Rogers' Gap by two roads. General Baird's and my brigade started from Cumberland Ford toward Rogers' Gap; General Carter's and General Spears' brigades marched through Big Creek Gap by Barboursville, with the view of threatening the enemy which was supposed to be guarding that Gap. After the receipt of the order countermarching the forward movement General Carter's and General Spears' brigades were ordered back by telegraph, the wires having been conducted the greater part of the way on their line of march. The roads were narrow and much encumbered; at Big Creek Gap General Spears' brigade had had a large amount of work to do in clearing a blockade. The delays therefore had been great, and when everything was ready for the concentration all the labor and time were lost. The men were fatigued and demoralized by the counter order, and the subsequent forward movement was not made with the same alacrity which had been evinced by all ranks in the first instance. Countermarching on narrow roads always takes a great deal of time, and the roads we had to countermarch on were of that kind—difficult and narrow. All expedition was used, as far as my memory serves me, in reconcentrating at Rogers' Gap; but notwithstanding every exertion said reconcentration was not effected until the evening of the 17th of June; by this I mean the complete reconcentration of all trains, batteries, infantry, and cavalry. It must be remembered that Generals Carter's and Spears' brigades had at the very least 25 miles longer march to make than the brigades of General Baird and myself. A glance at the map will at once show that I am probably understating the excess of march which Generals Carter's and Spears' brigades had to make.

Question. That does not quite answer the question. It appears that these two telegraphic dispatches were received within a very few hours of each other. I would like you to explain, if you please, how it happened that the order for the retrograde movement was obeyed with so much greater alacrity than the order for the reconcentration.

I was not present when the second order was received by General Morgan, that officer being then more than 20 miles distant from Rogers' Gap, and I almost imagine that he did not receive the order, from the fact, probably, that he had no telegraphic operator to take the dispatch off the wires. I suppose the dispatch was taken first of all off the wires and then had to be sent after and in search of General Morgan. The courier that I sent myself to General Morgan, telling him that I should not move, had to search for the general and had some difficulty in finding him.

Question. Where was General Morgan when he received the first dispatch?

At Rogers' Gap.

Question. How long after receiving that dispatch did he leave there?

Not till several hours afterward.

Question. Was it the same day?

I cannot state, because I had to proceed to the front, the enemy having engaged some of my outposts.

Question. Can you state about how many of those foraging expeditions were sent out while you were at Cumberland Gap? What was the greatest distance reached by them?

I can remember distinctly seven foraging expeditions of some importance, though I cannot give their dates; two conducted by General Carter, one by General Baird, two by General Spears, and two by myself. Of these expeditions, one by General Spears and two by myself proceeded farther than any other. General Spears' expedition proceeded to a point in Campbell County, Tennessee near Clinch River; he marched by a direct road from Cumberland Gap toward Clinch River about 30 miles, but in reality his troops covered a greater distance, inasmuch as they marched due west from Cumberland Gap, and only took a southern direction when they reached Big Creek Gap. On this expedition General Spears met the enemy in small force and captured some 50 or 60 prisoners, I believe. The expeditions under my command proceeded in a due southerly direction as far as Tazewell and operated around that town. On the second expedition to Tazewell I operated in a zone of about 8 miles east and west of Tazewell, and on two occasions approached to within 1 mile of the Clinch River. On the last expedition I encountered the enemy every day and forced him from my front until I was attacked by Stevenson, as already stated in my deposition. I went south about 15 miles from Cumberland Gap.

Question. Were these expeditions always for the purpose of procuring supplies?

I believe all except General Spears' expeditions, one of which, I think, was intended to harass the enemy.

Question. To what extent did that expedition accomplish its object?

All I know of its success is that I was informed in conversation that General Morgan was much pleased with what General Spears had done.

Question. How far would you have had to go any time within the first month after your arrival in Cumberland Gap to find an enemy that it was worth while to chastise?

I do not think we should have found any force of the enemy of importance north of Clinch River until after the 20th of July.

Question. Was that as far as General Spears marched for the purpose of harassing the enemy?

Yes.

Question. What is the distance from Cumberland Gap to Knoxville?

About 40 miles, by the direct road through Tazewell.

Question. Do I understand you to say that Clinch River is more than 30 miles from Cumberland Gap?

I have not so stated, but it must be remembered that when I approached the Clinch River I had marched only 15 miles from Cumberland Gap; General Spears approached it where the river tends in a southwesterly direction. Clinch River at some points of its course is not more than 20 miles from Cumberland Gap, at some 15, and at other points 60 or 70.

Question. I understood you to say that the enemy was to be found on the south side of Clinch River at any time of the first month after your arrival at Cumberland Gap; if that is not what you mean please explain.

I have not stated, that I am aware, anything that would bear that inference. What I have stated will show that our expeditions from Cumberland Gap on different occasions found the enemy in small force near the mouth of Clinch River. Of course I intend by this to refer only to the zone of General Morgan's operations, which never at any one time extended in a westerly direction farther than Jacksborough.

Question. Then, if you please, I will repeat the question put in the first instance. Within how short a distance of the Gap could you at any time within the first month after your arrival there have found the enemy in sufficient force to be worth the trouble of chastising?

I think that any time within one month after our occupation of the Gap, after the 18th of June, we should have found something like a force of 6,000 or 7,000 of the enemy between Clinch River and Knoxville; and if my memory serves me right, and I think it does, I can remember that all the information brought us by our own spies, of loyal Tennesseans, refugees from the districts between Clinch River and Knoxville, tended to show that General Morgan might have operated toward Knoxville by two or three roads without much danger to his forces.

Question. Have you meant to be understood in your evidence that from the 18th of June until the 15th of July there were not more than 6,000 or 7,000 troops in all Eastern Tennessee?

I did not mean to convey that that was the number the enemy had in Eastern Tennessee, except as far as General Morgan's zone of operations was concerned. I consider that zone of operations to have extended south as far as Knoxville, west toward Jamestown, not farther than Jacksborough, and east to some point near Bean's Station, Granger County.

Question. Have you any knowledge of the enemy's force in East Tennessee beyond the limits of this zone you have described?

I have a pretty good knowledge of the forces east of the zone under Humphrey Marshall, and I do not believe that he ever had at any one time after our occupation of Cumberland Gap a force exceeding 1,800 or 2,000, and this force in a very poor state of organization. I have no positive knowledge of the forces south and west of the zone above described further than what was derived from loyal East Tennesseans, who seemed to think that the enemy had not a very large force beyond the zone, and that force fully occupied in defending or preparing for the defense of Chattanooga.

Question. Did you and General Morgan exchange views on this subject freely and were your opinions about the same?

We exchanged opinions on this subject often and very freely, and we coincided in the opinion that shortly after our occupation of the Gap he could have operated toward and against Knoxville.

Question. You mean by that of course that he could have defeated the enemy and occupied Knoxville?

I do; and I here repeat what I have already placed in my deposition, that shortly after the occupation of the Gap I asked General Morgan to allow me to proceed with my brigade of three regiments and one battery toward a point near Morristown, to there tap the railroad; and a letter which I found in the post-office in one of my foraging expeditions to Tazewell convinced me that said expedition would have been successful, the letter being written by an officer then in charge of that post and addressed to some rebel general, asking that he might be re-enforced, inasmuch as he had not men enough to carry on the daily fatigue duty and guards.

Question. What was the date of that proposition of yours to General Morgan?

It must have been three or four days after our taking the Gap.

Question. Might you have done the same thing in a month after taking the Gap?

I think I could have done it with two brigades, but not with one, by rapid marching at night on first starting from the Gap, so as to prevent the enemy concentrating on their right by drawing troops which were beginning to assemble in position on Clinch River, in Anderson County.

Question. You have testified to the ability and willingness of General Morgan to operate successfully against the rebel force in East Tennessee? Have you equal confidence in his reports to the headquarters of the army on that subject?

I have testified to my opinion as to his ability to operate successfully in Eastern Tennessee immediately after the occupation of the Gap, and I further stated my opinion as to the possibility of thus operating; but as to General Morgan's willingness to thus operate at any period not immediately after taking the Gap is an answer which I do not think I have made and certainly am not willing to make; because, though shortly after our taking the Gap the encampment of my brigade enabled me to see General Morgan frequently and this enables me now to state with some kind of accuracy what General Morgan's views were then, I could not so testify at a later period, because some ten days after we had taken the Gap I moved my brigade encampment to the Kentucky side of the Gap, and from that period until the retreat to the Ohio I only saw General Morgan when compelled by important business to go to his headquarters.

Question. How large a force would you have required to advance successfully against the 6,000 or 7,000 men that you say were within General Morgan's zone of operations?

I shall consider this question as asking my opinion as a soldier, and I shall naturally answer, then, I would have advanced with all the troops I could, and I believe that I should have found more than sufficient in General Morgan's force, keeping in view his strength in artillery, to encounter and defeat the enemy.

Question. I want to know, colonel, what you would think sufficient. An equal force to the enemy.

Question. What force would you have thought necessary to leave at Cumberland Gap when you advanced?

Two weak regiments.

General BUELL. (To the court.) I do not think it necessary to question Colonel De Courcy any further with reference to the operations of General Morgan about Cumberland Gap. The telegraphic dispatches which passed between General Morgan and myself, if they are studied carefully, will make this matter perfectly plain, and I do not desire to add anything to it.

Question. (To Colonel De Courcy.) You have expressed the opinion that when Stevenson came into Kentucky he took a position to cover the road to Cumberland Gap. Do you know what position he took for that purpose?

I do not think I have stated that he took a position for that purpose, if that means that he took a position north of Cumberland Gap. I have stated that probably Stevenson did not form a complete junction—with the entire of his forces—with Bragg, fearing that if he did so he would uncover the road to Cumberland Gap by leaving the Gap undefended. I think that will be found in my deposition. He, however, very likely had a force between Flat Lick and Barboursville, on the Cumberland River, with detachments toward Manchester and London.

Question. It is your opinion, then, that he did not come farther into Kentucky than Flat Lick with any part of his force?

My opinion is that he did come into Kentucky farther than that point with a certain part of his force, but I do not deem my opinion on this point of any great value.

By General TYLER:

Question. Considering all the circumstances and the telegram now submitted to your inspection, marked No. 20, in "Telegrams Received Book, No. 1," are you positive that the telegram quoted yesterday from General Buell to Morgan, dated June 10, 1862, was the telegram upon which the retrograde movement of General Morgan was made?

I did not state positively that that was the telegram upon which the movement was made. I stated that I remembered the latter part of that telegram, and do remember to this very minute. My impression is that the telegram which ordered the retrograde movement was couched in more direct and positive terms.

Question. Do you recollect any of the circumstances under which that telegram was submitted to you?

I do not.

General BUELL. The deposition of this witness has brought out new and distinct matter. It is the allegation that General Morgan had peremptory orders, which required him to retrace his steps after he had commenced his advance into East Tennessee and forbidding his operating offensively in that direction at all. I therefore think it is necessary that the question should be investigated more carefully, unless the Commission should be satisfied that the telegraphic dispatches submitted in evidence explain the whole matter. I do not know any better way of getting the desired information than by calling on General Morgan himself. I therefore request that General Morgan be called upon to furnish copies of any telegraphic dispatches which he received controlling his movements while he was in command of the division of my army which operated against Cumberland Gap and about there.

The court was cleared, when, on the question being put "Shall the dispatches sent and received by General Morgan and asked for by General Buell be ordered?" it was negatived.

On the opening of the court—

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. After examining the somewhat remarkable deposition of Colonel Fry I withdraw my request to make a cross-examination upon it and admit it. It is indeed already admitted as evidence before the Commission. That closes the case, Mr. President. We are through now.

The deposition of Capt. J. St. C. Morton was read.

The PRESIDENT. (To General Buell.) With reference to the paper you have to submit to the Commission, can you give us an idea of the time you will need, general, to complete it.

General BUELL. I may say ten days.

The PRESIDENT. Does the judge-advocate propose to submit any paper?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. From the nature of this Commission, or board of officers, as I understand it, called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio, I am not required to sum up the evidence. Indeed, so voluminous is the evidence that it would not be possible to do so within any reasonable time. Most of the questions under consideration are matters of opinion, and as military men the board is better able to treat of these than I am. There is very little conflict of testimony coming within my particular province, and I therefore ask to be excused. I think, Mr. President, that ten days is a somewhat unreasonable length of time to ask, considering the time the case has already been in progress.

General TYLER. For myself I am unwilling to give that length of time, considering we have now been five months in session.

General BUELL. I have nothing more to say, if the Commission will name the time they think proper to allow.

General Buell then retired.

General TYLER. It is very evident we have done all we can till we get the paper General Buell proposes to submit to us. Considering we have been in session since the 27th of last November, I do not think that General Buell should be permitted to detain this Commission so long after the testimony is closed. If General Buell has been doing what the court has he has been preparing his papers in advance, and now merely requires time for closing it up.

General Tyler moved—

"That General Buell be allowed till April 28 at 12 o'clock to prepare and present his defense to the Commission, and that the Commission adjourn till that time."

An amendment was offered by the president substituting Thursday (for Tuesday), April 30, and that the Commission adjourn to that day at 12 o'clock.

Carried unanimously.

The Commission thereupon adjourned to Thursday, April 30, 1863.

COURT-ROOM OF COMMISSION,
Louisville, Ky., January 12, 1863.

Maj. R. SKINNER,
Judge-Advocate, Army of the Cumberland, &c.:

MAJOR: Inclosed I have the honor of forwarding you certain questions which I wish asked Captain Morton under oath in behalf of Major-General Buell.

You will attach the oath and answers to the inclosed paper and mail them to this place. You will also ask the inclosed questions on behalf of the Government.

By attending to this as soon as practicable you will oblige, yours, respectfully,

DONN PIATT,
Major and Assistant Adjutant-General, Judge-Advocate.

Copy of questions to Captain Morton.

1. State your name and position in the service of the United States and whether you were on duty with the Army of the Ohio last summer.
2. Give a detailed statement of the service on which you were engaged and the work you executed in preparing pontoon bridges, ferries, and defenses for railroad bridges and other points, from the time you joined the Army of the Ohio until the departure of the main part of the army from Nashville to Kentucky in September last.
3. State by whose orders the works were executed; whether they were necessary and why; what means you were authorized to employ for them, and whether they were prosecuted with industry and energy. Give the dates of the commencement and completion of the several works, and if there was any delay in either state the cause of it.
4. What is the length of the capitol at Nashville?
5. What length of line will a regiment 475 strong occupy in line of battle or on parade?

Cross-examination:

What became of the improvements upon railroad lines and defenses constructed by our forces in Tennessee at the time the Army of the Ohio fell back to Nashville?

HEADQUARTERS PIONEER BRIGADE,
ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND,
Camp near Murfreesborough, ———, 1863.

Maj. R. SKINNER, Judge-Advocate:

MAJOR: In reply to the questions propounded in yours of the 5th instant I have the honor to state:

1. My name is James St. Clair Morton; a captain of engineers. Was on duty with Army of the Ohio last summer as chief engineer from date of June 9.
2. On June 11, being ordered by General Buell to provide for the crossing of his army over the Tennessee River, I went to Pittsburg Landing and Eastport, where I procured two suitable barges and a steamboat, of which, together with the floors, rafters, and joists of store-houses in Florence, I made a steam-ferry bridge at the last-named place. I got the tools, spikes, nails, cordage, &c., from Pittsburg Landing. The bridge was capable of carrying across at a time about fifty loaded wagons; each trip took two hours. The army began to cross about the 25th. This was the best that could have been done, as the pontoons were, when inspected by me June 13, found unfit for use.

About July 6 I drew up plans and specifications for pontoon bridge across Tennessee River near Bridgeport. (I believe one was made accordingly.)

On July 9 General Buell ordered me to build stockades at the bridges on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad between Elk River and Stevenson. By July 25 I had laid out and put in course of construction by the labor of troops fourteen such works, as per following table:

Designation of works.	Size inside of square or length of development in yards.	Number of garrison.	Station on Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad.
Stockade A.	16 yards square.....	One company.....	1 mile below Anderson.
Stockade B.do.....	do.....	Bass.
Stockade C.do.....	do.....	1½ miles below Bass.
Stockade D.do.....	do.....	2 miles below Bass.
Stockade E.do.....	do.....	2½ miles below Bass.
Stockade 1.do.....	do.....	Anderson.
Stockade 2.do.....	do.....	4½ miles above Anderson.
Stockade 3.	8 yards square.....	Half company.....	5 miles above Anderson.
Stockade 4.	16 yards square.....	One company.....	8½ miles above Anderson.
Stockade 5.	24 yards square.....	Two to three companies.....	Tantalon.
Stockade 6.	16 yards square.....	One company.....	Cowan.
Stockade 7.do.....	do.....	Do
Redoubt 1.	95 yards developed.....	Two to three companies.....	Elk River.
Redoubt 2.	97 yards developed.....	do.....	Do.
Stockade 8*.	16 yards developed.....	One company.....	Duck River, South Fork.
Stockade 9*.do.....	do.....	Duck River, North Fork.

On July 28 General Buell ordered me to fortify the bridges between Huntsville and Stevenson, authorizing me to impress negro labor to help along the work. At this time some citizen mechanics joined me, and were subsequently used by me to direct the labor at the different points. August 1 I sent to Nashville and procured implements and hardware, blocks, falls, &c., for use on said works. August 7, being at Duck River, on Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, I got a telegram from General Buell to fortify Nashville. At Nashville I organized a camp, impressed negroes, &c., and began work with them and fatigue parties of soldiers. When General Buell came there on the retreat the capitol was defensible, also Saint Cloud Hill and the bridge. I gave as my opinion that Nashville could be held during his absence with the main army.

3. This interrogatory is replied to above.

4. I am not prepared to answer this of my own knowledge.

5. A battalion will occupy, in line of battle, as many paces as it has files, less one-fifth; 475 men in two ranks will occupy 188 paces or 140 yards.

Cross-interrogatories:

The improvements on the railroad as far as Murfreesborough I found in great part demolished on our recent advance here and all the timber stockades. The earth-works were left in tolerable order. Of the rest I know nothing of my own knowledge.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. ST. C. MORTON,
Chief Engineer, Army of the Cumberland.

* The two last were laid out subsequently, but are added in the above list for convenience; so are the following:

Designation of works.	Size inside of square or length of development in yards.	Memphis and Chattanooga Railroad.
Bridge Defense 1.....	One company.....	Flint River.
Bridge Defense 2.....	do.....	Viaduct.
Bridge Defense 3.....	do.....	Hurricane River.
Bridge Defense 4.....	do.....	Paint Rock.
Depot Defense 5.....	do.....	Larkinsville.
Stockade 10.....	do.....	Near Bellefont.
Stevenson Redoubt No. 3.....	50 yards square, seven companies, four guns.	Stevenson.
Stockade 11.....	16 yards square, one company.....	Do.
Depot Defense 6.....	Two companies.....	Do.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND,
Murfreesborough, Tenn., February 15, 1863.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by said J. St. Clair Morton, chief engineer Army of the Cumberland, who states upon oath that the foregoing are true answers to the interrogatories and cross-interrogatories hereto appended.

RALSTON SKINNER,
Major and Judge-Advocate this Department.

CINCINNATI, April 30, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the president, General Wallace, General Dana, General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

The statement from General Buell not being completed the Commission adjourned to Monday, May 4, 1863, at 12 m.

CINCINNATI, May 4, 1863—12 m.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the president, General Wallace, General Dana, and General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

The following communication from General Buell was read:

To the Commission:

On examination I have found the record of the Commission to be deficient and inaccurate in several particulars of greater or less importance.

It will be remembered that at an early stage of the proceedings I proposed an examination of the record for the purpose of correcting such errors, but the Commission deemed it best to defer the examination until the investigation should be closed. I desire now to call attention to the more important of them. While the first witness, Colonel Lytle, I think, was giving his evidence the Commission was cleared at the motion of one of the members for some purpose not stated at the time. After the Commission had been in secret session some time I was invited in and the president directed or intimated to the judge-advocate to swear me to secrecy in regard to the proceedings of the Commission. I declined to be sworn, and the Commission was again cleared. The judge-advocate subsequently came out and informed me that it had been determined that the investigation should be continued without my presence. I objected to this decision, and the judge-advocate returned to the Commission and I presume stated my objection. He subsequently returned to me again and informed me that it had been concluded to admit me to the sessions of the Commission, but that it had been decided that I should not cross-examine witnesses, though I could introduce witnesses in the defense. I objected to this also. I returned to the Commission and stated in person my objections to its decisions. I was asked by the president whether I based my claim to be present and cross-examine witnesses on the privilege belonging to a party accused. I answered that undoubtedly the pending investigation implied some sort of accusation or imputation against me, but that I did not think it necessary to say whether I considered myself in the light of a party accused or not; that for the present I based my claim upon the instructions of the Secretary of War, under which they were acting, which stated that I would "be permitted to appear and produce and examine witnesses before the Commission." Without coming to any final decision on the questions the Commission adjourned.

The following morning I submitted a written statement of what I considered to be my right with reference to these several points, and that statement was sustained by the Commission. It is proper that these facts should appear on record, and I request that they may be placed there. They are stated here very briefly. It will be remembered that some discussion took place at the time with reference to the rights which I claimed. It is impossible for me now to repeat the precise words in which I presented them.

If there should be any question in regard to these several points then I desire to establish them by evidence, in order that the record may be corrected.

The other errors, so far as I have observed them, I have noted in my copy, and they can be pointed out more conveniently by referring to the record.*

BURNET HOUSE, Cincinnati, May 2, 1863.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

*The literal errors referred to were, by order of the Commission, corrected in the official record.—REPORTER.

General Buell not having yet completed his statement—

General Dana moved that the Commission adjourn till May 6, at 12 o'clock, to receive General Buell's defense, and that the judge-advocate notify General Buell that the Commission will then proceed to make up their opinion.

The Commission adjourned to Wednesday, May 6, at 12 o'clock.

CINCINNATI, May 6, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the president, General Wallace, General Dana, and General Tyler; also the judge-advocate.

The following was received from General Buell and read to the Commission :

BURNET HOUSE, Cincinnati, May 6, 1863.

To the Commission :

As it was impossible for me to prepare the statement which I desired to submit to the Commission in the time allowed by their resolutions, I supposed I should not have an opportunity to lay it before the Commission at all, and therefore occupied more time with it than I had intended. In that way it has happened that I have consumed more time even than I asked—ten days. It is now in the hands of the printer in the rough original manuscript. I am the more anxious to lay it before the Commission because they have since extended the time first allowed.

I will hasten its preparation as much as possible, and if it should not be too late will then lay it before the Commission.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

After the reading of the above communication it was ordered—

That the judge-advocate, in reply to the communication of General Buell, addressed to the Commission, just read, be directed to notify General Buell that they notice with some concern the announcement therein contained that the statement that has occupied his time during the last eleven days has been placed in the hands of the printer without any previous notice to them that such action would be taken by him. They perhaps have no right to assume that any portion of their record will be embraced in such publication, and therefore do not express themselves as their duty would require them to do if so unwarrantable a use were made of the journals of the Commission.

There being no further business before the Commission it adjourned to May 10, at 12 o'clock m.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1873.

I hereby certify that the papers to which this certificate is appended, consisting of the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, or Military Commission, in the case of Maj. Gen. Don Carlos Buell, United States Volunteers, and of the testimony taken before said Court or Commission (including the exhibits and papers connected with such testimony) are a true and complete transcript of the phonographic notes taken by me as reporter of said Court or Commission, during the investigation thereby of said case; and that the said transcript was made by me in pursuance of an act of Congress of June 5, 1872, directing the Secretary of War to employ me for such purpose.

BENN PITMAN,
Reporter of the Buell Court of Inquiry.

AIRDRIE, December 20, 1872.

BENN PITMAN, Esq., Cincinnati, Ohio :

SIR: I have looked over the record which you have prepared from the original notes and manuscripts to replace the lost record of the "Buell Commission," as it is called.

My examination of the oral evidence has been extremely cursory ; indeed I have only endeavored to ascertain the general completeness of the work without pretending to verify its verbal accuracy. For that your professional standing is the best security.

In examining your abstract of documentary evidence I find that it contains a number of official dispatches which were not actually filed for the defense, and which give the subject the appearance of being burdened with details ; they have no other effect, however, than perhaps to detract somewhat from the dignity of the defense, and I deem it unnecessary on that account to suggest an alteration that could not be made with much exactness, and which would involve a good deal of time and trouble and mar the work you have executed with so much care.

The discrepancy grew out of the circumstance of your copying from records which, when the investigation was in progress, I marked as bearing more or less on the questions put forward by the Commission, but which I sifted very much when they came to be presented.

I find also that some of the documents which I presented do not appear in the new record. This has arisen from the fact that copies of the originals were not retained or cannot now be found. I send you a list of these, as far as I have been able to discover, and I suggest that you specify them separately at the end of the new index. They are not of great importance to the subject, though of course I regarded them at the time as having some significance in an inquiry which was so general and the object of which was so indefinite.

Your abstract of documents handed in for the side of the prosecution appears to be complete. There is missing, however, a map which may be regarded as belonging to both sides, and of which there is no copy extant. I suggest that you file instead an official historical map which was compiled with great care under the supervision of General George H. Thomas and published by the Engineer Bureau at Washington, to show the operations of the Army of the Cumberland (originally the Army of the Ohio), under its several commanders, from the beginning to the end of the war. I send you a copy of that map, which I have amended only so far as to add in a general way the lines of operation of the rebel army in the invasion of Kentucky in the fall of 1862, and also to show distinctly, by merely a change in the coloring, the operations of the army under my command.*

In the original arrangement of the documentary evidence the documents were placed in their appropriate relation to each other and to the questions upon which they had a bearing. The records from which you have had to copy are not arranged in that way, and I observe that you have copied in the order in which you found them. Indeed, you could not well do otherwise. The inconvenience of this defect will in a measure be modified by your arrangement of the index, which affords the ready means at least of following up questions involved in any particular chain of correspondence. That result will be facilitated by numbering all of the documents in one continuous series in the order in which they appear in the new record.†

* Map to appear in Atlas.

† This plan was not adopted by the reporter and the compiler has disregarded the arbitrary numbering of the documents substituted for those lost. See note on p. 690.

With these explanations the new record will, I have no doubt, be substantially complete, as much so as it is possible to make it; and I suggest that you file some such statement with it, as a preface to it, perhaps, in order that it may contain the explanation of any discrepancy that may possibly exist between it and the original. If you think proper, I have no objection to your using this letter in that way.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL.

JUNE 20-23, 1862.—Affairs in Owen County, Ky., and skirmish (20th) near Lusby's Mill.

Report of Lieut. Col. John J. Landram, Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry.

CAMP FRAZIER, near Cynthia, Ky., June 28, 1862.

DEAR SIR: The following is a list of prisoners captured by the officers and men under my command in the expedition to Owen County, and who are detained as prisoners, to wit.* Brombach and Foster appear to be the ringleaders. I have them closely confined in jail. I herewith inclose a memorandum of evidence against Brombach. One Bullett, from Louisville, appears to have been a leader of the party also; he escaped. Brombach says he was commissioned a colonel in the Confederate Army and was here recruiting. Many of those persons who were engaged in the guerrilla warfare had been mustered into the service by him.

* Nominal list omitted shows 18 prisoners to have been taken.

I detached Lieutenant Chrisman with 12 men from Owenton to go into Grant and capture some of the parties engaged in the fight near the mills. I understand that he has captured several of them. Captain Wileman, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, who was in the neighborhood on private business and who had come previous to that time with 100 men to Lusby's Mill and did nothing, went to Lieutenant Chrisman, assumed command, as he said by order of Warner, and took the prisoners to the stamping ground (Warner's headquarters), very much to the mortification of Lieutenant Chrisman and not altogether agreeable to my feelings. I think such conduct in Warner and Wileman reprehensible. It is truly a small matter, but indicative of the spirit. I would be much pleased if you would order Warner to send them here, Chrisman in charge. I could then make out the charges and transport them wherever you may order or try them here with the others should a trial be ordered. I am unable to report to you the facts connected with the prisoners taken by Lieutenant Chrisman for the above reasons.

Lieut. James Dunlap, who is under my command, and who I sent to take command of Captain Baker's, Captain Bradley's, and Captain Humes' Home Guards, in the capacity of major, captured some 12 or 13 prisoners before the attack made upon them and before I arrived in the county, and took command. Those prisoners are at Lexington, I presume, in charge of the provost-marshal. I am unable to make out the charges against them.

Lieutenant Dunlap and the Home Guards did good service before I arrived. The Home Guards of this place, under Capt. W. C. Smith, and those above mentioned, acted in concert with the troops sent to me by Warner. All were placed under my command, and I think we cleared out Owen effectually. It appeared to be intensely Union when I left. I ordered the capture of all the arms, horses, and bridles of the men who were engaged in guerrilla warfare, and also all the arms I could find in that neighborhood in the hands of boisterous and noisy rebels.

Inclosed you will find an inventory of horses, saddles, arms, &c.

Warner ordered the mills burned. I would not allow it done, because they are owned by one Kindman, and from all the evidence I could get Kindman was a quiet, peaceable man, and had used his influence in favor of peace and submission to the laws. He rendered good service in ferreting out those persons engaged in the attack on the Home Guards, and he promises to arrest all the parties he can find in that community that were guilty and deliver them to me. He with many other persons in that vicinity have resolved to put down guerrilla warfare by force of arms and not allow any of these men to remain in their community. I acted in the premises as my own judgment dictated. I received no instructions from you. I did understand that Warner had; if so, he never communicated them to me.

I think we captured some 300 or 400 live Owen County secessionists first and last. Those who were not guilty of crime I ordered to report to the marshal, take the oath, and execute bond, &c.

The attack made upon the Home Guards was on the 20th instant, about 1 mile east of Lusby's Mill. Two men and one horse were killed on the spot. One of the rebels was shot through the thigh; we captured him in the woods; his name is William Osborne. A rebel by the name of Nash was also killed. Osborne is left at Williamstown; he was unable to travel to this place in consequence of his wounds. From the best information I can get the rebel force was between 30 and 40. The Home Guards numbered 22 men and officers. The rebels had chosen an excellent place, and had prepared themselves by cutting the bushes out of their way from the trees along the road, behind which they stood to protect themselves from the fire of the Home Guards. I was much discouraged when I arrived on the ground at the prospect of capturing or finding any of the parties. The country is remarkably bushy and hilly. I threw the men out as skirmishers in every direction and scoured the country. I found their camp about 2 miles northwest of Lusby's Mill. The wounded man Osborne was in the camp.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. J. LANDRAM,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding.

General J. T. BOYLE.

REPORTS.

No. 1.—Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, U. S. Army.

No. 2.—Col. Minor Milliken, First Ohio Cavalry.

No. 3.—Lieut. Leonard Erwin, First Ohio Cavalry.

Reports of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, U. S. Army.

HDQRS. FIRST DIVISION, DISTRICT OF THE OHIO,
Tuscumbia, Ala., July 3, 1862.

Lieutenant Erwin, First Ohio Cavalry, just arrived from Russellville, reports two companies of his regiment, scouting toward Russellville, were attacked this morning by a force of the enemy's cavalry (four companies) and driven back. Captain Emery and 4 men were killed. Four of the enemy were known to be killed and one sergeant captured. I can get no information from the prisoner which is reliable. From the report of the lieutenant I think Captain Emery must have acted imprudently in not withdrawing in time. The force of cavalry I have is too small for so extended a line as that from Iuka to Decatur. A regiment of cavalry stationed at Iuka could, by patrolling in the direction of Fulton as far south as the Frankfort and Russellville roads, drive the enemy's scouts from that section, and would leave only the country from Frankfort to Decatur to be watched by my cavalry, which work could be accomplished more effectually than with the present disposition of the troops.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major-General, U. S. Volunteers.

Major General HALLECK, Corinth, Miss.

TUSCUMBIA, July 4, 1862.

The party sent out yesterday went as far as Russellville. The commanding officer reports that Captain Emery was not killed, but dangerously wounded. The citizens report that the enemy retreated in great haste and have not been seen near Russellville since. The sergeant taken prisoner says that the enemy were about 250 strong; that their special business was to burn cotton and arrest certain Union men and take them South.

I am informed by deserters that Hardee is in command of the forces remaining at Tupelo; that the larger part of the army has left. One part under Van Dorn gone to Vicksburg; another part has gone South, they suppose to Columbus, and that a few days ago orders were given for those remaining to prepare for a move. Great dissatisfaction exists among the troops, especially the Tennessee and Kentucky regiments. Several arrests of officers high in rank have been made and regiments put under guard.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major-General.

Major-General HALLECK.

Report of Col. Minor Milliken, First Ohio Cavalry.

HDQRS. FIRST OHIO CAV., Tuscumbia, Ala., July 9, 1862.

MAJOR: I have the honor herewith to inclose to you the report of Lieutenant Erwin, of Company G, detailing the incidents of the skirmish had by my men near Russellville.

Captain Emery, then reported dead, has been recovered and is now lying at my hospital very low, but in an improved state. The other wounded are doing well.

I have since learned that the forces were three companies of cavalry, two of the Second Alabama and one of the First Mississippi, the whole commanded by Captain Roddey, and aggregating 193 men. The enemy certainly lost four horses dead and two wounded. They left one private and one lieutenant dead on the field, retreating immediately after our forces retired without securing any of the subsistence left by us or taking anything but a few articles of clothing. Their exact loss I cannot learn, but suppose from the testimony of citizens that they had others killed and took off 6 wounded. Below is a statement of my own loss:

Killed.—Corporal Bell and Private McMullen, Company B.

Wounded.—Captain Emery, Company G; 3 privates in Company B and 1 in Company G.

The loss of property appears on Lieutenant Erwin's report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MINOR MILLIKEN,
Colonel First Ohio Cavalry.

Maj. GEORGE E. FLYNT, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 3.

Report of Lieut. Leonard Erwin, First Ohio Cavalry.

HDQRS. FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY, COMPANY G,
Camp near Tuscumbia, Ala., July 3, 1862.

SIR: At about half past 3 o'clock this morning we were attacked by an armed force of between 200 and 250 rebel cavalry, commanded by one Captain Roddey. My own company and Company B (which agreeably to your instructions had joined us on the evening of the 30th from Frankfort) were encamped in an open piece of woods on the left of the road, about 3 miles from Russellville. Capt. A. B. Emery had posted pickets on the main road toward Tuscumbia and Russellville and on a road coming into the rear of our camp or fronting the main road. The attack began by a furious dash of cavalry, of about 25 in number, on our pickets nearest Tuscumbia, who, after firing their carbines and pistols, started immediately to camp to give the alarm. By the time they reached the camp Captain Emery had the men in line and gave the enemy a volley as they passed by on the road, bringing down several horses and doing other execution not known by reason of the darkness. The enemy immediately returned the fire, wounding 1 man in Company G. Almost at the same time, and before our own men were yet mounted, firing began from the right, rear, and left; also from points in the woods. Captain Emery, thinking his retreat cut off and knowing himself to be entirely surrounded, at once made a determined stand. He sent one platoon (arranged the night previous) under my command to the right, with orders to dismount and deploy as skirmishers. Another platoon he placed under command of Orderly Sergeant [William H.] Woodlief to be sent to the front. The third platoon were dismounted and sent to the left. Company B was divided so as to leave a few skirmishers on the left, but placing the main part of said company facing the rear, commanded by Sergeant-Major [Hugh H.] Siverd. In this position we sustained a fight of about one hour and a half, being dark when the contest commenced and not entirely light when it ended.

Most of the fighting done with my platoon was a hand-to-hand combat. The firing on all sides was sharp and rapid. The enemy were partly armed with Maynard carbines, which, however, did not prevent our men from loading and firing their Sharps carbines with great effect. The fighting had continued for over an hour when Sergeant-Major Siverd came to me with the news that Captain Emery was killed and the enemy pressing hard upon our rear. In about twenty minutes from this time, knowing the wagons were ready to move and feeling the force opposed to us were far superior in numbers and being, by the unfortunate illness of Lieutenant Fordyce, Company B, who was unable to do duty, left as sole commander, I thought best to draw off my force and try and cut my way back on the Tuscumbia road. Getting the wagons in the road, I drew my men off in columns of fours, finding no enemy in this move, neither did they pursue me.

The efficient men of Companies B and G in this engagement numbered 70.*

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 10, 1862.

The rebels under Starnes, over 2,000, with three pieces of artillery, crossed from Sparta, Tenn., into Kentucky; cut to pieces Major Jordan with three companies of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry at Tompkinsville, and are moving on Glasgow. I have concentrated all my available forces at Munfordville and Bowling Green, but I have not sufficient force to drive back the enemy. Kentucky will be overrun and the railroad seized and destroyed without more force. I have asked for aid at Nashville, but they stand on some etiquette, which I pay no attention to. I beg you to send re-enforcements sufficient to drive the enemy and to prevent his coming upon us from Tennessee.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Major-General BUELL,
Commanding Army of the Ohio.

HEADQUARTERS, Huntsville, July 10, 1862.

Captain GREENE, Nashville:

Instead of bringing back part of the Eleventh Michigan send five companies of it to Bowling Green and five to Munfordville.

JAMES B. FRY,
Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS, Louisville, July 10, 1862.

The rebels under Starnes, 2,000 strong, with three pieces of artillery, passed from Sparta, Tenn., crossing the Cumberland River into Kentucky, cutting up Major Jordan's command of three companies of Ninth Pennsylvania. They are moving from Tompkinsville to Glasgow. I have all my available force at Munfordville and Bowling Green. I have not sufficient force to drive them out. I have called for re-enforcements from Nashville. I have advised General Buell by telegraph. We are much in need of more troops in Kentucky. I can extemporize a good force if I could pay them soldiers' wages.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 11, 1862.

I have 1,800 men at Munfordville and one company of artillery. Bowling Green is not threatened now. Morgan issued proclamation yesterday (10th) at Glasgow. He has moved forces toward Lebanon. Firing going on at Lebanon to-night. Train with 500 soldiers left Lebanon Junction at 8 o'clock; has not arrived at Lebanon at this time. Will send other re-enforcements to-night and in the morning. General McCook was expected here to-night. If he comes I will avail myself of his aid. With assistance from Nashville by Gallatin and Scottsville, Ky., we could cut off Morgan.

I have used all the convalescent soldiers here. Governor Morton will send to-morrow 600 men. I am fearful of matters at Lebanon, as my re-enforcements did not reach there by rail. I will telegraph you fully to-morrow.

J. T. BOYLE.

Maj. Gen. D. C. BUELL.

HEADQUARTERS, Huntsville, July 11, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville:

I have just received your dispatch of yesterday. Report at once what troops you have and what dispositions you have made. The bridges at Bowling Green and Munfordville will be secure against any attack likely to be made by any force of cavalry if protected by two companies in a field work so placed as to command the bridge perfectly. The works can be thrown up in a very few hours, and it should be done at once. This will leave your main force available for active operations. A stockade with loop-holes sufficient to hold from 10 to 15 or 20 men must be made at every bridge on the road, and while the road is in danger each train must carry a guard of about 40 men. The force of the enemy is doubtless greatly exaggerated. A regiment of infantry and your cavalry, if properly managed, will force him to recross the Cumberland or destroy him. The dispositions I am making on this side will indirectly assist that object. Troops can ill be spared from here, and it is necessary not to transfer them for a protracted service north of the Cumberland if it can be avoided. No person at Nashville was authorized to divert troops from the destination I had given them. Your report should have been made to me.

D. C. BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 12, 1862.

Morgan has over 1,500 men; his force is increasing; all the rebels of the State will join him if there is not a demonstration of force and power sent in cavalry. The State will be desolated unless this matter is attended to. This city is so endangered that I am bound to keep force here. Send me cavalry and other re-enforcements. I know more of Kentucky than you can possibly know, and unless it is intended to abandon Kentucky I must have the force.

J. T. BOYLE.

Col. J. B. FRY.

LOUISVILLE, July 12, 1862.

Morgan passed around and escaped and burned Lebanon; is moving on Danville and toward Lexington.

I have no cavalry and but little force. The whole State will be in arms if General Buell does not send a force to put it down. Can we not have two of the regiments? Morgan is devastating with fire and sword. I have protected the railroad but cannot protect the whole State with my force.

J. T. BOYLE.

Capt. OLIVER D. GREENE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 12, 1862.

I ordered 1,600 of my men to attack Morgan this morning. They have moved. Colonel Moore, of the Thirty-third Ohio, ordered by me into service, attacked 450 of Morgan's men near Lebanon last night at 11 o'clock, killing 1, wounding several, and routing them. They retreated toward Greensburg. I ordered pursuit of them.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Capt. OLIVER D. GREENE.

LOUISVILLE, July 12, 1862.

It is certain Morgan cannot be caught without cavalry. He will lay waste large parts of the State. He is aiming at Lexington. I have no force to take him. If Buell would save Kentucky it must be done instantly. I know of what I speak. If I had the necessary troops I could hold everything straight. Morgan has some accessions—several hundreds; these can be stopped by proper force. What will you do?

J. T. BOYLE.

Capt. OLIVER D. GREENE.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 12, 1862.

Morgan is reported at Danville and Harrodsburg. His force is too large to be driven back with my force of infantry. Colonel Bruce telegraphs me that a rebel Captain Meriwether has several hundred, and threatening Bowling Green. He raised these men in counties south of Green River. It will be necessary to move a force into Kentucky. What will you do for us?

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Major-General HALLECK.

LOUISVILLE, July 12, 1862.

Rebel Morgan issued proclamation at Glasgow on the 10th. Part of his force was attacked last night near Lebanon by my men and number of his men wounded and force routed. They retreated toward Greensburg. I have ordered attack of Morgan's main force to-day. I am in great want of the 1,800 cavalry arms and equipments. I trust they will be hastened forward. Send agent with the arms, otherwise they will be stopped in some depot on the route.

J. T. BOYLE,
*Brigadier-General.*Hon. E. M. STANTON, *Secretary of War.*HUNTSVILLE, July 12, 1862.

After the favorable reports just sent you General Boyle now says:

Morgan passed around and escaped and burned Lebanon; is moving on Danville and toward Lexington.

I have no cavalry and but little force. The whole State will be in arms if General Buell does not send a force to put it down. Morgan is devastating with fire and sword.

This is excited language, but the facts make it evident that Kentucky cannot be left without troops to guard against such incursions and their consequences. I shall have to use some of my force for that purpose. There should be at least five more regiments of cavalry in those two States.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

General HALLECK.

HEADQUARTERS, Huntsville, July 12, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville:

Morgan ought not to escape without a severe blow, but he will effect no doubt a good deal of harm, and the mischief will be done before troops could arrive from here to prevent it. You must use the force you have and can collect to the best advantage to protect important points. Small guards in stockades will protect bridges. Much of your infantry and all of your cavalry can be used as an active force. Five hundred infantry can cope with the enemy at any one point, if I am not mistaken in his force. Warner's regiment, excepting small bridge guards, should be moved instantly to Lexington. Glasgow, Columbia, and Somerset are important points to intercept the enemy in his retreat. Order one of the regiments and the squadron of cavalry from Prestonburg to Mount Sterling and the other regiment to Lexington. These are proper general dispositions, but the movement of the enemy may make it necessary to vary them.

Morgan's principal object besides rapine will be to strike at the line of supplies for Cumberland Gap. I have warned General Morgan, and hope he can send a regiment or two to defeat it. I shall at once send more troops toward Kentucky, but it is not possible for them to be in time to do more than to endeavor to intercept the enemy in his retreat. I have in fact not a man to spare from the work to be done here.

D. C. BUELL.

CINCINNATI, July 12, 1862—12 p. m.

I received the following:

LOUISVILLE, July 12.

Mayor HATCH:

Send artillery to Lexington and as many men as possible by special train without delay.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

I have been in communication with General Boyle. He wants assistance. Five hundred men go to-night from here and Camp Dennison. Governor Tod says he sends force and 1,000 stand of arms from Camp Chase. General Boyle says Governor of Indiana sends a regiment; to be in Louisville to-morrow morning. Great excitement here. Meeting called for to-morrow morning.

Have you about fifteen 12-pounders, new?

GEORGE HATCH,
Mayor.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
July 12, 1862.

Hon. GEORGE HATCH, Mayor of Cincinnati, Ohio:

No information has been received here from General Boyle of any such pressing need of men or artillery as his request to you and his call for a public meeting indicate. The Department must have more definite knowledge before it can act intelligently. Send here immediately copy of General Boyle's telegram to you and any other information you may have on this subject.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
July 12, 1862.

General J. T. BOYLE, Lexington, Ky.:

The mayor of Cincinnati has just sent the following telegram to the Department:

CINCINNATI, July 12.

Brigadier-General Boyle, Lexington, Ky., asks me to send artillery and men without delay. What shall I do? Have called public meeting.

GEORGE HATCH,
Mayor.

To-day you telegraphed me from Louisville announcing the rout yesterday of part of Morgan's force and that you had ordered attack to be made on his main force to-day. The Department has received no further information from you. What means this sudden call on the mayor of Cincinnati to send men and artillery immediately and why have you not advised this Department of the real or supposed necessity for such a step?

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

NASHVILLE, July 13, 1862.

I have the honor to forward the following dispatch just received:

LOUISVILLE, 13th.

Morgan's force is increasing. The rebels are rising in the counties on the Ohio. The State will be under the domination of Morgan in a few days. He will take Frankfort and Lexington if forces are not sent immediately.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Capt. OLIVER D. GREENE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

OLIVER D. GREENE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Col. J. B. FRY.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

Morgan has invaded Kentucky with 3,000 men, robbed the bank, and is murdering and stealing everywhere. My force is inadequate to drive him out. Can you not send us assistance? If you can throw a heavy force in his rear he can be cut off.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Major-General HALLECK.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

Morgan's force increases. There is evident disposition of rebels to rise in the State. Can Governor Yates send a force to Paducah at once? I have over and again asked for re-enforcements of General Buell's headquarters at Nashville. All forces in Ohio and Indiana should be sent to Kentucky.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

It is quite certain that Morgan's force has grown since he entered the State and that it is about 2,800 to 3,000 now. It will require more force than is in the State to drive him out. If we had two of the six Kentucky regiments of cavalry, with more infantry, we could maintain ourselves. Could we get the Third Kentucky cavalry and one other? They are somewhere south.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 13, 1862.

General J. T. BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

We cannot venture to order troops from General Buell. We know not what condition he is in. He may be attacked himself. You must call on General Halleck, who commands, and whose business it is to understand and care for the whole field. If you cannot telegraph to him send a messenger to him. A dispatch has this moment come from Halleck at Tuscumbia, Ala.

A. LINCOLN.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

I have just received the following dispatch, dated July 13:

I cannot send you any aid. About 3,000 rebels surprised our force at Murfreesborough this morning, and a courier has arrived and says our troops were cut to pieces. Have sent your dispatches to General Buell fast as received, but get no reply.

OLIVER D. GREENE.

Morgan's force is represented as increasing. I do not believe that he has any material increase. I believe his force from 1,000 to 1,500. It is reported just double this estimate. There are other guerrilla bands in other parts of the State. Morgan may contemplate attacking this city, to destroy public stores and rob banks. I have about 1,500 men here, besides several hundred Home Guards, and may be able to raise the citizen soldiers to 1,000. We are in great need of troops. Can you order reinforcements from General Buell?

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

Telegraph from Nashville says our forces cut to pieces at Murfreesborough, Tenn., and calling for re-enforcements. The rebels undoubtedly have control of telegraph all around us. There is great danger in Kentucky. We have not sufficient force.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 13, 1862.

Have telegraphed General Buell in person at Huntsville and his adjutant-general at Nashville of Morgan's raid and the extent of it. I advised the Governors of Indiana and Ohio. Morgan was not attacked by our men as expected, because they were all mounted and well mounted and ours were infantry. He eluded them and passed on to Lebanon, and has passed from there to Danville and Harrodsburg, in the direction of Lexington and Frankfort. His force is variously estimated from 1,500 to 3,000 men. He is reported as having three pieces of artillery. A considerable portion of the force I have been using I have taken from the convalescents at hospitals. The forces that I have at my command are stationed along the Nashville road to prevent destruction of bridges and track, over which road all the supplies go for the army in Southern Tennessee. There is a small force at Paducah and Henderson. I called on the Governors of Ohio and Indiana in pursuance of your orders heretofore given. Did not advise the War Department except in the general dispatch, believing that the report to the headquarters of the Army of the Ohio at Nashville and to the call upon the Governors of Ohio and Indiana would secure the necessary re-enforcements. I have received no reply from the headquarters at Nashville, but have had one regiment sent up the road from Nashville, enabling me to move a portion of the troops already there to other points threatened by Morgan. I do not believe that Morgan's force exceeds from 800 to 1,200 men, with one to three pieces of artillery.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

A. LINCOLN.

CORINTH, MISS., July 13, 1862.

General Buell thinks that the measures he has taken will destroy Morgan's expedition into Tennessee and Kentucky. He reports that he finds the forces of General Mitchel in an utter state of disorganization.

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1862.

General J. T. BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

Your several dispatches received. You should call on General Halleck. Telegraph him at once. I have telegraphed him that you are in trouble.

A. LINCOLN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
July 13, 1862.

MILES GREENWOOD, Esq., Cincinnati:

You will deliver on the order of Mayor Hatch any cannon made for the Government you may have on hand, in order that they may be used for the defense of Cincinnati or sent to General Boyle in Kentucky.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1862.

GEORGE HATCH, Esq., Mayor, Cincinnati:

General Halleck, in command of the department embracing the State of Kentucky, telegraphs that General Buell thinks that the measures he has taken will destroy Morgan's expedition into Tennessee and Kentucky. The forces for the defense of Kentucky are under command of General Buell, the commanding officer of General Boyle, who no doubt has reported the state of affairs. Mr. Greenwood has been authorized to deliver on your application any Government cannon he may have for the defense of your city or to be used in Kentucky.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, Huntsville, July 14, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville:

I am moving troops toward Kentucky as rapidly as possible, but they are too remote from railroad communication to get there instantly. The movement of the enemy against Nashville may also, I fear, delay them a few days. I am not afraid of Kentucky rising nor of any fatal public consequences, but I deplore the mischief that will be done to individuals.

D. C. BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 14, 1862.

President of Military Board telegraphs me Morgan has withdrawn his force from vicinity of Frankfort. His whereabouts not certainly known to me. He was reported at Danville and Harrodsburg on yesterday. It is believed he is falling back. He may pass out by way of Somerset if he is retreating or in rear of General Morgan at Cumberland Gap. I sent a messenger to General Morgan, informing him that the rebels were in Kentucky; might fall in his rear. I concentrated at Lexington and at Frankfort. Forced to hold those places. I will endeavor to mount a thousand men, and send infantry to engage him if possible. I have organized all the convalescent and convalescing soldiers here into battalions, and ordered officers here, on their way to regiments, to take command. This was absolutely necessary. I have ordered Captain Jenkins, in command of the artillery here, and ordered Major Sidell and Major Sitgreaves to duty in the emergency. I mounted all privates of cavalry here and some of the infantry for duty, and placed them under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, of Second Indiana Cavalry. I have so far protected the Nashville Railroad, over which supplies pass to General Buell's army. I have called citizen soldiers to aid in this. Henderson and Owensborough, on the Ohio River, have been troubled by rebel bands in their vicinity. I have, from necessity here, withdrawn part of force there. If I can succeed in getting the Home Guard soldiers to organize and arm I hope to suppress them. I have not force sufficient to protect any point. So far I have done the best that could have been done, considering my force and condition of officers. I have sent by special train to Nashville Colonel Moody's regiment, at the earnest request of Governor Johnson, who says Nashville is threatened and Murfreesborough taken by the rebels from various parts of the State. Officers of cavalry companies are made to do duty in Kentucky. Will you authorize my raising some companies of cavalry to do duty in this State and have them paid as regularly enlisted cavalry?

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
July 14, 1862.

GEORGE HATCH, Esq., Mayor, Cincinnati, Ohio:

Since my dispatch to you a telegram from General Boyle has reached here stating that Morgan has retreated. As there will be no occasion for the cannon to be sent to Kentucky at present the order to Miles Greenwood has been countermanded.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 15, 1862.

I have organized all convalescents into regiments to defend this place and some of the bridges. I have ordered Major Sidell, Captain Gay, Colonel Maxwell, and other officers to duty. It was absolutely necessary. I advised the Secretary of War. I will report at another time names of all equally. Morgan's band is divided up and recruiting. He is gathering accessions. We need cavalry. I am mounting an infantry regiment. Governor Morton has sent me one regiment and sends 400 more men to-day. Governor Tod sent one. I use them to defend Frankfort and Lexington. General Ward is commanding at Lexington.

J. T. BOYLE.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 15, 1862.

Morgan has moved on Lebanon, burned the depot, robbed the bank, and burned a considerable portion of the town. He is now at Danville and Harrodsburg, on the roads to Lexington and Frankfort. He is variously reported at 1,500 to 3,000 strong, with three pieces of artillery. After calling into service all the convalescents I have hardly sufficient force to protect the railroads of the State.

Mounted and equipped as Morgan is he cannot be overtaken by infantry. We must have infantry and cavalry. I have advised your headquarters at Nashville from time to time and looked for forces.

Cannot a brigade of infantry and two regiments of cavalry be sent to Kentucky immediately?

J. T. BOYLE.

General D. C. BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 15, 1862.

I am persuaded Morgan has not over 1,000 men and two brass howitzers. Jack Allen probably has over 100 and there are several squads raised by domestic rebels. The secessionists have lied for Morgan and magnified his forces. He has divided them up and is burning bridges on Central Railroad between Paris and Lexington. Are well mounted and armed and move fleetly. I have no cavalry properly armed to pursue them. I am mounting some.

You are right in your judgment as to no evil effects except loss of individuals and destruction of property. Only the low and evil will join him. His recruits are few. He will escape, though, between Somerset and Lebanon. I know that Morgan's force is about as stated by me. I have sent reliable men, who learned the facts; one of them joining him to get the facts.

As Mr. Temple informs me, with Metcalfe's regiment of cavalry completed, with one other cavalry regiment, with force in Kentucky, such raids can be stopped if I am allowed to pursue a more rigid policy. Can we not make it to interest of domestic rebels to aid in stopping it?

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 15, 1862.

When will the carbines and cavalry equipments arrive here? Morgan's band are recruiting and gaining more accessions. They are divided up for that purpose. General Buell telegraphs that he is sending force to Tennessee and Kentucky, and sent Colonel Moody's regiment to Nashville yesterday afternoon.

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

LOUISVILLE, July 15, 1862.

Morgan continues his raid. He has several bands marauding and burning bridges. One band north of Lexington burned bridge on Covington Railroad. Morgan's main force supposed to be between Frankfort and Lexington. His operator has his instrument and attempted to deceive us by dispatches, but was detected. Morgan will not retreat until driven by cavalry, which I have not. Can the Governor of Ohio send regiment to Covington and along that road to quiet Covington?

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

NASHVILLE, July 15, 1862.

The following dispatch has just been received by telegraph :

LOUISVILLE, July 15, 1862.

Colonel MILLER:

News just received. Shelbyville occupied by rebels at dark last night; 1,200 strong reported. Eleventh Michigan cannot be spared yet.

J. T. BOYLE.

JNO. F. MILLER,
Colonel, Commanding Post.

Col. J. B. FRY, Chief of Staff.

CINCINNATI, July 15, 1862.

Landram, lieutenant-colonel, commanding Cynthiana, says bridge at Kiser's Station was attacked by 100 guerrillas and burned last night. It is the most important bridge on railroad. We have no military head here. Can't you send an officer?

GEORGE HATCH,
Mayor.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

CINCINNATI, July 15, 1862—10.31 a. m.

General W. T. Ward telegraphed me at midnight that he had positive information from reliable eye-witnesses that at 9 o'clock Morgan was in Versailles, 2 miles distant, with the greater part, if not the whole, of his force. He wishes to have as many men sent as possible. Will you give an order for the cannon?

GEORGE HATCH,
Mayor.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

CINCINNATI, July 15, 1862.

Hon. JOHN A. GURLEY:

Danger of serious trouble here, external if not internal. Men enough for emergency, but no arms; no head. Military commander should be appointed immediately for this post. Press this upon Stanton at once. Immediate action important.

RICHARD SMITH.

LOUISVILLE, July 16, 1862.

It is difficult to ascertain Morgan's force. They have united. Captain Lupton, quartermaster of Fifty-fourth Indiana, informs me that he counted over 1,500 passing toward Georgetown. They are perfectly mounted and armed. They are stealing horses and bridge-burning. They do no other violence. It appears to be an effort at recruiting and to ascertain whether the rebels in the State will join them. They are not meeting with much success. The home rebels are deterred by the forces sent into the State. I have no cavalry to pursue, and can only hold the important points with the raw recruits I have. I am endeavoring to mount men, but find it very difficult. Nothing but cavalry will answer. I will proceed to raise the regiment authorized if it will not be forbidden. I will take steps to prevent persons hostile to the Government and desiring its overthrow from standing for office. I believe this should be done. I have done so in some localities. It is a delicate subject and great responsibility, but I will do it (as it is for the preservation of the Government) if not forbid.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
July 16, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

You are authorized to raise a regiment of cavalry for the service if it can be done in your State.

I will immediately telegraph the Governor of Ohio to ascertain whether any men can be had there.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

NASHVILLE, July 17, 1862.

The following dispatch just received from General Boyle at Louisville:

JULY 17.

Morgan is at Paris, and fighting reported at Cynthiana, on Covington Railroad. Morgan is gathering recruits. Must have force. Said to be two or three regiments of infantry and one of cavalry. Morgan's force increasing. You will communicate to General Buell instantly in forwarding troops to me at this place.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

General D. C. BUELL, Huntsville.

General Nelson is here with his force. Please dispatch me here to reply to General Boyle.

W. H. SIDELL.

Col. J. B. FRY.

LOUISVILLE, July 17, 1862.

If force is sent on the Tennessee border and up the Cumberland River I wish to be advised of it. I shall expect the forces at Nashville to protect and keep open the railroad. Morgan is in Scott and Bourbon Counties. I ordered General Ward to attack the enemy. He did not obey. I ordered Generals Smith and Ward to pursue and attack. I have no officers fit for an emergency.

J. T. BOYLE.

Capt. OLIVER D. GREENE.

LOUISVILLE, July 17, 1862.

Best information is Morgan at Georgetown and Paris. Report from Covington of an attack at Cynthiana to-day. Morgan will probably escape through Montgomery County by way of Pound Gap. He is stealing horses and tearing up railroads. Has about 1,200 or 1,600 men, having gathered some recruits. He has done most damage he can. I ordered an attack by General Ward, an officer at Frankfort, but could not have the order executed. Nothing but cavalry would avail anything. I have ordered pursuit of him, with part of Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry and infantry I have mounted. I have but little hope of overtaking him. I have few officers and raw recruits. With fair officers I could have taken him or cut him up. No man ever had such times.

If you will prevent the villains from coming through Cumberland from Sparta, &c., I will put the scoundrels through. It would hardly justify you bringing your command over. Orders if necessary I will telegraph. I am not satisfactorily advised of the position of the enemy.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

General NELSON.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 17, 1862.

Governor Campbell, Jordan Stokes, and Trimble, of Tennessee, and the prominent men of Kentucky desire that I ask leave to raise cavalry regiment for term of twelve months or for three years, to serve in Kentucky and Tennessee. Twelve-months' men would only need a jacket to distinguish them, and arms and horses, many of which should be taken from secessionists. Twelve-months' men can be had in very short time. Since the rebels have mounted so many of their men we must have cavalry to protect the railroads or General Buell will have to fall back with his whole army for subsistence. We can clear the two States of these villains from the South and at home in less than twelve months. I trust I may have this authority at once. I feel it all-important. Rebels are becoming impudent and propose to celebrate Manassas at Hopkinsville. They have driven off the best Union men at Henderson, on the Ohio River.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

E. M. STANTON.

CINCINNATI, July 17, 1862.

(Received Washington July 17, 1862, 9 p. m.)

Have received no reply to my several dispatches last few days. Rebels reported to have attacked Cynthiana. Have sent all the force I can raise, some arms and ammunition. Appeals constantly made for assistance, which we cannot render.

GEORGE HATCH,
Mayor of Cincinnati.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 17, 1862.

Recent events in Kentucky prove that infantry cannot protect the State against the inroads of hostile cavalry, and we cannot have cavalry force to meet cavalry invaders. Kentucky is in imminent danger of being overrun. The internal strength of sympathizers in this rebellion is underrated. Let General Boyle raise cavalry for twelve months if he cannot get them longer.

J. R. UNDERWOOD.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

HEADQUARTERS, Huntsville, July 18, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville:

I observe a marked difference in the tone of your dispatches of yesterday to me and to General Nelson. As there is nothing in them to determine priority of date, I request you to inform me as exactly as possible what the state of the case is according to your latest information. The condition of things here requires the services of every soldier that can be mustered and perhaps more. No detachments should be sent from here except in case of the greatest necessity. I have not yet received the information called for in regard to the number and disposition of your troops.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

LOUISVILLE, July 18, 1862.

I shall look for re-enforcements from you. It is reported that Breckinridge, with 8,000 men, is 25 miles from Lebanon. I do not believe it, but have ordered out scouts to see.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Major SIDELL, Assistant Adjutant-General.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 18, 1862.

Cynthiana surrounded by Morgan. At last accounts he was 8 miles north of that place. His forces are divided. He has gathered re-enforcements. His force is reported to me as about 2,500; it is estimated by some as over 3,000. I do not believe these reports, though his army increases daily. They spread every possible lie. They have it now that Breckinridge is coming into Kentucky with 8,000 men. He is coming this way by Snell Springs and Somerset or Lebanon. There may be some truth in these reports. I have sent spies and scouts on the border to report facts. Colonel Maxwell moved from Frankfort last night with 1,800 men, cavalry and infantry, and two pieces of artillery, in pursuit of Morgan. I ordered General Smith to march from Lexington in pursuit, directing force to be left at each place to protect them. It is of first moment that I have re-enforcements. You will send this telegram to General Buell.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Major SIDELL, Assistant Adjutant-General.

LOUISVILLE, July 18, 1862.

Morgan continues his raid. Has gathered some recruits. I have in pursuit of him 1,800 men, part of Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry and some infantry mounted and on foot, under Colonel Maxwell. I have some force at Lexington which I had ordered to engage one division of the enemy's force, but orders not obeyed. With such officers as General Ward and General Smith I cannot hope to accomplish much. I shall report their conduct in writing. I have telegraphed General Nelson at Nashville for aid and asked him to come in person. Deficiency in cavalry will prevent the cutting off of Morgan's retreat. I have force at Frankfort and raw recruits from Ohio, and send to-day to that place battalion of three-months' men from Indiana. I have gathered all the force it is possible to get except from Nashville.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 18, 1862.

I have reliable information that Morgan was at Cynthiana last night. My informant shook hands with him and was disarmed by him. Cynthiana surrendered at 5.30 p. m. Boyd's Station, this side of Cynthiana, expects to be attacked every moment. Morgan reported to have 2,500 men. We have no organized forces here. A few arms and some ammunition.

GEO. HATCH.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

LOUISVILLE, July 19, 1862.

The boldness of Morgan's raid gives reason to believe that he is to be re-enforced and that they will fall upon Kentucky in her helpless condition. Major Sidell telegraphs that Baxter is threatening at Murfreesborough and that I can have no re-enforcements from there.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 19, 1862.

I moved from Frankfort a force of 1,800 men, consisting of cavalry, infantry mounted and on foot, and two pieces of Thirteenth Indiana Battery, under Colonel Maxwell, in pursuit of Morgan in direction of Georgetown. I ordered General Smith with smaller force from Lexington on Paris. He attacked part of Morgan's force at Paris this morning about 10 o'clock, driving them out, killing 12, and putting others to flight. Morgan was moving rapidly in direction of Winchester, General Smith in pursuit. I ordered Colonel Warner with 500 men to move on him and engage him at Winchester, and after these positive orders, accompanied with a threat, he is just moving now, at 6 o'clock. I ordered Colonel Wolford on yesterday with volunteer cavalry to move toward Richmond and Winchester to intercept Morgan and protect the trains to Cumberland Gap. I ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Cochran, of Second Kentucky Cavalry, in command of men mounted by me and part of Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, to march this morning from Danville for Winchester in pursuit and to cut off retreat. If General Ward and others had obeyed my orders I would have prevented the great extent of Morgan's raid. I relieved Ward and put Smith in command as soon as he could reach Lexington. Morgan has done great damage and stolen a great number of horses and other property. I shall levy heavy contribution on his uncles and other secessionists; it is the only way to prevent a repetition of his raids. I shall publish orders forbidding any secessionists standing for office, and see that those who desire the overthrow of the Government do not acquire influence from official positions to render effective their efforts to overthrow the Government.

I have advised the President and Secretary of War of every purpose. I believe Morgan will pass out by Pound Gap; he may fall down below Cumberland Gap into East Tennessee. The domestic rebels will subside for a season, though there are bands over the State.

J. T. BOYLE.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 19, 1862.

General G. Clay Smith telegraphs me that he drove Morgan from Paris at 10 o'clock to-day, killed 10 or 12, and took as many prisoners. He is in pursuit of Morgan. I have ordered Colonel Warner to advance from Lexington on Winchester and sent cavalry from Danville toward Winchester. I ordered Colonel Wolford, with volunteer cavalry, on yesterday to proceed to Richmond and cut off retreat and protect General Morgan's trains going to Cumberland Gap. No loss on our side.

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, Louisville, July 19, 1862.

The State is in imminent danger of being overrun by Morgan and those joining him. If he should succeed in a fight with our forces there is danger of an uprising of the traitors in our midst. I telegraphed General Buell, also General Nelson, who is at Murfreesborough, and he replied to me that 30,000 rebels threaten him at that place and that he expects an engagement. There must be some mistake as to their number. There is a concerted plan between the traitors at home and the rebels in arms. The pretended deserters who have taken the oath and received paroles and prisoners turned loose are agencies in the plans and spies in our midst. Morgan's force has increased—is estimated at from 2,500 to 3,500. I do not believe it so large. Every species of falsehood is circulated by the traitors at home, producing consternation among the people, to get the people to rise. Morgan proclaims that Breckinridge is coming with 30,000 men. Traitors through the State circulate it.

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON.

LOUISVILLE, July 20, 1862.

Last heard of Morgan he had been attacked and defeated near Paris, losing 30 men. Returned toward Winchester. I have ordered Colonel Warner to march with 600 men from Lexington and attack him at all hazards; have sent Colonel Wolford to intercept his retreat at Richmond. I do not believe now he had over 1,000 or 1,200 men; he has received only 150 or 200 recruits in the State. Will keep you fully advised of progress of events.

J. T. BOYLE.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 20, 1862.

Morgan was at Winchester; General Smith was moving after him. I ordered Colonel [Warner] from Lexington with one piece of artillery and 500 infantry to move toward Winchester and co-operate with Smith. I ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Cochran with 500 cavalry to march this morning from Nicholasville. He did not leave until this morning, when I ordered him to move to Winchester or Richmond, as his information determined position of Morgan. Wolford I had ordered two days ago to go to Richmond. If he obeyed he should be there this morning. Green Clay, formerly of Jackson, gives information that 200 or 300 rebels entered Richmond before day or last night. Rebels send back word that Hon. John Williams is furnishing re-enforcements to Morgan. I believe it is a lie. Every conceivable lie is told. Morgan has not received more than 100 to 200 re-enforcements, if so many. His whole force does not exceed 1,200, if that, though our men aver they counted over 1,500. The rebel lies alarmed some of my commanding officers and produced consternation among the people. There are bands of guerrillas in Henderson, Davis, Webster, and Union Counties. A rebel captain (A. R. Johnson) issued a proclamation at Henderson that the Yankee Government had surrendered Kentucky to Jeff. Davis, and C. Merywether celebrated the anniversary of Manassas at Hopkinsville. As soon as I am rid of Morgan I will clear out that region. I think Morgan will pass out through Whitley County or by Somerset and Mill Springs. If a cavalry regiment with infantry force and artillery were at Sparta, Tenn., it would protect our border and relieve greatly East Tennessee.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 20, 1862.

At last accounts Morgan was at Richmond; part of his men reported as being at Lancaster. General Smith was between Lexington and Richmond with 600 cavalry. I have heard nothing of Colonel Wolford. Colonel Maxwell has not kept me advised of his routes. Sent couriers to order him to move to Lexington. Morgan may attempt to return the route he went. I have so small a force that I have to ship them from point to point.

Morgan at Crab Orchard, going toward Somerset; my force pursuing him. He is too far ahead to overtake. Wolford may overhaul him at Somerset and harass him so that forces can overtake him. He will go out by Mill Springs. Will rest and recruit at Sparta, Tenn.

LOUISVILLE, July 21, 1862.

No information of Morgan since last dispatch. I have ordered General Smith to continue pursuit and not allow Morgan to take position at Mill Springs. General Morgan telegraphs from the Gap that 1,100 Louisiana cavalry, to be re-enforced with artillery and infantry, are at Kingston. General Morgan says scouts from Morristown state Kentucky is to be invaded through Pound Gap. General Morgan has sent a regiment to Barbourville. I will send to London. There are rumors of bands in every part of the State.

Morgan at Somerset. He is moving from Somerset. My force pursuing. Colonel Wolford is on way for Somerset with 600 mounted men. May overhaul Morgan there, and detain him until pursuing force comes up. Morgan will go out by Mill Springs. He has been in retreat for three days before my forces. He has the best mounted men in the world.

LOUISVILLE, July 21, 1862—10 p. m.

No information since my last as to Morgan. He is probably at Somerset. I have ordered my force to continue pursuit, and not allow him to remain at Mill Springs. General Morgan telegraphs from Cumberland Gap that 1,100 Louisiana cavalry, to be re-enforced with artillery and infantry at Kingston, Tenn., are to invade Kentucky. He says scouts state that Kentucky is to be invaded by Pound Gap. This may all be rebel lies. They have bands in many parts of this State. Many of the best men in the State believe there is preparation for a general uprising. I believe there is such purpose and plans.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, D. C., July 22, 1862.

Brig. Gen. J. T. BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

SIR: You are hereby authorized to raise in Kentucky three regiments of cavalry, to be organized in accordance with the plan of organization hereunto attached, and to be mustered into the service of the United States for one year unless sooner discharged.

Horses will be supplied as far as possible by taking them from disloyal persons within the boundaries of your command. The muster rolls will be promptly and carefully made out and copies forwarded to the Adjutant-General as soon as practicable.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Brigadier-General and Assistant Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS,
Louisville, July 22, 1862—4.45 p. m.

Only 820 carbines have been received. Can I not have 1,200 more immediately, with pistols? We want more muskets for Kentucky. I can and will put the rebels down in the State if General Buell will hold them south of the Cumberland.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Mr. WATSON, Assistant Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 23, 1862.

Our forces are at Somerset. Morgan passed through there yesterday. I ordered General Smith to drive him from the State. Colonel Bruce informs me to-night that 3,000 rebel cavalry are at or near Scottsville, invading the State. I do not believe there is such a force. Morgan may join with another force they have and return. I shall issue orders directing guerrillas and armed squads to be shot and not taken prisoners. I shall seize horses of secessionists to mount my men, and at proper time require them to pay for Union men's property stolen and destroyed. A more vigorous policy must be pursued in Kentucky or all is lost.

J. T. BOYLE.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 23, 1862.

Have about 1,000 to 1,200 cavalry ready for equipments. I have no new infantry. Kentucky has distributed her guns to Home Guards. I have armed convalescent infantry. Another invasion threatened upon Kentucky from Tennessee. Gallagher guns worthless. Officers do not want them—prefer muskets to them. We need pistols for cavalry.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General.

P. H. WATSON, Assistant Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 23, 1862—1.30 p. m.

General Ripley asks for objections to Gallagher carbines. They snap often; the cartridge hangs in after firing; difficult to get the exploded cartridges out often with screw-driver; men throw them away and take musket or any other arm. They are unquestionably worthless. Can we get Sharps, or Wesson's, or Ballard's, or some other kind? Sharps best. We are much in need of carbines and pistols. I beg we be supplied. Wesson's carbines can be had at Cincinnati at $25, probably for less.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

LOUISVILLE, July 23, 1862—1.30 p. m.

Can I furnish arms to the Home Guards in this city? Military Board have distributed all their arms. I have given out some arms to Home Guards. Morgan passed through Somerset, General Smith still pursuing. Ordered him to drive Morgan out of the State.

I approve of punishing the guilty, but it will not answer to announce the rule of no quarter even to guerrillas. Neither will it be judicious to levy contributions upon secessionists for opinions alone. But with those who have given aid and comfort to Morgan's raid it will be proper to deal in the strictest manner. I approve of your preventing any avowed secessionist from being run for an office.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 24, 1862.

No official report of affair at Cynthiana received. About 100 men were engaged; nearly 30 taken prisoners, and few of them mustered into service. Enemy's loss greater than our own. Morgan left Monticello yesterday for Sparta, Tenn.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 25, 1862.

Morgan has left the State. General Smith ought to have taken him. Will report fully as I have time. Morgan gone to Sparta. There is rebel cavalry at Huntsville, Salina, and near Sparta. I trust they may be taken. There are bands over the State; nearly all the pretended deserters from the rebels and paroled soldiers and those who have passed our lines form their bands or the nucleus. If they could be cut off at Sparta we could give protection to other parts. I have the Fifteenth Kentucky at Lexington and on the Covington Railroad; the Fifty-fourth Indiana at Frankfort. Pickets fired on at Frankfort last night by band of 25 secessionists. I have Sixteenth Kentucky from Big Sandy here. The Eleventh Michigan is here on way to Russellville to drive the rebel bands from Logan, Christian, Trigg, and Todd Counties. Parts of the Twenty-eighth Kentucky and Fiftieth Indiana are on Nashville Railroad. The Sixtieth Indiana and Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, who were after Morgan, I have ordered to Lebanon. I have some 500 convalescents here; sending them forward gradually. Shall I arm them from the arsenal here?

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Major-General BUELL.

LOUISVILLE, July 29, 1862.

Morgan is at Livingston or Sparta, resting their party for another raid. The rebels are recruiting a larger force in Tennessee. I have over 2,000 cavalry ready for arms, &c., under orders issued to me last week by War Department. I will soon have between 3,000 and 4,000 cavalry, if I can get equipments and arms. I seize my horses from secessionists by written authority from the Government. Could not get horses otherwise. Can we not catch Morgan? Shall I move into East Tennessee; leave the guerrillas to be destroyed by other forces? We ought not to give up that part of Kentucky to them. If I had any officers to aid me could get on. Can I have General Johnson? Don't you want General G. Clay Smith?

J. T. BOYLE.

Col. J. B. FRY, *Chief of Staff.*HEADQUARTERS, *Huntsville, July 30, 1862.*General BOYLE, Louisville:

I am gratified to hear that you are getting so considerable a cavalry force. In the phase the war is assuming it is daily becoming more important. If you have four or even three regiments the best disposition of them to protect Kentucky against any more Morgan raids would be to place two in the vicinity of Cookeville, Tenn., and the rest at Columbia, Ky. The former would be in a position to act in conjunction with the latter and with the movements I am making in Tennessee. After all, the security of Kentucky depends on depriving the enemy of any resting place in Tennessee. You cannot operate advantageously toward East Tennessee except in conjunction with the troops moving from Nashville or those at Cumberland Gap, and the former would be best at this time.

If your cavalry is not sufficient to divide in the way I mention, Columbia or Glasgow is the best position for it. With the bridges fortified with stockades as I have directed nearly your whole force can be used in a body wherever required. I cannot spare General Johnson, as he is in command of the cavalry and other troops about Murfreesborough. Let me know what effective cavalry force you now have and where posted.

D. C. BUELL,
*Major-General.*LOUISVILLE, July 30, 1862.

Morgan went from Livingston, taking road to Sequatchie Valley, saying his intention was to go to Knoxville. He left 400 or 500 10 miles southward of Livingston. He declared his purpose to return to Kentucky. Two hundred and fifteen of Morgan's recruits, from Owen and other counties, were overtaken by Major Bracht, Eighteenth Kentucky, and Home Guards, at Flemingsburg, and routed, 13 killed, 78 captured; pursuing the others. We had 3 wounded. I shall send Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry into Clinton and Wayne Counties to protect people at election. The regiment turns out to be a poor concern. Metcalfe's regiment cavalry (three years) nearly completed. Almost 2,000 recruits for new cavalry regiments. I can't get horses.

Have stockades been built at the bridges as ordered? With such an arrangement 30 or 40 men can protect the road at any point except, perhaps Bowling Green and Green River, where there ought to be from two to four companies.

Reports of Col. John F. Miller, Twenty-ninth Indiana Infantry, commanding at Nashville, Tenn.

NASHVILLE, July 9, 1862.

The following dispatch was received this evening from General Boyle:

LOUISVILLE, July 9, 1862.

Four companies Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry defeated with great loss this morning at Tompkinsville by Starnes' rebel cavalry, 1,000 strong. Are marching rapidly to Bowling Green. They took no prisoners, but killed without mercy. Can you assist us, and how? Send up a regiment to Bowling Green and send cavalry to cut off retreat of rebels.

Later he says:

The rebels are making a raid in force of 1,500 or 5,000 into Kentucky. Are near Glasgow. Send us one or two regiments to Munfordsville to-night by railroad; it is of moment.

I sent the Eleventh Michigan Regiment about midnight up the railroad to his assistance. A courier from Major Ballard at Lebanon has just arrived with dispatches from Lieutenant Vale, commanding detachment of Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, at Alexandria, Tenn., dated this day, reporting upon what he calls reliable information that John Morgan is now at Sparta, with a force of 4,000 men, pressing horses, forage, &c., rapidly preparing for an expedition, either toward Nashville or into Kentucky, the latter being his avowed destination.

Major Ballard has sent out scouts toward Sparta.

JNO. F. MILLER,
Commanding Post.

Col. J. B. FRY.

HEADQUARTERS U. S. FORCES,
Nashville, July 12, 1862.

COLONEL: Since my dispatch to you I sent five companies Seventy-fourth Ohio and one section Bush's battery to Bowling Green, having sent the Eleventh Michigan before Morgan menaced Bowling Green and Munfordsville.

The following dispatch just received from Bowling Green shows result thus far:

Colonel Moore routed them at Lebanon, Ky., yesterday. They are reported retreating toward Greensburg. Colonel Owen cut party of 500 to pieces above Burkesville. Colonel Stoughton and other forces are marching to intercept them at Bear Wallow. Six hundred men under Colonel Moody, with one piece of artillery, have marched to Scottsville to cut them off there. Rivers rising, which is favorable to us.

S. D. BRUCE,
Colonel, Commanding.

I will send First Tennessee, Colonel Gillem, one section Bush's battery and two companies cavalry to Lebanon, Tenn., to-day. Have there now four companies infantry and two companies cavalry. Some forces may go over from Murfreesborough also.

We will move northeast from Lebanon above Sparta to take or scatter Starnes, who is in that region with from 500 to 1,000 men, and to intercept retreating rebels from Kentucky.

No. 4.

Report of Maj. Thomas J. Jordan, Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, of the capture of Tomkinsville.

LOUISVILLE, KY., December 29, 1862.

SIR: On July 6 I was in command of the post at Tompkinsville, Ky., having with me Companies C, I, and M, of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry. During that day I was informed that a large body of the enemy were collecting at Salina, a little village on the south side of the Cumberland River, some 20 miles from me. About the same time I learned that Company E, of my regiment, was at Glasgow, Ky., 27 miles north of me. I at once ordered that company to join me, which it did about noon on the 7th, thus making my command about 230 effective men. With this force I determined to attack Salina, and, if possible, capture or disperse the forces of the enemy at that point before they could be fully concentrated.

At 8 o'clock on that night I moved from my camp with my whole command, leaving only a detachment of Company M to guard my tents and stores. I succeeded in crossing the Cumberland at a point 12 miles north of Salina, and at daylight on the morning of the 8th entered the place, but I was disappointed in not finding the enemy. I made every inquiry probable from the inhabitants, but all denied any knowledge of forces being either there or in the neighborhood. Thinking that I had been misled, but far from being satisfied, I marched back to my camp, at which I arrived about 8 o'clock in the evening. I at once ordered the usual pickets to be posted on all the roads leading to my position, and also an extra one far out on the Salina road, so as to secure my camp against surprise during the night.

As day broke on the morning of the 9th reveille was sounded, and in a few moments my men were busily engaged in feeding and cleaning their horses. My officers were all at their posts, when a faint discharge of fire-arms was heard far out on the Salina road. I at once ordered the horses to be saddled, and in a few moments my pickets reported the enemy approaching in large force, and within a minute the head of Colonel Morgan's command began to deploy from the woods into an open field some 300 yards from me. I soon found that his force outnumbered mine by six to one, but as he showed no disposition to charge me I deemed it prudent not to retreat. His command soon opened to the right and left in front of me, displaying two pieces of cannon in position, which at once opened upon me with shell. I replied with my carbines, and could distinctly see that we were doing good execution.

Finding at the tenth round of the enemy that they were getting my range and seeing a movement from their right flank intended to gain my rear I gave the order to wheel and retreat. This movement was done with the precision of a parade, my men remaining perfectly cool and obedient to my orders. To gain the Burkesville road it was necessary that my retreat should be through a deep woods in my rear. I had not entered it but a few yards when I was opened upon by a line of the enemy, consisting of two squadrons of Texas Rangers, who had been thrown in my rear. I at once ordered my men to charge the line, which they did in the most gallant style, literally overturning the Rangers and driving them from the field. The Burkesville road being gained, my retreat was conducted in a most orderly manner, the enemy not pursuing us until we had gained some 2 miles, when, hearing firing in my rear, I deemed it proper for me to personally look to my rear guard, that I had placed under charge of Lieutenant Sullivan, of Company E. For this purpose I rode to the rear of my column and found that the firing proceeded from beyond a turn in the road some 200 yards behind my rear guard. Fearing that some of my men might have been separated from my command and were being attacked I rode back to the turn, so as to be able to see, when I discovered Lieutenant Sullivan in the act of being murdered by some 20 of the enemy, who had surrounded him. I at once turned my horse for the purpose of rejoining my command, when I found two of the enemy already in the road before me and in a moment after they were increased to 6, thus entirely cutting me off from my men. I determined to try and force my way through them, with my pistol answering their shot-guns, but I soon found that resistance would be madness and surrendered myself a prisoner of war. After I had surrendered I was fired upon at the distance of but a few feet, the charge, happily for me, missing its mark, but blackening the side of my face with the powder.

The forces of Colonel Morgan on that occasion consisted of his own brigade, Colonel Hunt's (Fifth Georgia) regiment of cavalry, a regiment of Alabama cavalry, two squadrons of Texas Rangers, and the independent companies of Captains Bledsoe, Hamilton, McMillin, and Ferguson, numbering in all some 2,000 men, with two pieces of artillery.

My loss was 4 killed (including Lieutenant Sullivan), 7 wounded, and 19 prisoners. I also lost my tents, wagons, mules, and personal baggage of my command. On the part of the enemy I have been informed that 19 were killed or mortally wounded and 28 slightly. Colonel Hunt was mortally wounded and died at Tompkinsville.

I cannot speak too highly of the coolness and bravery displayed by my officers and men. My orders were promptly obeyed and every one did his whole duty.

Respectfully submitted.

THOS. J. JORDAN,
Major, Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Brigadier-General BOYLE.

No. 5.

Report of Lieut. Col. John J. Landram, Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry, of the capture of Cynthiana.

HEADQUARTERS,
Cynthiana, Ky., July 24, 1862.

On Thursday, the 17th instant, about 3 p. m., I was attacked at this place by the forces under command of Col. John H. Morgan, comprising three regiments, composed of Kentuckians, Tennesseans, Georgians, Mississippians, Texans, and South Carolinians, estimated variously at from 1,500 to 3,000 men, reported by Captain Alston, his adjutant-general, at 2,200 strong, and two pieces of artillery. The forces under my command were composed of about 15 men of the Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers and the following Home Guards: About 60 men under Capt. J. B. McClintock and from 50 to 60 men under Capt. Lafe Wilson, from Cynthiana and vicinity; Capt. John S. Arthur, of Newport, 50 men; Capt. J. J. Wright, of Cincinnati, 40 men; Captain Pepper, of Bracken County, 35 men; 75 men of the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry (raw recruits), under Maj. William O. Smith, and one brass 12-pounder and a small artillery squad, under Capt. W. H. Glass, of Cincinnati, amounting in the aggregate to about 340 men, the majority of them poorly armed and nearly all totally undisciplined.

After my pickets were driven in and before I had time to dispose my little force the enemy commenced shelling the town without notice to me to remove the women and children. I immediately ordered Captain Glass to occupy the public square with his artillery, from which point he could command most of the roads entering the town; Captain Arthur's company to support it. I also at the same time ordered a portion of my force to take position on the Magee Hill road, south of town, and soon hearing considerable firing in that quarter presumed they were approaching in that direction in heavy force. I then posted a portion of my force on the river bank, on the west side of the town, near the Licking Bridge, from which direction Morgan's main force seemed to be approaching, with instructions to hold the bridge at all hazards. At this time I ordered Captain Glass to put his piece in position, so as to command Morgan's battery and, if possible, to silence it, which was done at the second discharge. I then discovered that the town was circumvented, and we were completely surrounded by a superior force, the enemy approaching by every road, street, and by-path, and deployed as skirmishers through every field, completely encircling us. I ordered Captain Glass to put his gun in position to command the Millersburg road and give the enemy grape and canister, which was done with good effect. By this time my little band was engaged at every point. The fighting on both sides was terrific. The enemy, having possession of the streets, were pouring a galling fire upon us from the shelter of houses, fences, &c., and the artillery squad, being subjected to a cross-fire, was compelled to abandon their piece. My men at the bridge were, after a most desperate conflict, driven back by very superior numbers and a cavalry charge made through the streets by Morgan's forces. At this time I rallied a part of my forces at the railroad depot, at which point our boys gave them a warm reception, emptying several saddles. I then went again for the purpose of rallying the artillery squad, so as to place it on the hill near the residence of M. L. Broadwell, from which position we could have commanded the town and several roads leading to it, but was unable to find either men or gun, the streets in every direction being in possession of the rebels.

My men were exhausted and out of ammunition, but I rallied them, and at the depot distributed cartridges to them. The firing at this time having nearly ceased I rode along the railroad to Rankin's Hotel, to ascertain what position the enemy was taking and from what direction they were coming in heaviest force. Here I met an officer of the rebel band, aide to Colonel Morgan, a son of the late Beverly L. Clark, who demanded my surrender. I replied, "I never surrender," and instantly discharged three shots at him, two of which took effect in his breast. He fell from his horse and I thought him dead, but he is still living and will probably recover, notwithstanding two balls passed through his body. Captain Rogers also discharged a shot at him, which took effect. I then rallied a part of my force, about 40 in number, determined to make a charge on the enemy at the Licking Bridge and take their battery, which had been brought to that point and was being used with effect upon my little band of patriot heroes. The force sustaining their artillery outnumbered ours more than ten to one, and were all the while under cover of houses, &c. Besides this a force of the rebels at least 300 strong were pouring an incessant and deadly fire upon my little band from the rear about 125 yards distant.

It was here that Jacob Carver, of Company E, Eighteenth Kentucky, fell severely wounded—as brave a man as ever pulled trigger—and I received a slight wound in the ankle. It was here too that the lamented Thomas Ware, United States commissioner for this county, one of the oldest citizens of Cynthiana, was instantly killed, nobly and bravely doing his duty as a patriot. Here, too, were killed Jesse Current, young Thomas Rankin, Capt. Lafe Wilson, young Hartburn of Cincinnati, and others, besides many—including F. L. St. Thomas, John Scott, Captain McClintock, John McClintock, Thomas Barry of Cincinnati, and Thomas J. Vimont—who fell severely wounded.

In consequence of the terrific storm of balls, and as but few of my men were left, among whom was William W. Trimble and J. S. Frizell, of this place, who was also wounded (others not remembered), I ordered a retreat.

In the mean time Maj. William O. Smith had command of the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry and was posted north of town to hold the Claysville road and prevent the enemy from gaining the streets from that direction, where he made a gallant resistance near the Episcopal Church, until overpowered by superior numbers and forced to fall back toward the Reform Church and thence to the court-house, where he and his command were compelled to surrender.

At this time more than three-fourths of my men were killed, wounded, and prisoners, and I determined to cut my way through the enemy and escape with the remainder if possible. I rallied together from 20 to 25 of my men at the depot and started in a southeasterly direction through Redmon's pasture, where we met a body of the enemy, who had crossed from the Millersburg road. They were secreted behind fences, trees, and hay-cocks. We at once engaged them and soon routed them. Upon turning around I discovered that the enemy had pursued us from town, and were on our rear not more than 40 paces distant. I ordered my handful of men to cross the hill-side and fight them from behind the fences, which they did, and held them in check until nearly surrounded by a body of cavalry at least ten times their number. I then ordered my men to retreat beyond a fence in a southeasterly direction to avoid a cavalry charge. Here a part of my men became exhausted, some falling by the wayside to await their fate, their ammunition all expended, when I informed the little Spartan band we could do no more; to save themselves and I would do likewise, if possible, and bade them good-by.

Each and every man of this noble little squad fought with desperation and the coolness of veterans. Among them were James F. Ware, John R. Smith, William Kimbrough, Lieut. William M. Dayton, Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers; Lieut. W. C. Sleet, Company E, Eighteenth Kentucky; Silas Howe, sergeant, Company E, Eighteenth Kentucky; Albert Roper, sergeant, Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky; Capt. J. J. Wright, of Cincinnati, and others not now remembered, to any one of whom too much praise cannot be awarded.

Capt. Lafe Wilson fell near the depot, and continued to discharge his revolver as long as life lasted. His last words were, "Never surrender, boys."

Capt. J. B. McClintock fell severely wounded while urging his men to the charge.

Capt. S. G. Rogers, Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky, was wounded while gallantly resisting the foe.

I cannot particularize further; it is enough to say that all my men fought like heroes and veterans in the face of a greatly superior force, as is evidenced by the slaughter that ensued, having held them in check for nearly three hours against a most galling fire, which was poured in upon us from every side. I think it beyond doubt one of the most sanguinary conflicts of the war, considering the numbers engaged.

Rev. George Morrison, of this place, rendered me very important service before and during the engagement in conveying orders to the different commands under me.

It is quite difficult to ascertain the number in killed and wounded on their side, as the enemy had possession of the field, and our men, all being prisoners, had no opportunity to make examination until paroled, at which time the enemy had buried their dead and sent off most of their wounded.

I herewith append a list* of Federals killed and wounded, furnished me by Dr. W. T. McNeas, assistant surgeon of Seventh Kentucky Cavalry.

I can give no accurate account of the rebel dead, Morgan having taken off eight burial-cases from this place and his men having been seen hauling off their dead toward Georgetown, the Magee road, and Millersburg road after the fight. Two of their wounded died at Winchester and two beyond that place. Since Morgan left 13 of his dead have been taken from the river near Cynthiana, where they were thrown for concealment. Morgan himself admitted at Paris a loss here of 24 killed and 78 wounded, and that of seventeen engagements participated in by him since the beginning of the war the affair at Cynthiana was much the fiercest and most desperate.

I append also a list* of rebel wounded left in Cynthiana. Nine of their wounded are also at Paris, besides a number left along the road between this place and Richmond, Ky., to which point we pursued him, by command of General G. C. Smith.

We are under great obligations to the companies from Cincinnati, Newport, and Bracken County, Kentucky, under Captains Wright, Arthur, and Pepper, for their invaluable aid, who distinguished themselves on that occasion and fought like heroes.

The friends and relatives of the wounded of both sides are greatly indebted to Surg. W. T. McNeese, Seventh Kentucky Cavalry; Drs. J. C. Frazier, A. Adams, W. O. Smith, J. A. Kirkpatrick, John A. Lair, and ——— McLeod, for their unremitting attention to the wounded, and to the ladies of Cynthiana unbounded praise is due for their untiring ministrations upon the wounded, &c.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,
J. J. LANDRAM,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding.

Report of Brig. Gen. G. Clay Smith, U. S. Army, of operations July 13–25, including skirmish near Paris.

LEBANON, KY., July 26, 1862.

SIR: By order of General Boyle I left the southern part of the State on the 13th, and assumed command of some forces in Frankfort, Ky., on the 16th day of this month. As soon as I reached that point I immediately set to work to organize a sufficient force to move against General John Morgan, said to be in camp near Georgetown.

At 9 p. m. of the day I reached Frankfort I was ready to march with 1,320 men, 430 of which were of Colonel Williams' (Ninth Pennsylvania) cavalry, which I had brought with me from the lower part of the State; two pieces of Captain Nicklin's (Thirteenth Indiana) battery, and two pieces gotten up by Home Guards, under Captain Goins; Colonel Mahan's Indiana regiment of infantry, and one company of regulars under Captain Biddle.

On the cars at 9 p. m. Colonel Maxwell reached Frankfort with Colonel Stoughton's Michigan regiment and orders to assume command of that point and the forces, and directions for me to proceed to Lexington and take control of matters there. I left as early as possible with 230 of Colonel Williams' cavalry and reached Lexington at 7 o'clock in the morning. General Ward, by orders from General Boyle, turned over his command to me. I learned that General Morgan was in the neighborhood of Paris and would probably take possession of that town during the day or that night. I organized a force of 595 men—230 Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, under Maj. John Marshall; 165 Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry, under Colonel Landram; 100 Cincinnati police, under Captain Dudley, and 100 Home Guards, under Captain Faulkner, of Garrard, leaving balance of force to protect Lexington.

At 12 o'clock at night I moved from Lexington toward Paris and overtook Colonel Metcalfe within 6 miles of Paris with a portion of his regiment and some Home Guards, numbering about 500, and three pieces of large artillery, of little use on a chase. With this column I moved on toward Paris, determining to govern the disposition of my command by the position of the enemy.

At 9 o'clock the evening before I sent an order to Colonel Maxwell, who had reached Georgetown, to move on toward Paris without delay, and when within 4 or 5 miles of the town halt and notify me; that he should be in that distance of Paris by daylight. When I reached Metcalfe's camp I dispatched a messenger to Colonel Maxwell to move on rapidly and occupy the Lexington road, that I might cross over to the Winchester pike, which could have been done in a short time. I did not deem it prudent to leave the Lexington road without a force. I heard nothing from Colonel Maxwell. In a few minutes afterward my advance began to fight. I dispatched another messenger to Colonel Maxwell to let me know his position, and also to move in haste and hold the position I had before designated. I heard nothing from him. In half an hour more I sent the third messenger, but with same result; therefore I did not know whether Colonel Maxwell was in reach or not. My advance by this time was skirmishing heavily and I had thrown out Colonel Landram's command to clear the woods, my column moving on with them a quarter of a mile in rear. From all indications and the advantages of the ground, with a creek and bridge in front to cross, I believed the enemy had taken position on the Lexington pike and intended to give fight on that side of Paris. I could not divide my force, for half were raw Home Guards, badly armed, without sabers, and many without pistols. I pressed on, however, determining to give him battle wherever found.

At or near the bridge 1 mile from Paris, on Lexington pike, I received a dispatch from a very reliable gentleman living in Paris that General Morgan, 1,500 strong, was in line of battle and somewhat fortified in Garrett Davis' woods, south of the town, and would make a stand. With fighting in front and the information that the enemy was ready to receive me I could do nothing else than advance. As I did, my advance pushed back the enemy and made a dash into town, when I found that Morgan had retreated rapidly toward Winchester. I occupied his encampment, and in a short time Colonel Maxwell came up, when I learned that 4 miles from town he had formed line of battle and remained so for near two hours.

When Colonel Maxwell reached me I found his troops, as well as my own, jaded, tired, and hungry, but intended to move forward without delay. My orders had been issued, when Captain Brunt [?], of Paris Home Guard, came to me in great speed with the intelligence that Morgan had been re-enforced 7 miles from town by 2,000 men, under Colonel Williams, and were returning to Paris. He told me his informant was a reliable man and had seen the forces. I could not doubt the report, and therefore prepared to receive him in the position I occupied. I sent, however, Colonel Metcalfe, with 250 of his men, to examine the country and ascertain the facts. He returned in the evening with report of no one in front of him.

In the mean time the men got something to eat, horses fed, and orders were given to march, when a very heavy, drenching thunderstorm came up, which lasted the greater portion of the night. Many of the Home Guards left for their homes, and thereby reduced my cavalry force.

Early in the morning I moved for Winchester, leaving Colonel Metcalfe and his command in Paris. Captain Wadsworth, with his Home Guards, accompanied me. When I reached Winchester I ordered Colonel Mahan to remain with his regiment, and Colonel Guthrie and Captain Dudley and the three large pieces of artillery to return to Lexington as soon as possible. At Richmond I was joined by Colonel Cochran with five companies of Colonel Williams' (Ninth Pennsylvania) cavalry, some of Colonel Metcalfe's, under Colonel Halisy, and a company of Home Guards, under Colonel Worthington. I left Colonel Maxwell with the remainder of infantry at this point and pushed on in pursuit.

From the time I left Paris until I drew near to Somerset I halted only long enough to feed, as best we could, once a day; traveled day and night, yet was unable to overhaul the running enemy. When crossing Paint Lick, between Garrard and Madison, I learned Morgan had burned the bridge over Dick's River, on the Crab Orchard road, hence I took the Lancaster and Stanford route, with the hope of overtaking him somewhere in Pulaski, but when within 12 or 13 miles of Somerset I learned reliably that he had passed out of Kentucky into Tennessee and was moving on from the line. I halted and turned my course to Stanford.

On the entire trip I am forced to say that I never received a word of intelligence as to the movement or whereabouts of the enemy save through the scouts I sent out from my command and from intelligence received at and near Paris. It was my conviction that Morgan intended to attack Lexington, believing the troops had all been withdrawn and in pursuit of him. I was therefore anxious and particular to protect the city and the Government stores deposited there; hence I kept the woods watched until I ascertained the line of Morgan's retreat was through Richmond. I could receive no communication from a force anywhere in front of me until after I left Richmond and almost reached Lancaster, then I ascertained that Colonel Wolford, with 300 or 400 Home Guards, was somewhere in Pulaski. I immediately dispatched him to fall in front of Morgan and impede him as much as possible. I do not know that the messenger reached him; but after I got into Pulaski I sent another messenger to him and learned for the first time his troops had been disbanded, with no prospect of using them under three or four days; hence I abandoned the pursuit and returned under orders to this point, which I reached Friday evening.

The endurance with which the men under my command submitted to the deprivation and hardship of that expedition deserves the gratitude of the country and entitles them to my thanks and confidence. Officers and all obeyed my orders promptly.

From the best information received by me the result of the fighting at Paris and on expedition was, rebels:

Killed.....	29
Wounded.....	30
Prisoners.....	18
Total.....	77

Loss on Federal side none.

I will remark that it was the general impression of all with whom I advised that Morgan would make his escape through Mount Sterling, his escape being much more probable that way than any other.

Respectfully, &c.,

G. CLAY SMITH,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Capt. JOHN BOYLE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 7.

Report of Col. Cicero Maxwell, Twenty-sixth Kentucky Infantry, of operations July 18-24.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 24, 1862.

CAPTAIN: In obedience to an order from General Boyle, commanding United States forces in Kentucky, I proceeded from this place to Frankfort, Ky., Thursday afternoon, July 17, and assumed command of the United States forces there.

At 2 a. m. Friday, 18th, the forces under my command—consisting of the Eleventh Michigan Volunteers, Colonel Stoughton; the Fifty-fifth Indiana Volunteers, Colonel Mahan; Company B, Second Battalion, Sixteenth U. S. Infantry, Capt. James Biddle; a small portion of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Colonel Williams, and two sections of artillery, under command of Captain Nicklin, about 1,200 in all, after leaving a small force for the defense of Frankfort—moved toward Georgetown, Scott County, distant 17 miles from Frankfort, where we arrived about 11 a. m. same day, and found that the marauder (Morgan) and his band had left early on the day before. A messenger was sent immediately to General G. Clay Smith at Lexington, with whom I was ordered to co-operate, to inform him of our arrival at Georgetown.

About 12 o'clock Friday night I received an order from General Smith to move the force under my command toward Paris, Bourbon County, distant 18 miles from Georgetown, and when within 4 or 5 miles of that place communicate with him at Lexington.

Between 2 and 3 a. m. Saturday, the 19th instant, just as soon as our pickets could be called in, we moved toward Paris, though slowly at first, owing to the fact that the men had made a long march the day before and had slept but little, the officers urging them forward as fast as possible.

When about half way from Georgetown to Paris an order was received from General Smith, dated 5 a. m., 6 miles from Paris, directing me to press on rapidly, stating that Morgan had moved toward Winchester, and that, though the general's force was small, he would hold Morgan in check until we could get up. I urged the men forward as rapidly as possible and pressed all the wagons and horses we could find along the road for the use of the sick and worn-out men.

Between 8 and 9 a. m., when about 4 miles from Paris, we were met by a young man, who said Morgan was still in Paris with his force, posted on the Hon. Garrett Davis' farm, and prepared for battle. I immediately sent a messenger to General Smith to communicate this fact, moved the command a short distance forward, halted it, sent out some scouts, and being informed that some horsemen were seen in front, the command was quickly formed in line of battle, the officers and men acting very promptly. In a short time a messenger came from General

Smith, who stated that the general was with his force about 2 miles from Paris, on the Lexington turnpike, and that he directed that the force under my command move as quickly as possible to the Fair Grounds, on the same road, the messenger saying he had thought it proper to destroy the general's written order. The command was moved forward as rapidly as possible, but before we had gone half a mile a gentleman rode up and informed us that Morgan had been driven from Paris by General Smith's forces and was retreating toward Winchester. We still pressed on as fast as we could, arrived at Paris about 10.30 a. m., and found that the marauders had left about 8 a. m.

The force under my command was joined to General Smith's, and we remained at Paris until Sunday morning, the 20th instant, about 7 or 8 o'clock, when General Smith, taking all the cavalry and Captain Nicklin's artillery, moved toward Winchester. By his order I was placed in command of all the infantry, consisting of the forces before named, some of the Cincinnati police, and a portion of the Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, and the artillery from Lexington, and directed to move on after him toward Winchester, distant from Paris 18 miles, where we arrived about 5 p. m., having obtained all the wagons we could along the road to haul our weary soldiers, but found that Morgan had gone through the town Saturday evening.

Shortly after we arrived at Winchester General Smith directed me to detail about 150 infantry and place them in wagons, to be ready to move that night with the cavalry toward Richmond, Madison County. At my suggestion the general modified his order so far as to allow me to put in wagons all of the Eleventh Michigan (Colonel Stoughton) that were fit for duty, the company of regulars, and as many of the Eighteenth Kentucky (Colonel Landram) as we could get wagons for, leaving the remaining forces under the command of Colonel Mahan, Fifty-fifth Indiana, and before 11 o'clock that night we had upward of 500 infantry in wagons and moving toward Richmond, and though we had to ferry the Kentucky River, we arrived at Richmond, 22 miles from Winchester, about 10 a. m. Monday, the 21st instant, but found that the marauders had left the evening before about 3 o'clock.

Late Monday evening I received orders from Generals Boyle and Smith to move to Lexington, 26 miles from Richmond, with the infantry, which I did on Tuesday, 22d instant. By order from General Boyle turned over my command to Colonel Warner, commanding post, and returned here on Wednesday. At Lexington I sent home all the wagons and horses that I could find that we had taken in our march.

While it is cause of bitter mortification to us all that we were unable to overtake the marauding chief and his lawless band, we feel that we did all that we could under the circumstances.

I cannot close this report without returning my sincere thanks to Colonels Williams, Stoughton, and Mahan for their energetic co-operation during our rapid and fatiguing marches, all acting the part of prompt and efficient officers. Colonel Stoughton was with me all the time with his gallant regiment, and I feel indebted to this brave officer for his hearty and efficient aid.

The gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Landram also was prompt and attentive to his command.

Lieutenant Chadwick, of the Eleventh Michigan, who acted as assistant adjutant-general until we arrived at Paris, where he was taken ill, rendered me great service.

Col. James M. Shackelford, formerly commanding officer of the Twenty-fifth Kentucky, always brave, manly, and true, went with me as aide, and I am much indebted to him for his efficient services.

Several others acted as aides. Lieutenants Richardson, Towns, and Colonel Shackelford, and all deserve my thanks.

Captain Biddle showed himself to be a skillful, attentive officer.

While Captain Nicklin was not called on to use his artillery, it could not escape my attention that he is an officer of rare merit, skillful and prompt.

Very respectfully,

CICERO MAXWELL,

Colonel Twenty-sixth Kentucky Volunteers.

Capt. JOHN BOYLE,

Assistant Adjutant-General, U. S. Forces in Kentucky.

No. 8.

Report of J. V. Guthrie of operations July 16-21.

CINCINNATI, July 25, 1862.

In compliance with your order of the 16th the undersigned took the cars on the Central Kentucky Railroad from the depot in Covington, with about 100 men, for Cynthiana, Ky., at which place Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, was in command.

Receiving orders to move toward Paris and distribute my forces at the different stations to guard bridges, I proceeded to Paris, which place was reached at 2 o'clock in the night. There were at this post detachments of companies—35 from Captain Whittlesey's camp, under command of his lieutenant; 30 men under command of Captain Pugsley, of the Eighteenth Kentucky Regiment, and the Home Guards of Paris, numbering 67 men, infantry. There were also 60 men on horseback, under command of the Hon. Mr. Wadsworth, member of Congress from the Maysville district, making a total of forces in Paris, as reported to me, of 233 men, rank and file. During the day re-enforcements to the number of 60 men from Mount Sterling, under Captain Evans, came in. These were Home Guard cavalry. Brigadier-General Ward ordered me to take command of this post. Upon assuming the command I immediately proceeded to organize the forces for service, and appointed the Hon. Mr. Wadsworth, with the rank of major, to the command of all the Home Guard cavalry. Pursuant to orders, he took command of 40 men and proceeded toward Lexington on a scouting expedition. At 11 o'clock p. m. Major Wadsworth returned, and reported that John Morgan, with a force of from 1,000 to 1,200 men, was moving down the road to Cynthiana. I immediately telegraphed Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, at Cynthiana, of Morgan's movements and his advance on that place. I also sent a message to Captain Ayres, commanding the bridge guards between Paris and Cynthiana, to join me with his forces at Paris. I also telegraphed to General Ward at Lexington the position of affairs, and asked for re-enforcements to hold Paris. He answered that I should send to him at Lexington all the men I could spare. Satisfied that I could not weaken my force I did not send any men to Lexington. About 7 o'clock in the evening Lieutenant-Colonel Landram reported the fall of Cynthiana. Upon consultation it was deemed advisable to fall back on Lexington. We moved at 11 o'clock that night, and proceeded 14 miles on the Lexington road. About daylight we had reached Colonel Metcalfe's advance post from Lexington, where he had encamped.

Colonel Metcalfe was ordered to move forward with all his force on Paris, and started about 4 o'clock. I was again detailed to take command of all the infantry and support the batteries. Thirty-five of my men were reported as unable to travel, and by my order were sent by the surgeon to the Lexington hospital. We moved on toward Paris, and at dark encamped 5 miles from the town. During the night our pickets were driven in three different times, and, as the infantry with the artillery held the advance, I formed them all in line of battle at the road.

On the morning of the 19th we again took up our line of march, Brigadier-General Smith in command. Our advance continually drove in the rebel scouts, killing 7 and taking 8 prisoners. Arriving at the entrance to Paris, our column was halted. The center, composed of the Ohio troops and the artillery, was 1 mile from the town. We were informed that an attack was expected and the men stood by their guns one hour and a half, when we learned to our chagrin that Morgan had retreated toward Winchester.

It is but justice to the Ohio troops to inform you that they were eager and ready for the fight. Two companies of the Cincinnati police took off their coats, and under their chief, Colonel Dudley, were anxious to meet the enemy. The detachment of Captain Whittlesey's Cincinnati company deserve commendation for their gallantry, while the troops from Camp Dennison, under Captain Ayres, were prompt and efficient, and had opportunity offered would have earned for themselves a creditable reputation.

After the retreat of the enemy we encamped for twenty-four hours. On the morning of the 20th we were ordered to move, the rear guard being assigned to my command. I found it impossible for the troops sent out with me to follow on to Winchester. I therefore left them at Paris, under command of Captain Ayres, with instructions to remain until further orders from me after I had arrived at Winchester.

Receiving orders from General Smith to proceed to Lexington, I moved my command the next day (the 21st) and reached Lexington at night. I rode over with Dr. Bush to Paris that night and found that the men left in charge of Captain Ayres had gone to Cincinnati the morning previous. I returned to Lexington the same night and found Colonel McCook with your orders. After instructing the lieutenant in charge of the sick at Lexington to report to Colonel McCook the condition of the men I obtained leave to return home and arrived here this morning.

I have been thus particular in explaining to you how I became detached from my particular command, which was intrusted to me by your orders, and to do justice as near as I can to the Ohio troops under my charge.

I am, general, your obedient servant,

J. V. GUTHRIE,
Commanding.

Report of Lieut. Col. Sidney Burbank, Thirteenth U. S. Infantry, commanding at Cincinnati, Ohio.

CITY OF CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 19, 1862.

SIR: The movements in Kentucky of Morgan's forces have assumed so important an attitude that I deem it essential that you should be placed in immediate possession of the views entertained by parties best informed on the subject for the information of the War Department.

The first impression, that it was merely a raid for the purpose of capturing provisions and beating up a few recruits and then retreating, has now given way to the conviction that it is a preconcerted movement made by previous concert with the secessionists in various districts of the State for the purpose of securing and maintaining within the State a formidable force under arms to threaten constantly the position of the Union forces and hoping to regain control of the entire State.

It becomes therefore in my judgment absolutely necessary that prompt measures be adopted to place in Kentucky the necessary force to expel the invaders ere they succeed in drawing together sufficient forces to enable them to maintain their positions, to visit with punishment those who have openly aided and encouraged them, and to encourage the Union men in their struggle.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

S. BURBANK,

Lieutenant-Colonel Thirteenth Infantry, Commanding.

Brig. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

Report of Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith, C. S. Army, commanding Department of East Tennessee.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 24, 1862.

Colonel Morgan sends a dispatch, dated Georgetown, Ky., 16th instant, stating that he has taken eleven cities and towns with very heavy army stores and has a force sufficient to hold all the country outside of Lexington and Frankfort, which places are chiefly garrisoned by Home Guards. The bridges between Lexington and Cincinnati have been destroyed.

Reports of Col. John H. Morgan, Second Kentucky Cavalry (Confederate), commanding expedition.

BRIGADE HEADQUARTERS,
Tompkinsville, Ky., July 9, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I arrived with my command at the Cumberland River and passed the ford at about 2 p. m. yesterday, 8th instant. My forces consisted of Colonel Hunt's Georgia regiment cavalry, my own regiment, and a squadron of Texas Rangers; we were joined at the river by two companies under Captains Hamilton and McMillin. I received information that the enemy had passed the Cumberland River at Salina the day of my arrival with about 180 men, but did not deem it right to attack that force, as I was aware that a considerable body of cavalry, about 380 or 400 strong, were stationed at this town, and I thought by a rapid night march I might succeed in surprising them. I left the river at 10 p. m. on the 8th instant, and at 5 a. m. this day I surprised the enemy, and having surrounded them, threw four shells into their camp, and then carried it by a dashing charge. The enemy fled, leaving about 22 dead and 30 to 40 wounded in our hands. We have 30 prisoners and my Texas squadron are still in pursuit of the fugitives. Among the prisoners is Major Jordan, their commander, and two lieutenants. The tents, stores, and camp equipage I have destroyed, but a valuable baggage train, consisting of some 20 wagons and 50 mules, is in my possession; also some 40 cavalry horses, and supplies of sugar, coffee, &c. I did not lose a single man in killed, but have to regret that Colonel Hunt, while leading a brilliant charge, received a severe wound in the leg, which prevents his going on with the command. I also had three members of the Texas squadron wounded, but not seriously.

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. E. KIRBY SMITH,
Commanding, Knoxville, Tenn.

HEADQUARTERS MORGAN'S COMMAND,
Knoxville, Tenn., July 30, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that upon the day of the engagements at Tompkinsville, a full report of which I have already sent you, I moved my command (consisting of my own regiment, the Georgia regiment of Partisan Rangers, commanded by Col. A. A. Hunt, and Major Gano's Texas squadron, to which were attached two companies of Tennessee cavalry) in the direction of Glasgow, which place I reached at 12 o'clock that night.

There were but few troops in the town, who fled at our approach. The commissary stores, clothing, &c., together with a large supply of medical stores found in Glasgow, were burned, and the guns were distributed among my command, about 200 of which were unarmed when I left Knoxville. From Glasgow I proceeded along the main Lexington road to Barren River, halting for a short time at a point near Cave City, my object being to induce the belief that I intended destroying the railroad bridge between Bowling Green and Woodsonville. I caused wires connecting with the portable battery that I carried with me to be attached to the telegraph line near Horse Cave and intercepted a number of dispatches.

At Barren River I detached three companies, under Capt. Jack Allen, to move forward rapidly and destroy the Salt River Bridge, that the troops along the line of railroad might be prevented from returning to Louisville.

On the following morning I moved on toward Lebanon, distant 35 miles from Barren River. At 11 o'clock at night I reached the bridge over Rolling Fork, 6 miles from Lebanon. The enemy had received information of my approach from their spies and my advance guard was fired upon at the bridge. After a short fight the force at the bridge was dispersed and the planks which had been torn up having been replaced the command moved forward to Lebanon. About 2 miles from the town a skirmish commenced between two companies I caused to dismount and deploy and a force of the enemy posted upon the road, which was soon ended by its dispersion and capture. Lieut. Col. A. Y. Johnson, commanding the troops in the town, surrendered and I entered the place. The prisoners taken, in number about 65, were paroled. I took immediate possession of the telegraph and intercepted a dispatch to Colonel Johnson, informing him that Colonel Owen, with the Sixtieth Indiana Regiment, had been ordered to his assistance, so I at once dispatched a company of Texas Rangers, under Major Gano, to destroy the railroad bridge on the Lebanon Branch, which he successfully accomplished in time to prevent the arrival of the troops. I burned two long buildings full of commissary stores, consisting of upward of 500 sacks of coffee and a large amount of all other supplies in bulk, marked for the army at Cumberland Gap. I also destroyed a very large amount of clothing, boots, &c. I burned the hospital buildings, which appeared to have been recently erected and fitted up, together with about 35 wagons and 53 new ambulances. I found in the place a large store of medicines, 5,000 stand of arms, with accouterments, about 2,000 sabers, and an immense quantity of ammunition, shell, &c. I distributed the best arms among my command and loaded one wagon with them to be given to recruits that I expected to join me; I also loaded a wagon with ammunition; the remainder of the arms, ammunition, and the hospital and medical stores I destroyed.

While in Lebanon I ascertained from telegraph dispatches that I intercepted that the force which had been started from Lebanon Junction to re-enforce Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson had met and driven back the force under Capt. Jack Allen, killing one of the men, and preventing him from accomplishing the purpose for which he had been detached.

I proceeded from Lebanon on the following day through Springfield to Mackville, at which point I was attacked by Home Guards. Two of my men were taken prisoners and one severely wounded. I remained at Mackville that night to recover the prisoners, which I did the next morning. I then left for Harrodsburg, capturing a Federal captain and lieutenant on the road; reached Harrodsburg at 12.30 o'clock. Found that the Home Guards of all that portion of country had fled to Lexington; a force was also stationed on the bridge where the Lexington road crossed the Kentucky River.

My reception at this place was very encouraging. The whole population appeared to turn out and vie with each other as to who should show us most attention. I left Harrodsburg at 6 o'clock the same evening and moved to Lawrenceburg, 20 miles distant, threatening Frankfort, in order to draw off the troops from Georgetown. Remained there until the return of my courier from Frankfort, who brought the information that there was a force in Frankfort of 2,000 or 3,000 men, consisting of Home Guards collected from the adjacent counties and a few regular troops. From Lawrenceburg I proceeded to Shryock Ferry, on the Kentucky River, raised the boat which had been sunken, and crossed that evening, reaching Versailles at 7 o'clock. I found this place abandoned by its defenders, who had fled to Lexington; remained there that night, and on the next morning marched toward Georgetown.

While at Versailles I took about 300 Government horses and mules. I passed through Midway on the way to Georgetown, and was informed just before reaching the place that a train from Frankfort was nearly due with two regiments of Federals. I tore up the track and posted the howitzers to command it and formed my command along the line of the road, but the train was warned of our presence and returned to Frankfort. Having taken possession of the telegraph office, I intercepted a dispatch asking if the road was clear and if it would be safe to start the train from Lexington. I replied to send the train and made preparations to receive it, but it was also turned back and escaped. I reached Georgetown, 12 miles from Lexington, that evening. Just before entering the town I was informed that a small force of Home Guards had mustered to oppose us. I sent them word to surrender their arms and they should not be molested, but they fled.

The people of Georgetown also welcomed us with gladness and provided my troops with everything that they needed. I remained at Georgetown two days, during which time I sent out a company under Captain McMillin to destroy the track between Midway and Lexington and Midway and Frankfort and to blow up the stone bridge on that road, which he successfully accomplished. Hearing that a company of Home Guards were encamped at Stamping Grounds, 13 miles distant, I dispatched a company under Captain Hamilton to break up their encampment, burn the tents and stores, and destroy the guns. This was also accomplished, Captain Hamilton taking 15 prisoners and all their guns and destroying a large amount of medical and commissary stores. I also while at Georgetown sent Captain Castleman with his company to destroy the railroad bridges between Paris and Lexington and report to me at Winchester. This was done.

Determining to move on Paris with a view of returning, and hearing that the place was being rapidly re-enforced from Cincinnati, I deemed it of great importance to cut off the communication from that place while I drew off the troops that were already there by a feint on Lexington. I therefore dispatched a portion of two companies toward Lexington, with instructions to drive the pickets to the very entrance of the city, while I moved the command toward Cynthiana. When I arrived within 3 miles of this place I learned that it was defended by a considerable force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. I dispatched the Texas Squadron, under Major Gano, to enter the town on the right, and the Georgia regiment to cross the river and get in the rear, while I moved my own regiment, with the artillery, under the command of Lieut. J. E. Harris, down the Georgetown pike. A severe engagement took place, which lasted about an hour and a half before the enemy were driven into the town and compelled to surrender. I took 420 prisoners, including about 70 Home Guards.

I regret to have to mention the loss of 8 of my men in killed and 29 wounded. The enemy's loss was 194 in killed and wounded, according to their own account. Their excess in killed and wounded is remarkable, as they fought us from behind stone fences and fired at us from buildings as we charged through the town. We captured a very fine 2-pounder brass piece of artillery, together with a large number of small-arms and about 300 Government horses. I found a very large supply of commissary and medical stores, tents, guns, and ammunition at this place, which I destroyed. The paroled prisoners were sent under an escort to Falmouth, where they took the train for Cincinnati.

I proceeded the next morning toward Paris, and was met on the road by the bearer of a flag of truce, offering the unconditional surrender of the place. I reached Paris at 4 o'clock. Remained there that night, and started toward Winchester the next morning. As my command was filing out of Paris on the Winchester pike I discovered a large force of Federals coming toward the town from the direction of Lexington. They immediately countermarched, supposing no doubt that my intention was to get in their rear. This enabled me to bring off my entire command without molestation, with the exception of two of my pickets, who probably were surprised; reached Winchester that day at 12 o'clock; remained until 4 o'clock, when I proceeded toward Richmond. At Winchester I found a number of arms, which were destroyed.

I arrived at Richmond at 12 o'clock that night and remained until the next afternoon, when I proceeded to Crab Orchard. I had determined to make a stand at Richmond and await re-enforcements, as the whole people appeared ready to rise and join me, but I received information that large bodies of cavalry, under General Clay Smith and Colonels Wolford, Metcalfe, Munday, and Wynkoop, were endeavoring to surround me at this place, so I moved on to Crab Orchard. There I attached my portable battery to the telegraph leading from Stanford to Louisville, and learned the exact position of the enemy's forces and directed my movements accordingly.

Leaving Crab Orchard at 11 o'clock, I arrived at Somerset, distant 28 miles, at sundown. I took possession of the telegraph and countermanded all the previous orders that had been given by General Boyle to pursue me, and remained here in perfect security all night. I found a very large supply of commissary stores, clothing, blankets, shoes, hats, &c., at this place, which were destroyed. I also found the arms that had been taken from General Zollicoffer, together with large quantities of shell and ammunition, all of which were destroyed. I also burned at this place and Crab Orchard about 120 Government wagons. From Somerset I proceeded to Monticello, and from thence to a point between Livingston and Sparta, where my command is now encamped.

I left Knoxville on the 4th day of this month with about 900 men, and returned to Livingston on 28th instant with nearly 1,200, having been absent just twenty-four days, during which time I traveled over 1,000 miles, captured seventeen towns, destroyed all the Government supplies and arms in them, dispersed about 1,500 Home Guards, and paroled nearly 1,200 regular troops. I lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, of the number that I carried into Kentucky about 90.

I take great pleasure in testifying to the gallant bravery and efficiency of my whole command. There were individual instances of daring so conspicuous that I must beg the privilege of referring to them. Private Moore, of Louisiana, a member of Company A, of my regiment, particularly distinguished himself by leading a charge which had an important effect in winning the battle. The reports of the regimental commanders, which are inclosed, are respectfully referred to for further instances of individual bravery and efficiency. I feel indebted to all my aides for the promptness with which my orders were executed, and particularly to Col. St. Leger Grenfell for the assistance which his experience afforded me.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Acting Brigadier-General, C. S. Army.

No. 12.

Report of Maj. R. M. Gano, C. S. Army, commanding Cavalry Battalion.

HONORED SIR: I have the pleasure of reporting to you the action of the battalion under my command in the recent expedition to Kentucky. This report is intended to embrace only the action of the battalion while separated from the other troops under your command. The battalion was composed of four companies—the two Texas companies under my command, known as the Texas Squadron, Company A (commanded by Lieutenant Speer), and Company B (commanded by Captain Huffman), and two Tennessee companies, viz: Company C (commanded by Captain McMillin) and Company D (by Captain Hamilton). Having left Knoxville on the morning of July 4, we reached Walden's Ridge on the evening of the 5th, where the bushwhackers fired upon our foraging party, mortally wounding Mr. J. N. O'Brien, of Company A, of the Texas Squadron. He lived twenty-four hours, suffered much, was a model soldier, a fond husband, affectionate father, and a worthy man in all the relations of life. Cut down in the prime of life, he died in a noble cause—the defense of his country from the invader.

We reached Tompkinsville on the morning of the 9th about sunrise. I was then ordered to the right of the town, on the Old Mill road, to attack from that point and cut off all retreat from that quarter. I proceeded as directed and drove in the pickets, giving the alarm in the enemy's camp. When we came in sight of the enemy they were forming on horseback, apparently with the intention of attacking us, not dreaming of the reception prepared before breakfast for them. I arranged my command to receive them, but only had the opportunity of firing a few long-range guns at them, as the well-aimed shell from your howitzers drove them back from their position, and I then thought from their movements that they would retreat on the Burkesville road, and I immediately ordered Captain Huffman through the woods upon our right with two companies to intercept them there, but the rapid and well-aimed fire from the Georgians, under Colonel Hunt, from one point and of your regiment from another, drove the enemy into such a hasty retreat that they passed out through a wood-land trail some half mile or more, and then, falling into the Burkesville road, put their horses to their utmost speed. The Texans, so famous for horsemanship, started in pursuit, and a portion of the squadron on faster horses soon came up with some 75 of the enemy, under Major Jordan and two lieutenants, trying to cover their hasty retreat. They did not surrender to our demand, but fired back at us, wounding Thomas Huffhines. Then commenced a running fight, 75 Yankees against about a dozen Texans, and many an invader bit the dust; among the number 1 lieutenant, 1 sergeant, and 2 corporals. We captured Major Jordan, 1 lieutenant, 1 sergeant, and 4 privates.

Our casualties were in this running fight 2 wounded, viz: T. Huffhines, a flesh wound in the thigh, and J. Loose, a saber cut on the head, severing the outer table of the skull; neither dangerous. The enemy lost 9 killed, 7 captured. Number of wounded unknown.

At Bear Wallow, on the 9th, Captain Huffman's company was detailed from my command upon an expedition under Capt. Jack Allen. For their movements I refer you to his report.*

After the bushwacking from New Market to Lebanon on the night of the 10th and after the surrender of Colonel Johnson and his forces, he having stated that the Home Guards would fire upon us from the houses if we entered the town, you will recollect how nobly the three companies of my battalion, at the still hour of the night, marched through to receive their fire, Lieutenant Speer in front, Captain McMillin next, and Captain Hamilton third; but the fire came not, the women waved their handkerchiefs, and the place was ours, as witnessed by the shout that rent the air; and then, without rest, having been in the saddle twenty-four hours, how cheerfully we posted off 5 miles in the country, in compliance with the order to burn the bridge, which we did, capturing the guard. Captain Huffman and his company rejoined us at Mackville on the night of the 11th, and next morning I was ordered forward to take possession of Harrodsburg.

The Home Guards had assembled at this place to drive us back, but before we came in sight they fled precipitately to the Kentucky Cliffs to re-enforce Joshua Bell, who was collecting all the Home Guards at the bridge on the Danville and Lexington road, and the aforesaid militia general (Bell) was exhorting his assemblage to deeds of heroism and valor when a party of 65 Home Guards came from Lancaster to re-enforce them. They came shouting and waving their hats. Bell's pickets fled, and reported Morgan coming with his forces at full gallop. Their heroic leader then announced that they could not possibly make a stand there and every man must take care of himself, and they all fled in the direction of Lexington, some on horseback, some on foot. The author of this, Mike Chrisman, made several miles on foot and fainted by the wayside. "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." The excitement and dread at Harrodsburg on the part of the Unionists was intense. Strange that any person in Kentucky could be deluded by the lies of George D. Prentice to believe that the Southern people, noted for their chivalry, liberality, and sympathy, could be guilty of the baseness ascribed to us by those base hirelings of the North. But now have they been shown better by actions which speak louder than words. A few words, guaranteeing respect to person and property, quieted their fears, and all united in preparing us a repast. But the ladies, God bless them, true and loyal to their native South, are bright examples of patriotism and fidelity to our country, our institutions, and the liberties vouchsafed to us by the struggles of our forefathers.

From Harrodsburg, per order, I proceeded toward Paris, intending to avoid the pickets at Lexington (having only 92 men with me), but accidentally coming upon them I feigned an attack, and crossing several roads and frightening in the pickets, they reported a large rebel force coming in from different roads. The greatest excitement prevailed, and with cannon and huge proclamations they prepared for defense, compelling every man of whatever sentiment to take up arms. I did not attack the city with my small force, but leaving Lexington on my right, and passing in by Payne's Depot, on the Frankfort road, I halted my company at the residence of John Payne, near Georgetown, for dinner. Mrs. Payne, not knowing any better, sent word to her husband in town that a body of Union cavalry were there. He immediately called upon the provost-marshal to accompany him home. He could not go, but sends his deputy, Alexander Long. Soon another messenger arrived in the person of Oliver Gaines, with an order to me to take my forces over to the Frankfort road and cut off Morgan's forces, for the rebels were certainly coming that way. I answered all right, and administered the oath of secrecy and non-interference to the two messengers, with three others that had assembled there by accident. I then passed up the Iron Works road, followed, as I afterward learned, at long distance by a party of Home Guards, mounted upon such horses as they had been able to pick up on the streets of Georgetown—some riding with bridles and some with halters; but when they came in sight of the rear of our little column they concluded discretion was the better part of valor and turned off on another road.

We passed through the farm of Victor Flournoy, stopping to refresh ourselves at the spring of the Rev. R. J. Breckinridge, where the ladies came out, and one, whose bright eyes bespoke a southern heart, was very curious to know what party we belonged to. This accidental call was construed into an attempt to arrest the doctor, and his son, Capt. Will. Breckinridge, whom we had not seen, was accused of being accessory. It is not surprising they should judge thus, meting by their own measure. The enemy may feel the effect of Captain Will's steel upon the field of battle, but they will never find a man of his noble Southern soul trying to secure his father's arrest. Taking tea at my father's, I proceeded on to Kiser's Station, on the Paris and Covington road, and fired the bridge. The burning bridge fired an old shed beneath, which I afterward learned was Mr. Kiser's distillery. I regretted the loss of private property, but, as it did happen, better be a distillery than anything else. I here lost 7 pickets through their mistaking the road, and we hunted them until day, and consequently did not destroy the Townsend Bridge, as I had contemplated. We then proceeded toward Georgetown, and while encamped in a wood-land near that place R. P. Tannehill, of Company A, Texas Squadron, was by the accidental discharge of a gun launched into eternity. Robert was a brave soldier boy, always ready, devoted to the Southern cause, and the main prop of his widowed mother; but we laid our bold soldier boy to rest more than 1,000 miles from his fond mother, who little dreams of the removal of her boy.

On this the evening of the 18th we rejoined you in Georgetown, and by order arrested Mr. Samuel Thompson, the provost marshal of that place.

On the 17th instant, near Cynthiana, in accordance with your order, I proceeded with my command across to the Millersburg pike, arresting the guard at the bridge, driving in the picket, and commencing the fight on that side of town. We drove the enemy back from that portion of the town. They soon returned in pretty large force, waving their hands. I ordered to cease firing, thinking they wished to surrender, but they had mistaken us for Home Guards, and commenced cursing us for firing on our own men. I ordered them to lay down their arms, when they fired and ran. We opened a brisk fire and they dropped their guns for two squares down the street. We killed some 10 or 12, wounding many, and capturing as many more in town, and when they retreated from the town we pursued on horseback, capturing many. The loss from my battalion was 1 killed (in Captain Hamilton's company) and 3 badly wounded, viz, Lieut. R. Speer, of Company A, of the Texas Squadron; Clark Aldridge, of Captain Huffman's company, and 1 from Captain McMillan's company; there were two others slightly wounded. Captain Huffman is of a brave stock and is an honor to the name. On all other occasions the forces were together and your report will embrace the whole.

My command conducted themselves with the bravery that has always characterized them, securing lasting honors to themselves, while rendering such efficient service to their country; and to their honor be it said they never failed to show kindness to the captured and wounded of the enemy and respect to the rights of others. I think the kindness of your entire command to the enemy when in their power will be a good example to those of our enemies who have, throughout the State of Kentucky, busied themselves with tyrannizing over and oppressing those who honestly differ with them in political opinion. Let all those who wish to serve their country join the army and show to the world they are not cowards, and not employ their time in trying in a cowardly manner to secure the arrest of those neighbors who differ with them in political sentiment.

We are now, on the 29th instant, again at Knoxville, Tenn., having returned from one of the most daring and adventurous expeditions on record with a very small loss in numbers, but having struck a blow from which the enemy will not soon recover.

Yours,

R. M. GANO,

Major, Comdg. Batt. Cav. in Morgan's Brigade, C. S. Army.

No. 13.

Report of George A. Elsworth, Telegraph Operator, Morgan's command.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 30, 1862.

SIR: On July 10 General Morgan, with a body guard of 15 men and myself, arrived at a point half a mile below Horse Cave, on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, where I took down the telegraph line and connected my pocket instrument for the purpose of taking off all dispatches as they passed through. Owing to a heavy storm prevailing south the atmospheric electricity prevented me from communicating with Bowling Green or Nashville. The first I heard was Louisville calling Bowling Green. I immediately put on my ground wire south, and noticing particularly at the same time what change it would make in the circuit. It did make it stronger, but owing to the storm mentioned above affecting telegraphs more or less, Louisville did not suspicion anything wrong, and I answered for Bowling Green, when I received the following message:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 10, 1862.

S. D. BRUCE, Commanding, Bowling Green:

You and Colonel Stoughton move together. I fear the force of Colonel Stoughton too small to venture to Glasgow. The whole force should move together, as the enemy are mounted. We cannot venture to leave the road too far, as they may pass around and ruin it.

J. T. BOYLE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

I returned the usual signal, after receiving the message, of O. K.

Louisville immediately called Nashville, and I answered for Nashville. Receiving business for two hours. This business was mostly of a private nature and I took no copies. It could be plainly seen by the tenor of the messages that Morgan was in the country, and all orders to send money and valuables by railroad were countermanded (as they supposed); but little did the operator at Louisville think that all of his work would have to be repeated the next day. Louisville also sent the news of the day, and thus we were furnished with New York and Washington dates of that day. During the whole of the time it was raining heavy; my situation was anything but an agreeable one, sitting in the mud, with my feet in the water up to my knees.

At 11 p. m. the general, being satisfied that I had drained Louisville of all the news, concluded to close for the night, and he verbally gave me the following message to send, dating and signing it as below:

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 10, 1862.

HENRY DENT, Provost-Marshal, Louisville, Ky.:

General Forrest, commanding brigade, attacked Murfreesborough, routing our forces, and is now moving on Nashville. Morgan is reported to be between Scottsville and Gallatin, and will act in concert with Forrest, it is believed. Inform general commanding.

STANLEY MATTHEWS,
Provost-Marshal.

I am not aware that General Morgan claims to be a prophet or a son of a prophet, but Forrest did attack Murfreesborough and rout the enemy.

On arriving at Lebanon, July 12, I accompanied the advance guard into town and took charge of the telegraph office immediately. This was, as you know, at 3.30 a. m. I adjusted the instrument and examined the circuit. No other operator on the line appeared to be on hand this early. I then examined all the dispatches of the day previous; among them I found the following:

LEBANON, KY., July 11, 1862.

General BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

I have positive information that there is 400 marauders in 20 miles of this place, on the old Lexington road, approaching Lebanon. Send re-enforcements immediately.

A. Y. JOHNSON,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding.

At 7.30 a. m. an operator, signing Z, commenced calling B, which I had ascertained by the books in the office was the signal for Lebanon office. I answered the call, when the following conversation between Z and myself ensued:

To B: What news? Any more skirmishing after your last message?—Z.

To Z: No; we drove what little cavalry there was away.—B.

To B: Has the train arrived yet?—Z.

To Z: No. About how many troops on train?—B.

To B: About 500.—Z.

My curiosity being excited as to what station Z was, and to ascertain without creating any suspicion, I adopted the following plan:

To Z: A gentleman here in the office bets me the cigars you cannot spell the name of your station correctly.—B.

To B: Take the bet. L-e-b-a-n-o-n Junction. Is this not right? How did he think I would spell it?—Z.

To Z: He gives it up. He thought you would put two b's in Lebanon.—B.

To B: Ha! ha! He is a green one.—Z.

To Z: Yes; that's so.—B.

To Z: What time did train with soldiers pass, Z?—B.

To B: At 8.30 last night.—Z.

To Z: Very singular where the train is.—B.

To B: Yes, it is. Let me know when it arrives.—Z.

At 8.20 Z called me up and says:

To B: The train has returned. They had a fight with the rebels at New Hope. The commanding officer awaits orders here.—Z.

To Z: Give us the particulars of the fight. Colonel Johnson is anxious to know all about it.—B.

To B: I will soon as possible.—Z.

To B: Here is Moore's message to General Boyle :

"LEBANON JUNCTION, KY., July 12, 1862.

"General BOYLE, Louisville, Ky. :

"At 11 o'clock last night, at New Hope Station, 5 miles beyond New Haven, part of my command encountered a force of rebel cavalry posted on the county road one half a mile south of the railroad. After a brisk fire of musketry for twenty minutes the enemy was routed and fled. Skirmishers were sent out in different directions, but were unable to find the enemy.

"At 3 o'clock this morning, apprehending that an effort might be made to destroy the bridges in our rear, we moved down to New Haven and remained until after daylight, when the train went back to the scene of the skirmish. A Mr. Forman, of Owen County, was found mortally wounded. He reported the rebel force at 450, under command of Capt. Jack Allen, and that they had fallen back toward Greensburg. One horse was killed and three captured. The books of the company were found. In the field blood was found at different places, showing that the enemy was severely punished. No casualties on our side. Here with train waiting orders.

"O. F. MOORE,
"Commanding."

Lebanon Junction being the repeating station for Louisville business, he forwarded the following telegrams just from Louisville 9 a. m.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 12, 1862.

Colonel JOHNSON, Lebanon, Ky. :

Leave good guard and join Colonel Owen. Pursue the enemy and drive him out. Be cautious and vigorous. Make no delay.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 12, 1862.

Colonel OWEN, Lebanon, Ky. :

You will move after the enemy and pursue him.

J. T. BOYLE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

You will see by the above message that Colonel Owen must have been en route for Lebanon.

Up to the time of our leaving Lebanon, which was about noon, Colonel Moore, in command of those 500 troops at Lebanon Junction, had not received his orders or I could furnish you with them. This I greatly regretted, but General Morgan, having no fears of "Lincoln's web-foot soldiery," told me I could close my office, and to allay all suspicion at not being able to communicate with Lebanon during the afternoon I told the operator at Lebanon Junction as follows :

To Z: I have been up all night and am very sleepy. If you have no objections I will take a nap until 2 or 3 o'clock.—B.

To B: All right; don't oversleep yourself.—Z.

Wonder if I did!

Arrived at Midway, on the Lexington and Louisville Railroad, about 10 a. m. At this place I surprised the operator, who was quietly sitting on the platform of the depot enjoying himself hugely. Little did he suspicion that Morgan was in his vicinity. I asked him to call Lexington and to ask Lexington the time of day. He did so. I demanded this for the purpose of getting his style of handling the key, which corroborated my first impression, from the fact that I noticed paper in the instrument; to use a telegraphic phrase, he was a "plug operator." I adopted his style of writing and commenced operations.

In this office I found a signal-book, which, by the way, came very useful. It contained the calls for all the offices. Dispatch after dispatch was going to and fro from Lexington, Georgetown, Paris, and Frankfort; all contained something in reference to Morgan. I tested the line and found by applying my ground wire it made no difference with the circuit, and as Lexington was headquarters I cut Frankfort off.

I omitted to state that on commencing operations at this place I discovered that there were two wires on this railroad. One was what we term a through wire, running direct from Lexington to Frankfort and not entering any of the way offices. I found that all military business was sent over that wire, and as it did not enter Midway office I ordered it cut, thus forcing Lexington on the wire that did run into this office. Midway was called and I answered, when I received the following:

LEXINGTON, KY., July 15, 1862.

J. W. WOOLUMS, Operator, Midway, Ky.:

Will there be any danger in coming to Midway? Is everything right?

TAYLOR,
Conductor.

I inquired of my prisoner if he knew a man by name of Taylor. He said Taylor was conductor. I immediately gave Taylor the following reply:

MIDWAY, KY., July 15, 1862.

TAYLOR, Lexington, Ky.:

All right. Come on. No signs of any rebels here.

WOOLUMS.

The operator in Cincinnati then called Frankfort. I answered and received about a dozen of unimportant dispatches. He had no sooner finished when Lexington called Frankfort and again I answered, receiving the following message:

LEXINGTON, KY., July 15, 1862.

General FINNELL, Frankfort, Ky.:

I wish you to move the forces at Frankfort on the line of the Lexington Railroad immediately, and have the cars follow and take them up as soon as possible. Further orders will await them at Midway. I will in three or four hours move forward on the Georgetown road. Will have most of my men mounted. Morgan left Versailles this morning at 8 o'clock with 800 men on the Midway road, moving in the direction of Georgetown.

WARD.

This being our position and intention exactly, it was thought proper to throw General Ward on some other track. So in the course of half an hour I manufactured the following dispatch, which was approved by General Morgan, and I sent it:

MIDWAY, KY., July 15, 1862.

Brigadier-General WARD, Lexington, Ky.:

Morgan, with upward of 1,000 men, came within a mile of here and took the Old Frankfort road, bound, as we suppose, for Frankfort. This is reliable.

WOOLUMS,
Operator.

In about ten minutes Lexington again called Frankfort, and as I was doing the work of two or three offices, I answered the call and received the following:

LEXINGTON, KY., July 15, 1862.

General FINNELL, Frankfort, Ky. :

Morgan, with more than 1,000 men, came within a mile of here and took the Old Frankfort road. This dispatch received from Midway and is reliable. The regiment from Frankfort had better be recalled.

WARD.

I receipted for this message, and again manufactured a message to confirm the information General Ward had received from Midway, and not knowing the tariff from Frankfort to Lexington I could not send a formal message. I waited until the circuit was occupied and then broke in, appearing greatly excited, and told those using the wire I must have the circuit, and commenced calling Lexington. He answered with as much gusto as I called. I telegraphed as follows to Lexington :

Tell General Ward our pickets just driven in. Great excitement. Pickets say force of enemy must be 2,000.

FRANKFORT.

It was now 2 p. m. and General Morgan wished to be off for Georgetown. I run a secret ground connection and opened the circuit on the Lexington end. This was done to leave the impression that the Frankfort operator was skedaddling or that Morgan's men had destroyed the telegraph.

We arrived at Georgetown at sundown. I went to the telegraph office, found it locked; inquired for the operator. He was pointed out to me. I hailed him and demanded admission into his office. He very courteously showed me into his office. I discovered the instruments had been moved. I asked where they were. He replied that he had sent them to Lexington. I asked him what time he had Lexington last. He said 9 o'clock, and since that time the line had been down. I remarked that it must be an extraordinary line to be in working condition when it was down, as I heard him sending messages to Lexington when I was at Midway at 1 o'clock. This was a stunner; he had nothing to say. I immediately tested the line by applying the ends of the wires to my tongue and found the line O. K. I said nothing to him, but called for a guard of two men to take care of Mr. Smith until I got ready to leave town.

I did not interrupt the line until after tea, when I put in my own instrument, and after listening for an hour or two at the Yankees talking I opened the conversation as follows, signing myself "Federal Operator," as I had done before successfully at other places :

To LEXINGTON: Keep mum. I am in the office reading by the sound of my magnet in the dark. I crawled in when no one seen me. Morgan's men are here, encamped on Dr. Gano's place.

GEORGETOWN.

To GEORGETOWN: Keep cool; don't be discovered. About how many rebels are there?

LEXINGTON.

To LEXINGTON: I don't know. I did not notice, as Morgan's operator was asking me about my instruments. I told him I sent them to Lexington. He said, "Damn the luck," and went out.

GEORGETOWN.

To GEORGETOWN: Be on hand and keep us posted.

LEXINGTON.

To LEXINGTON: I will do so. Tell General Ward I will stay up all night if he wishes.

GEORGETOWN.

To GEORGETOWN: Mr. Fulton wishes to know if the rebels are there.

CINCINNATI.

To CINCINNATI: Yes; Morgan's men are here.

GEORGETOWN.

To GEORGETOWN: How can you be in office and not be arrested?

CINCINNATI.

To CINCINNATI: Oh, I am in the dark and reading by sound of the magnet.

GEORGETOWN.

This settled Cincinnati. Question after question was asked me about the rebels and I answered to suit myself. Things had been going on this way about two hours, when Lexington asked me where my assistant was. I replied, "Don't know." He then asked me, "Have you seen him to-day?" I replied, "No." Well, from this time out no telegraphing could I do in the beautiful city of Georgetown.

Wishing to keep myself busy and make myself useful, I concluded to call on Mr. Smith, the operator, who was under guard in my room. I did so. I informed Mr. Smith that I would furnish him with a mule in the morning and I should be pleased to have him accompany me to Dixie, as I understood he was in the employ of the United States Government. This was anything but agreeable to the said Smith. It seemed to me I had hit the young man in the right place, and I remarked that had he not sent his instruments to Lexington I would have taken them in preference to his person. His face brightened and an idea struck him very forcibly that he would make a proposition. He did so, and it was to furnish me the instruments if I would release him. This I agreed to, as telegraph instruments are of much more value to the Southern Confederacy than Yankee telegraphers. I accompanied Mr. Smith to the servants' room, and there under a bed in a chest were the instruments. After Mr. Smith's giving me his word of honor not to leave town for twenty-four hours he was at liberty to visit his wife and young Smiths.

On arriving at Cynthiana I found that the operator had skedaddled. I tested the wires, and found no fluid from either Cincinnati or Lexington, nor were the wires in working condition when I left the next day.

At Paris the operator had made a clean sweep. He left the night before, taking all his instruments.

At Crab Orchard there was no office, and I put in my pocket magnet. This was at 11 a. m., and the first message I heard was the following:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 21, 1862.

Colonel WOLFORD, Danville, Ky.:

Pursue Morgan; he is at Crab Orchard, going to Somerset.

BOYLE.

No sooner had the Danville operator receipted for this than the operator at Lebanon suggested the following:

To LEBANON JUNCTION: Would it not be well for Danville and offices below here to put on their ground wires when they send or receive important messages, as George Elsworth, the rebel operator, may be on the line between here and Cumberland Gap?

LEBANON.

The operator at the Junction agreed with him and said it would be a good idea, but it was not carried into effect.

Arrived at Somerset that evening. I took charge of the office. I ascertained from citizens that the office had been closed for three weeks up to the very hour our advance guard arrived in town and then it was opened by the operator from London, who came to work the instrument for the purpose of catching Morgan, but unfortunately for Uncle Sam the operator had no time to either send or receive a message, but I am glad to say he had it in fine working condition for me. I had been in the office some time when Stanford called Somerset and said:

I have just returned from Crab Orchard, where I have been to fix the line. The rebels tore it down. I left there at 8 o'clock. The Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry had not then arrived. What time did you get in from London?

STANFORD.

To STANFORD: Just arrived and got my office working finely.

SOMERSET.

To SOMERSET: Any signs of Morgan yet? He left Crab Orchard at 11.30 a. m. to-day.

STANFORD.

To STANFORD: No; no signs of him as yet.

SOMERSET.

To SOMERSET: For fear they may take you by surprise I would suggest we have a private signal. What say you?

STANFORD.

To STANFORD: Good; before signing we will make the figure 7.

SOMERSET.

This was mutually agreed upon. I asked when would Wolford be at Somerset, and he said Wolford had telegraphed Boyle that his force was green and insufficient to attack Morgan.

Seeing there was no use of my losing a night's rest I told Stanford I would retire, and that I had made arrangements with the pickets to wake me up in case Morgan came in. The operator at Lebanon Junction urged me to sit up, but I declined on the ground of being unwell. This did not satisfy him, but after arguing with him some time I retired.

JULY 22.

Opened office at 7 o'clock. Informed Stanford operator Morgan not yet arrived; made inquiries about different things, and after everything in town belonging to the United States Government was destroyed the general gave me the following messages to send:

SOMERSET, Ky., July 22, 1862.

GEORGE D. PRENTICE, Louisville, Ky.:

Good morning, George D.! I am quietly watching the complete destruction of all of Uncle Sam's property in this little burg. I regret exceedingly that this is the last that comes under my supervision on this route. I expect in a short time to pay you a visit and wish to know if you will be at home. All well in Dixie.

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Commanding Brigade.

SOMERSET, KY., July 22, 1862.

General J. T. BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

Good morning, Jerry! This telegraph is a great institution. You should destroy it, as it keeps me too well posted. My friend Elsworth has all of your dispatches since July 10 on file. Do you wish copies?

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Commanding Brigade.

SOMERSET, Ky., July 22, 1862.

HON. GEORGE DUNLAP, Washington, D. C. :

Just completed my tour through Kentucky. Captured sixteen cities, destroyed millions of dollars' worth of United States property. Passed through your county, but regret not seeing you. We paroled 1,500 Federal prisoners.

Your old friend,

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Commanding Brigade.

The following is an order I issued to all operators while at Georgetown :

GENERAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. TELEGRAPH, DEPARTMENT OF KENTUCKY, C. S. A.,
No. 1. } Georgetown, Ky., July 16, 1862.

When an operator is positively informed that the enemy is marching on his station he will immediately proceed to destroy the telegraph instruments and all material in his charge. Such instances of carelessness as exhibited on the part of the operators at Lebanon, Midway, and Georgetown will be severely dealt with.

By order of

G. A. ELSWORTH,
General Military Superintendent C. S. Telegraph Department.

The above report contains but a few of the dispatches I received and sent during General Morgan's late expedition through Kentucky. Those of the greatest interest and importance are respectfully submitted.

I remain, your obedient servant,

GEO. A. ELSWORTH,
Morgan's Telegrapher.

Capt. R. A. ALSTON, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 14.

Report of Lieut. Col. F. M. Nix, First Georgia Partisan Rangers, of the capture of Cynthiana.

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP SMITH,
Near Knoxville, Tenn., July 30, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the action of the First Regiment Georgia Partisan Rangers in the battle of Cynthiana on Thursday, 17th instant:

On Thursday, the 17th instant, when the brigade had arrived within a few miles of Cynthiana, I was ordered by General Morgan to detach my regiment and attack the town on the west side at the report of the cannon. Having made a circuit of 5 or more miles through plantations and over many obstructions not anticipated, with all possible dispatch I arrived in the suburbs, and formed a line a few minutes after the signal of attack was heard, when I observed a body of the enemy's cavalry advancing toward my line, which were promptly repulsed by a volley from my command. Having advanced a short distance, I ordered Captain Jones to deploy his company (A) to the right of the pike, in order to cover the whole of the rear of the town and prevent the escape of the enemy in case of their defeat. Before the whole of Company A, however, could be deployed it encountered a body of cavalry advancing on the pike, which were repulsed after a sharp contest. Advancing farther, Captain Jones encountered a force of artillery, with one brass field piece, which he charged and repulsed, the enemy leaving the piece behind them. Still advancing, and completing the deployment to the right of the pike, Company A captured 68 prisoners, marched them to a corner of the main street, and left them in charge of a squad under command of Lieut. R. H. Chapman. At this juncture, intelligence having reached Captain Jones, through a prisoner, that a re-enforcement of 700 men was coming in by railroad, he ordered Quartermaster Sergt. John C. Allen to take a file of men and burn a long railroad bridge in his rear, which was promptly executed, the remainder of the company advancing until the firing ceased.

Company B, advancing along Main street, driving before it a body of the enemy, killed some and captured many—Lieutenant Meadows and a private of said company, and Private S. T. Moore, of Company A, being the first to approach the brass field piece, which was captured. Advancing along Main street this company was ordered to dislodge a party of the enemy from a garden, which was promptly executed. Companies B and C and a portion of Company A were then ordered to charge the depot and a neighboring brick building from which the enemy was pouring an incessant fire. After a severe conflict they drove the enemy from both these strongholds, killing and capturing several of them, and afterward pursuing the enemy to the corn field, in which they made their last stand.

The only casualty in Company B was 1 man wounded; in Company C, 2 killed and 6 wounded (3 slightly and 3 severely); among the latter was Second Lieut. Thomas N. Pitts.

The left wing, viz, Companies D, E, and F, under command of Maj. Samuel J. Winn, advanced steadily on the left of the pike, engaging the enemy at several points and driving them into the center of the town, having killed and captured a number of them and not halting until the enemy was routed. The left wing sustained no loss either in killed or wounded.

I feel that many thanks and much praise are due to the officers and soldiers of my command for their highly creditable and heroic conduct on the occasion of this battle.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

F. M. NIX,

Lieut. Col., Comdg. First Regiment Georgia Partisan Rangers.

Capt. R. A. ALSTON,

Assistant Adjutant-General, Morgan's Brigade.

No. 15.

Report of Lieut. Col. Basil W. Duke, Second Kentucky Cavalry, of the capture of Cynthia.

CYNTHIANA, KY., July 17, 1862.

SIR: During the engagement to-day the regiment engaged the enemy on the Georgetown pike, and after a desperate fight of about an hour and a half succeeded in driving them into the town, where a hot street fight occurred, lasting until near dark. We took the 12-pounder brass piece that had so annoyed us during the early part of the action. Where all engaged acted so nobly, it is difficult to particularize; but it is generally conceded that Company A covered itself with glory, which is acknowledged by the regiment.

P. H. THORPE,
Adjutant.

Capt. R. A. ALSTON, Assistant Adjutant-General.

— — —, 1862.

In the action referred to above my regiment was deployed upon the Georgetown pike, Companies A and B upon the right, Companies E and F upon the left. After a stubborn fight the enemy were driven from all the positions in the edge of the town. Company B was then sent to the extreme right to engage a force which threatened our right flank and succeeded in dispersing it. Companies E and F charged up to the bank of the river under a severe fire of musketry and grape, and were prevented from entering the town only by the depth of the water at that point. Company A crossed the river at a ford near the bridge, charged across the bridge, and after a very severe contest drove the enemy from the houses near the bridge. Company C, previously held in reserve, charged through the town on horseback, and forced the enemy to abandon their artillery and cleared that street. The two last-named companies, then uniting with the Georgians (who had dashed in upon the left), forced the enemy to abandon the depot and subsequently the town.

It is almost impossible to speak in terms too high of the different officers under my command; good conduct and individual gallantry were so common that it almost ceased to be a matter of remark. Captain Hutcheson and Webber led their companies in perfect order through a fire that was unusually severe. Lieut. J. A. Smith and Bowyer, of Company A, were both severely wounded in front of that company and in the midst of the enemy. Captain Bowles and Lieutenant Myers, of Company C, behaved with great gallantry; the latter was struck from his horse, but fortunately the wound was but slight. Lieutenant White, commanding Company B, performed the duty assigned him, and kept his company in front of a superior force for nearly an hour, finally dispersing it. I have the pleasure to report the gallant and efficient conduct of Captain Thorpe, adjutant of my regiment, and my thanks are due him for the manner in which he superintended the execution of every order. I cannot too highly compliment Col. St. Leger Grenfell, who acted with my regiment, for the execution of an order which did perhaps more than anything else to gain the battle. His example gave new courage to every one who witnessed it.

I have the honor to report that every one in my regiment gave satisfaction to myself and their respective company commanders.

B. W. DUKE,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding Regiment.

Capt. R. A. ALSTON, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 16.

Report of Lieut. Joseph E. Harris, commanding Morgan's Artillery.

MORGAN'S BRIGADE,
Cynthiana, Ky., July 18, 1862.

SIR: In obedience to special instructions I have to report that my battery entered the engagement of 17th instant on the turnpike road leading to this place, about 300 yards from the bridge, at — o'clock, and commenced shelling the enemy, who were occupying the latter position, which was kept up, under showers of musketry-balls and grape from the enemy's artillery for an hour, at which time they retired before a charge of cavalry. By order of the general the pieces were then moved by hand to the front across the bridge, again coming under galling fire of the enemy's sharpshooters, who occupied the depot and surrounding buildings, about 80 yards distant.

I regret here to have to report the inefficiency of my command for a short time, resulting mainly from a want of discipline and drill, which you know I have scarcely had time to produce. Under these difficulties, however, the firing continued slowly until the enemy evacuated his final position.

The casualties in this command are as follows, viz: Wounded—Cannoneer W. B. Shelton, slightly in the head; Cannoneer Thomas Shanks, flesh wound in leg, and three horses killed.

In conclusion I cannot but mention the gallant conduct of Cannoneer W. B. Shelton as setting an emulous example to others, who, when having been wounded in the head and lain senseless for ten minutes, on recovering himself resumed his post, where he continued throughout the engagement.

I am, captain, your obedient servant,

JOS. E. HARRIS,

First Lieutenant, Commanding Artillery, Morgan's Legion.

Captain ALSTON, Assistant Adjutant-General, Morgan's Legion.

JULY 7-11, 1862.—Operations about Cumberland Gap, Tenn.

Report of Brig. Gen. John S. Williams, U. S. Army, commanding Army of Eastern Kentucky.

HDQRS. DEPARTMENT SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA,
Camp near Narrows, Ky., July 13, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a letter from General John S. Williams, furnishing information of the enemy at Cumberland Gap. He mentions an engagement between our cavalry and that of the enemy. This communication will show the active services of this energetic and valuable officer. We had a skirmish on the 11th instant in the direction of Greenbrier River, driving the enemy back to his lines.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. W. LORING,

Major-General, Commanding.

Hon. G. W. RANDOLPH, Secretary of War.

[Inclosure.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF EASTERN KENTUCKY,
Camp near Liberty Hill, Ky., July 12, 1862.

GENERAL: I am this morning in receipt of yours of the 10th, informing me of the movements of the enemy across Greenbrier and directing reconnaissances in the direction of Flat Top Mountain. I have kept all the time a company scouting in the vicinity of Flat Top with competent guides. My information is that the enemy has moved his camp down to the foot of the mountain in consequence of the scarcity of water. One of my scouts returned from Logan last night reports one regiment of 400 at Chapmanville, 5 miles below the Court-House. I have sent two spies into Raleigh, neither of whom has returned.

Some days ago I sent three companies of mounted men down the Clinch and Holston into Tennessee, under command of Captain Witcher. I have a dispatch from him of the 9th. He had a fight with a company of Yankee cavalry on the 7th instant within 8 miles of Cumberland Gap. Killed 16 of them and captured their colors, which he sent to me by the courier. Our loss none.

The enemy has three brigades in the neighborhood of Cumberland Gap, to wit: Garfield's brigade of Ohioans on Copper Creek between the Gap and Cumberland Ford; Garrard's Kentucky in the Gap, and Spears' Tennesseans between the Gap and the ford of Clinch. With this force there is 500 cavalry. The entire force is about 8,000.

My effective force is very much reduced by measles and mumps among the new troops and by the large scouting parties sent agreeably to your instructions toward Tennessee and Kentucky. I will keep a sharp lookout and let no opportunity escape of hitting the enemy a blow.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Brigadier-General, &c.

Maj. Gen. W. W. LORING, Commanding, &c.

P. S.—Since writing the above a courier has arrived from Buchanan, who reports 150 Yankees from Logan to be in that county plundering the people.

JULY 12-16, 1862.—Expedition from Decatur, Ala., and skirmish (12th) near Davis' Gap.

REPORTS.

No. 1.—Col. Abel D. Streight, Fifty-first Indiana Infantry.

No. 2.—Capt. Stephen C. Writer, First Ohio Cavalry.

No. 1.

Report of Col. Abel D. Streight, Fifty-first Indiana Infantry.

HEADQUARTERS FIFTY-FIRST INDIANA VOLUNTEERS,
Camp near Mooresville, Ala., July 16, 1862.

SIR: While in command at Decatur there were several small parties of loyal Alabamians who came into our lines begging me to give them protection and a chance to defend the flag of our country. The tale of suffering and misery as told by each as they arrived was in itself a lamentable history of the deplorable condition of the Union people of the South. Notwithstanding the oft-repeated assertion that there was a strong Union sentiment in portions of the cotton States, I had long since given up all hopes of finding the people entertaining it; hence I was at first incredulous as to what they said and even suspicious that they were spies belonging to the enemy, but as their numbers increased, each corroborating the story of the other, I at last became convinced that the matter was worthy of notice.

About this time (10th instant) I was informed by a courier that there was a party of about 40 men some 5 or 6 miles toward the mountain trying to come to us and about the same number of the enemy's cavalry were between them and Decatur trying to intercept and capture them. As my orders were to defend the town only I did not feel at liberty to send out assistance to the Union men without further orders, and there being no telegraphic communication with you I at once informed General Buell by telegraph of the circumstances, whereupon I received the following reply:

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., ———, 1862.

Col. A. D. STREIGHT, Fifty-first Indiana Volunteers:

Send out what force you deem sufficient to assist the Union men in and drive off the rebel cavalry, and see that they are not playing a trick to draw you out by these reports.

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Owing to a storm that was passing over the telegraph lines at the time the above was not received until near three hours after I sent General Buell the first dispatch. As soon as I received the foregoing instructions from Colonel Fry I at once ordered three companies of my regiment, under Major Coleseott, to cross the river with their arms and full 40 rounds of cartridges. This was done in the least possible time, but just as the three companies were in line ready to march another courier arrived, stating that the Alabama boys had succeeded in avoiding the rebels and had got within our lines; but a short time elapsed before they arrived. Such were the manifestations of joy and gladness exhibited by them that all doubts were fully expelled from my mind, whereupon I resolved to go to the assistance of those who were left behind, providing I could get permission to do so. Consequently I telegraphed the following:

DECATUR, ALA., July 10, 1862—7 p. m.

Col. JAMES B. FRY, Assistant Adjutant-General, Chief of Staff:

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that the party of Alabama volunteers has just arrived and 40 of them have been mustered into the service of the United States. Their accounts of the hardships endured are sufficient to enlist the sympathies of the hardest heart. They report that there are several hundred who would come but for the danger of passing from the foot of the mountains here, some 25 miles distant. If you will give me one company of cavalry to take with my regiment I am fully satisfied that I could, by going, say, 15 miles toward the foot of the mountains and then sending out a few of these new recruits to notify their neighbors, within four days' time bring back with me at least 500 volunteers. If you will allow me to make the experiment, my word for it I will return safely with my command.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. D. STREIGHT,
Colonel Fifty-first Indiana Volunteers.

Nothing was heard from the foregoing dispatch till about 2 p. m., the next day (July 11), when Captain Lennard handed me the following communication from Colonel Fry to General Wood, with verbal instructions to carry out its provisions:

HEADQUARTERS,
Huntsville, Ala., July 11, 1862.

General Wood:

Colonel Streight reports that there are several hundred men about 25 miles south of Decatur who are trying to come on to join our army and Colonel Streight is anxious to go with his regiment to bring them in. You can order an expedition of this kind. In doing so it will be necessary to send another regiment to take Colonel Streight's place near Decatur. It will not be practicable for you to cross cavalry over to send, but the colonel can take any cavalry that may be at Decatur. Instruct Colonel Streight to be cautious, and not expose his command to ambuscade or surprise or to attack from superior force. He should not be gone more than three or four days, and must take no baggage. He must be careful and not let the people suppose that his presence indicates a permanent occupation, and thus lead them into demonstrations for which the rebels would make them suffer after our withdrawal. Give such orders for the details and precautionary instructions as the case may seem to you to require.

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Upon the receipt of the above I proceeded to get my command in readiness for the expedition as quickly as possible. Four days' rations were ordered and one camp kettle to each company. The haversacks holding only three days' rations, we filled the kettles and buckets out of the remainder, and decided to get along as best we could under the circumstances. The guides were selected to conduct us to the Union settlement, who were also to act as couriers to inform their friends of the nature of our mission. There were but 16 men and the captain of Company D, First Ohio Cavalry, at Decatur, who were also put in readiness to march.

In accordance with these arrangements, we moved off at daylight on the 12th instant in the direction of a place called Davis' Gap, some 9 miles southeast of Danville and 25 south of Decatur. The cavalry were thrown out in the advance a suitable distance to give notice of the approach of an enemy, and a strong advance and rear guard was at all times kept in readiness for immediate action. When we had proceeded some 12 miles on our way, being unable to hear anything of the enemy, I ordered the captain commanding the cavalry to proceed with his command in advance with three of the guides and escort them as far toward Davis' Gap as he should deem safe, so as to allow the guides to give the information to the Union people that we were coming. I gave him the most positive instructions to make diligent inquiry relative to the enemy, and to go no farther than he could with perfect safety, and as soon as he arrived near enough to the mountains to enable the guides to get through he should fall back at once and rejoin me, I at this time having ascertained that it would in all probability be necessary for me to go about 23 miles, instead of 15, the distance I at first expected, but did not expect to be able to get through the first day.

Under these instructions he proceeded somewhat faster than the infantry could march, consequently when he arrived some 22 miles from Decatur (10 miles from where he left us) he was probably not more than 5 or 6 miles ahead of my regiment; but it being very hot in the middle of the day, we halted to rest, expecting the cavalry to rejoin us, as ordered. In direct disobedience to my orders, the cavalry spent about an hour's time in scouting about the country after they had escorted the guides to within 3 miles of the mountains, after which they stopped at a Mr. Menter's house and ordered dinner; there they spent about three hours more. The captain was warned when he first arrived in the neighborhood that 40 of the enemy's cavalry were within 6 miles of him; yet with these facts before him, as I have above shown, he spent nearly four hours in the neighborhood and at Mr. Menter's house—a sufficient time to have returned to Decatur, if necessary, much less to rejoin me.

At about 5.30 o'clock he was attacked by upward of 40 of the enemy's cavalry and guerrillas. Here again his conduct seems to have been very injudicious, for although there were several log buildings that he could have held against any force the enemy could bring to bear against him, yet, instead of occupying them, after exchanging a few shots, in which 1 of his men was wounded and 2 of the enemy killed and 2 wounded, he ordered a retreat across the field, which seems to have been accomplished very precipitately, especially when taking into consideration the fact that the enemy did not pursue him but a few rods, and that too on foot. Four of his men got lost from the balance. He proceeded in a westerly, circuitous route to Decatur, where he arrived the evening of the same day with 12 of his men.

In the mean time I had arrived to within 2 miles of the place where he was attacked before the enemy had left, and think I would have been in time to have done them justice had I not halted to chastise some guerrillas who had the impudence to fire into my rear guard; but as it was we arrived just in time to see the chivalry put spurs to their horses and leave hurriedly to the eastward, thus showing conclusively that the enemy did not follow our cavalry. We bivouacked that night 23 miles from Decatur and within 1 mile of where the skirmish took place.

The next day was spent in ascertaining what we could relative to the extent of the damage done to the cavalry and in notifying the people in the mountains that they could now have a chance to join the Union Army. I ascertained the loss of our cavalry in the engagement to be 1 man missing, who, when last seen, some 2 miles from where the skirmish took place, was wounded in the thigh (not seriously), and 1 taken prisoner; 1 horse killed and 1 disabled. Three cavalymen came in early in the morning without horses, but our boys succeeded in finding the horses and equipments near where they were left. The captain's sword was also found about 100 rods from where the fight occurred.

I soon became convinced that the time set for me to return was insufficient to fully accomplish the object of my mission. The news of the defeat of our cavalry spread over the country like a fire on a prairie, causing great consternation among the Union people and boldness on the part of the guerrillas. The guides became frightened, and it was very difficult to induce them to leave my command. However, after laboring under all these difficulties we succeeded in bringing back with us 150 volunteers. Several small parties that started to join us failed to get there in time. One party, numbering 34 men, were within 20 miles of us at daylight the morning we left, and although a messenger arrived giving me that information when we had marched but a short distance on our return, yet I was ordered to return within four days' time and could wait no longer.

At 11 a. m. yesterday we took up our line of march for Decatur, and when we had proceeded about 4 miles from our encampment we were informed that the enemy's cavalry, about 500 strong, were posted at the crossing of the road, about 1 mile ahead. The country being thickly wooded, I had nothing to fear from mounted men, but supposing that they might dismount and act as infantry, I deployed Companies A and F on each side of the road in advance as skirmishers, at the same time ordering Company D forward in the road to form a reserve, and also to deploy 6 men in advance to act as signal-men, one company having been previously detailed to act as rear guard. They too were ordered to throw out skirmishers on the flanks, to avoid an undiscovered approach from either of these directions. The Alabamians had previously been placed next to the rear guard. Having advanced the skirmishers and advance reserves some 400 yards I ordered the whole battalion to move forward, each individual and company to keep their relative positions. In this order we proceeded, but as we approached the position occupied by the enemy they fled before us without firing a gun.

It now became apparent to me that the intention of the enemy was to harass our march, and as the country was mostly wooded, I concluded to continue the march in the order above referred to, thus avoiding the possibility of running into an ambuscade or of being surprised. The enemy fell back as we approached for about 2 miles, when they turned eastward. For some time afterward I was expecting a demonstration upon our rear and made preparations accordingly. We proceeded to march in this manner for 12 miles, frequently relieving the skirmishers by sending out others, without further molestation. It was now getting dark and we were within 7 miles of Decatur, when we concluded to bivouac for the night. Strong pickets were thrown out in every approachable direction. The boys were allowed to sleep till 3 o'clock the next morning, when they were awakened, and as soon as it was daylight we were on our way, and arrived at Decatur at 6.30 a. m., bringing back every member of my regiment who went with us.

I wish to say a word relative to the condition of these people. They are mostly poor, though many of them are, or rather were, in comfortable circumstances. They outnumber nearly three to one the secessionists in portions of Morgan, Blount, Winston, Marion, Walker, Fayette, and Jefferson Counties; but situated as they are, surrounded by a most relentless foe, mostly unarmed and destitute of ammunition, they are persecuted in every conceivable way, yet up to this time most of them have kept out of the way sufficiently to avoid being dragged off by the gangs that infest the country for the purpose of plunder and enforcing the provisions of the rebel conscription act. Their horses and cattle are driven off in vast numbers. Every public road is patrolled by guerrilla bands, and the Union men have been compelled to seek protection in the fastnesses of the mountainous wilderness. They cannot hold out much longer. This state of things has so disturbed them that but very little attention has been paid to farming, consequently many of them are now destitute of food of their own and are living off their more fortunate neighbors. Such examples of patriotism as these people have set are worthy of being followed. One old lady, Mrs. Anna Campbell, volunteered to ride 35 miles and return, making 70 miles, with about 30 recruits, within thirty-six hours. When it is taken into consideration that these people were all hid away to avoid being taken by the rebels and that the country is but sparsely settled this case is without a parallel in American history. There are many cases of a similar nature that came under my observation, but I do not desire to weary your patience with them. Suffice it to say that I have never witnessed such an outpouring of devoted and determined patriotism among any other people. I am now of the opinion that if there could be a sufficient force in that portion of the country to protect these people there could be at least two full regiments raised of as good and true men as ever defended the American flag. So confident am I that my views are correct that if the commanding general will grant me permission to do so I will take my regiment (the boys all want to go) and two weeks' rations of bread, salt, sugar, and coffee (meat we can get there), and 500 extra stand of arms, with a sufficient supply of ammunition, and locate at least 30 miles south of Decatur, where I will rally around me a sufficient number of the brave mountaineers to protect the country effectually against anything except the regular rebel army, which, by the way, would find it a difficult country to operate in. Never did people stand in greater need of protection. They have battled manfully against the most unscrupulous foe that civilized warfare has ever witnessed. They have been shut out from all communication with anybody but their enemies for a year and a half, and yet they stand firm and true. If such merit is not to be rewarded, if such citizens are not to receive protection, then is their case a deplorable one indeed.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. D. STREIGHT,
Colonel Fifty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Capt. W. H. SCHLATER, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 2.

Report of Capt. Stephen C. Writer, First Ohio Cavalry.

DECATUR, ALA., July 16, 1862.

SIR: I should have sent you the following official information with regard to my late expedition sooner, but I did not until this morning learn the full details from some of my men who were detained with the infantry regiment which accompanied us at the time of starting.

Late on Friday evening of the 11th, Colonel Streight, of the Fifty-first Indiana Regiment, informed me that he had received permission from General Buell to march his regiment 24 miles into the hills and remain four days for the purpose of recruiting its numbers, as many had already come in and many more would come in were they protected from the bushwhackers in their immediate neighborhood, and also received permission from the general to take any cavalry he might find upon this side of the river.

We left Decatur the following morning at sunrise and went out 6 miles. Colonel Streight then ordered that I should take five of the new recruits which had accompanied us and escort them through to Colonel Davis', 17 miles farther on, with my cavalry, which consisted of 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, and 11 privates, carrying in all 12 guns. I was instructed when I arrived at Colonel Davis' to impress any number of horses that they might require to ride all through the country to inform Union men wishing to join our army that he was there ready to receive them, they to go on that night and require a change of horses, it being considered too hard a day's work to use the horses they had that day ridden through.

At the time of parting with Colonel Streight he told me that his regiment would undoubtedly come up with me that night; but if it did not, and I considered it dangerous to remain there alone, to fall back upon his regiment.

I arrived near Colonel Davis' all safe, put out pickets, fed horses, and sent forward three men and procured horses for three others. I supposed at the time I reached Colonel Davis' the infantry was 8 or 10 miles back. The place we selected to feed was a farm-yard, well fortified by corn-cribs, stables, hen-houses, and pig-pens, and might easily have been held had I had any respectable number of men. I suppose I had been there altogether two and a half hours when I heard an alarm firing from our rear pickets. We immediately mounted our horses, rode out to the pickets, and found the enemy were approaching us with some force mounted and a very considerably larger force dismounted, and deploying right and left of the road under cover of the woods and a rail fence, evidently intending to flank us on all sides and capture us. I then ordered the men to return to the barn-yard, tie up the horses, and take position behind our defenses and defend ourselves as best we could. The men fired steady and with precision, and staid their advance for the time being; but as their force was being constantly augmented from the woods I finally gave the order to mount and make our retreat, that being the only way I could then see to save our horses. We retreated toward the woods parallel with their line, they keeping up a constant firing, it being now the only route left open to us. While running the gauntlet 3 men were wounded, 1 in the thigh and 2 about the head; the latter 2 not seriously. Two horses were shot and disabled and left behind.

When we reached the woods I gave directions that we should turn the enemy's flank, go back by their rear, and join the infantry on the Decatur road, which I then supposed to be about 4 miles back of where we had the skirmish. I then for the first time discovered that five of my men were missing, and supposed that they had got scattered from the main body and would join the infantry that night or in the morning. The country through which we retreated was a secession, guerrilla neighborhood, and when within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the main road four more shots were fired upon us, and one of my men had his saber and scabbard shot entirely off the belt. One mile farther on I was shot, the ball entering the body near the upper point of the hip bone, traversing down and around the hip, lodging on the inside of the thigh nearly one-third of the way down to the knee, giving me a gunshot wound in my body of considerably over one foot in length. I then determined to change my course and come into camp by a by-road, which I did that night by 12 o'clock, having ridden 18 miles after being shot.

Three of my missing men returned this morning and state that they made their way to the infantry the next forenoon. They report two men still missing, one having been taken prisoner and the other either a prisoner or killed, they were not able to say positively which.

I have lost 3 horses (2 shot and disabled and the third taken with the prisoner), 2 full horse equipments, 2 carbines, 3 sabers, and 4 pistols.

The enemy had between 75 and 100 men, and report 2 killed and 2 severely wounded upon their side.

Reports of Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell, U. S. Army, commanding Army of the Ohio, including General Orders, No. 32.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., July 15, 1862.

My information, up to the night of the 13th, from Murfreesborough was that the Ninth Michigan had been captured, but that Colonel Lester's regiment and Hewett's battery were doing well, and felt confident of being able to hold out. Re-enforcements were being started from Nashville. It appears that before they arrived Colonel Lester surrendered, at 4 p. m. the same day. I have no particulars, and at present no remarks to make upon what appears to be a most disgraceful affair. Of course it may embarrass me considerably. I have been busy to counteract it. The worst is the interception of the Chattanooga road, which was just completed. I had taken the precaution to place some twelve regiments on that route until it should be securely established. We will go to work again.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

General HALLECK.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., July 19, 1862.

As nearly as I can ascertain the force captured at Murfreesborough on the 13th consisted of nine companies of the Third Minnesota, under Colonel Lester; six companies of the Ninth Michigan, four companies of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, three companies of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, and two sections of Hewett's Kentucky battery. All except Colonel Lester's regiment and the artillery, including Colonel Duffield and General T. T. Crittenden, seem to have been completely surprised in the town and captured without time or opportunity for resistance. The case of the rest of the command was but little better. They maintained their position until 4 o'clock and then surrendered. I had concentrated a larger force at that point to occupy McMinnville, but a considerable portion of it had been sent away a day or two before to Kentucky to meet the difficulties there. I regard the whole affair as most disgraceful and demanding prompt and vigorous treatment. It has also caused serious delay in the means of supplying the army so that it can move on the Decatur route. The difficulty has been increased by damages to bridges by swollen streams. Every effort is being made to remove these difficulties and I hope to have the Murfreesborough road repaired and in working order in a very few days. It is not my habit to plead difficulties or represent them even; but it is important that they should be somewhat understood, lest impossible expectations should be formed, and the opinion taken up that this army is idle and has nothing to do but march rapidly along the road. Our lines of supply are very long and difficult to protect; for, without ascribing hostility to the mass of the people, there is still enough of hostile and bad element to involve us in all the difficulties of operating in an enemy's country.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General, Commanding.

Major-General HALLECK, or ADJUTANT-GENERAL U. S. ARMY.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,
No. 32. } In Camp, Huntsville, Ala., July 21, 1862.

On the 13th instant the force at Murfreesborough, under command of Brig. Gen. T. T. Crittenden, late colonel of the Sixth Indiana Regiment, and consisting of six companies of the Ninth Michigan, nine companies of the Third Minnesota, two sections of Hewett's (Kentucky) battery, four companies of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, and three companies of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, was captured at that place by a force of the enemy's cavalry variously estimated at from 1,800 to 3,500. It appears from the best information that can be obtained that Brigadier-General Crittenden, and Colonel Duffield, of the Ninth Michigan, with the six companies of that regiment and all of the cavalry, were surprised and captured early in the morning in the houses and streets of the town or in their camp near by, with but slight resistance and without any timely warning of the presence of an enemy. The rest of the force, consisting of the Third Minnesota and the artillery, under Colonel Lester, left its camp and took another position, which it maintained with but few casualties against the feeble attacks of the enemy until about 3 o'clock, when it was surrendered and marched into captivity.

Take it in all its features, few more disgraceful examples of neglect of duty and lack of good conduct can be found in the history of wars. It fully merits the extreme penalty which the law provides for such misconduct. The force was more than sufficient to repel the attack effectually. The mortification which the army will feel at the result is poorly compensated by the exertion made by some—perhaps many—of the officers to retrieve the disgrace of the surprise. The action fit to be adopted with reference to those who are blamable, especially the officers highest in command, cannot be determined without further investigation.

In contrast to this shameful affair the general commanding takes pleasure in making honorable mention of the conduct of a detachment of 22 men of Companies I and H, Tenth Wisconsin Regiment, under the command of Sergts. W. Nelson and A. H. Makinson. The detachment was on duty guarding a bridge east of Huntsville, when it was attacked on April 28 by a force of some 200 or 300 cavalry, which it fought for two hours and repulsed in the most signal manner. Such is the conduct that duty and honor demand of every soldier; and this example is worthy of imitation by higher officers and larger commands.

By command of Major-General Buell:

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

No. 2.

Report of Brig. Gen. T. T. Crittenden, U. S. Army, commanding at Murfreesborough.

I submit the following report of the affair of July 13, 1862, at Murfreesborough, Tenn.:

While at Athens, Ala., I received the special order of Major-General Buell assigning me to the command of the post of Murfreesborough, and went there as speedily as possible. I arrived there on the same train with Colonel Duffield, of the Ninth Michigan, on July 11. The next day I assumed command of the post and Colonel Duffield of the Twenty-third Brigade. Having no instructions, and knowing nothing of the affairs at the post, I had several interviews with Col. [Henry C.] Lester [Third Minnesota], then in command, and from his statements, made both to myself and Colonel Duffield, it was evident that he apprehended no danger. He stated that the only points from which the enemy could approach were McMinnville and Lebanon, that there was no force between Chattanooga and Murfreesborough, and that Morgan's force was far beyond Lebanon, en route for Kentucky.

Colonel Lester had separated his forces on or about June 23, 1862, leaving five companies of the Ninth Michigan and about 80 men of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry at the old camp, and removing the Third Minnesota Regiment and Hewett's First Kentucky Battery (four guns) about $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles northwest of the former camp. This was the whole force there on July 13, except one company Ninth Michigan posted in the court-house as provost-guard, altogether numbering about 950 effective men.

I appointed Lieut. [Henry M.] Duffield, Ninth Michigan, acting assistant adjutant-general, Lieut. C. H. Blakey, who had been previously acting, having left for Minnesota on recruiting service on July 12.

Lieutenant Duffield, under my orders, proceeded at once to prepare a morning report, but did not complete it that day.

I then went with Colonel Duffield to look for a proper camp for the whole force, as I would not permit it to remain separated. I found the water, the scarcity of which Colonel Lester assigned as the reason for such division, abundant to supply 5,000 men and a good camp ground within a quarter of a mile of the former camp. I examined other camp sites, but preferred the first, and ordered Colonel Duffield to concentrate his force there.

The same day I rode out with the officer of the day and made an examination of the pickets. Being dissatisfied with its strength and locations, I directed Major Seibert, commanding the cavalry, to double his cavalry force on all the roads to Lebanon and McMinnville, which he did, but withdrew them at night, in accordance with the custom and orders of Colonel Lester under which he had previously acted, of which custom and order I was entirely ignorant. There was no such order on the order-book, it being merely verbal. I had doubled the cavalry on the points of danger, as a temporary strengthening of the pickets, until next day, when I had ordered a much larger detail for picket duty from the infantry. My temporary headquarters were opposite to and about 75 yards from the court-house.

I have been informed that Colonel Lester had some intelligence of a cavalry force of the enemy assembling near McMinnville, but he did not inform me nor did I have any information of impending danger. I found things negligently and loosely done at the post and attempted to remedy all the negligence I saw there.

At daylight of July 13 General Forrest, with 2,500 cavalry, consisting of four regiments and one battalion—among them the First and Second Georgia and Seventh Texas, having marched 48 miles between noon of the 12th and that time—surrounded and captured the pickets on one of the roads to McMinnville without the firing of a gun, rushed at full speed into the camp of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry and into the court-house square and streets of the town. Passing through the cavalry camp they attacked the Ninth Michigan, which was ready to receive them. Severe fighting at this point resulted in driving the enemy back some 300 yards after repeated assaults, both sides losing heavily.

Colonel Duffield, commanding Twenty-third Brigade, was severely wounded early in the action and carried from the field. He was paroled at once, and I have had no report from him.

Lieutenant-Colonel Parkhurst, commanding the Ninth Michigan, after holding his camp nearly eight hours against superior numbers, finding the enemy were surrounding him with their whole force and having no hope of re-enforcement (not receiving any reply to several messages for assistance sent by him to Colonel Lester), surrendered his force, then reduced to 134 men. This fragment of a regiment, under its gallant lieutenant-colonel (Parkhurst), fought splendidly, and deserves honorable mention. Their loss was 11 killed, 86 wounded, and 36 missing.

Company B, Ninth Michigan, the provost guard, made a resolute defense of the court-house for three hours during repeated assaults, killing 12 and wounding 18 of the enemy. They did not surrender until the court-house was set on fire. During these hours of suspense only an occasional shot was heard from the Third Minnesota and Hewett's battery. Of course their comparative quiet showed that they were not attacked in force. From the reports of Colonel Lester and Captain Hewett and from other sources I learned that their commands turned out promptly, marched unattacked nearly half a mile, and were there halted by Colonel Lester. Except slight changes of position, they remained there from 4.30 a. m. until 2.30 p. m., twice or three times menaced by small squads and once attacked by about 300 cavalry. The latter were repulsed by the fire of the skirmishers and one volley from two companies on the left flank of the regiment. Within three-quarters of a mile of their position they heard the fighting at the court-house for three hours and during seven hours and a half the fight at the Michigan camp.

The Third Minnesota was a splendidly drilled regiment. The officers and men were anxious to fight, but Colonel Lester held them there without seeing any enemy in force. Colonel Lester received two dispatches from Lieutenant-Colonel Parkhurst, begging for aid, but would afford none. When all was lost except his own command Colonel Lester went under a flag of truce to see Colonel Duffield, and there saw the enemy, who had not dared to come within range of his artillery, and was so impressed with what he saw that he returned, determined to surrender. This is proved by his calling a council of his company commanders and his lieutenant-colonel [Chauncey W. Griggs]. They, by a viva-voce vote, decided to fight. Part of them went from the council. Colonel Lester reopened and reargued the matter. A ballot vote was taken and the force was surrendered. This was done by the statements and influence of Colonel Lester. Lieutenant-Colonel Griggs bitterly opposed the surrender and voted against it to the last. Not a man was killed in the line of the Third Minnesota during the day. I state the facts without comment.

With a few men I held my headquarters until after the court-house was taken. I early sent a messenger, in citizen's clothes, with orders to Colonel Duffield, but he could not pass through the enemy's lines. They had my quarters surrounded from the time they entered the square. I submit copies of reports made to me and refer to them. I respectfully demand a court of inquiry into the disaster at Murfreesborough.

T. T. CRITTENDEN,

Brigadier-General, late Commanding Post.

Lieut. Col. J. P. GARESCHÉ,

Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

Findings of a Court of Inquiry.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. DEPT. OF THE CUMBERLAND,
No. 4. } Murfreesborough, Tenn., January 24, 1863.

I. At a court of inquiry, convened at the city of Nashville, December 17, 1862, by Special Field Orders, No. 19, Headquarters Fourteenth Army Corps, Department of the Cumberland, on the request of Brig. Gen. T. T. Crittenden, to investigate and give an opinion on the facts connected with the surrender of the troops at Murfreesborough, under his command, of which court Brig. Gen. James G. Spears was president, and Col. Joseph R. Scott, Nineteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, was recorder, the following facts were found upon the testimony:

1st. That he (General Crittenden) assumed command of the post at

* Dismissed December 1, 1862.

† Dismissed, to date September 22, 1862.

Murfreesborough on the 12th day of July, 1862, between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock a. m.

2d. That he found the camp had been divided for three weeks previous and the forces separated.

3d. That he rode out on the morning of the 12th July, with Colonel Duffield, commanding the Twenty-third Brigade, and selected a camp, and told Colonel Duffield to concentrate the whole force there at once.

4th. That he rode out and inspected the pickets with the field officer of the day, and not being satisfied with their strength and location, ordered Major Seibert, commanding the cavalry, to double his cavalry patrol on the roads leading to Lebanon and McMinnville.

5th. That the pickets on these roads were re-enforced, but were withdrawn at night without the knowledge of General Crittenden, as was the custom of the post by order.

6th. That he ordered morning reports to be made out and one-fifth of the entire effective force to be detailed as grand guards.

7th. That he examined the brigade order books, and ordered a plot of the town and its approaches to be made.

8th. That he consulted fully and freely with Colonels Lester and Duffield, did a large amount of executive business, and was constantly employed until 9 p. m. July 12.

9th. That he was informed, on what should have been good authority, that there was no force of the enemy nearer than Chattanooga, with the exception of small parties of guerrillas, and that there was no danger of an immediate attack.

10th. That the attack was made upon the Ninth Michigan Infantry and Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry and the town at daylight on the morning of the 13th July.

11th. That the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry was immediately overpowered. That the Ninth Michigan Infantry was promptly formed and repeatedly repulsed the enemy. That about 8 o'clock a. m. they took a more sheltered position, which they held until 12 o'clock, when they surrendered; their commanding officer being wounded and having lost nearly one-half their number in killed and wounded.

12th. That one company of the Ninth Michigan Infantry, acting as provost guards, held the court-house in the town until 8 o'clock, when they surrendered after it was set on fire.

13th. That General Crittenden surrendered himself and staff at 8 o'clock, having endeavored to communicate with the troops, but failed, owing to the stopping of his message by rebel guards.

14th. That the Third Minnesota Infantry and Hewett's battery of four guns, under command of Colonel Lester, being $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town and about the same distance from the Ninth Michigan Infantry and cavalry, immediately on hearing the attack on these places marched up the turnpike and took position in an open field, with woods in front, about 600 yards distant, where they remained until about 12 o'clock, cavalry occasionally appearing in their front in small parties, which were driven off with shot and shell from the battery, after which they fell back about one-half mile, near their camp, and remained there until they surrendered.

15th. That the estimated number of troops at the post was about 1,040; that of the enemy 2,600.

Upon which statement of facts the court give the following opinion:

"We therefore are of the opinion from the evidence that Brig. Gen. T. T. Crittenden did all that should be expected of a vigilant commander from the time he took command until the surrender. We find no evidence that impugns his skill or courage; on the contrary, he was very active on the day before the attack up to 9 p. m. in obtaining information and placing the post in a proper state of defense. Although it may be said that he should have immediately concentrated his forces and that any delay in so doing was dangerous, yet we find an ample apology for the delay in the facts that he was an entire stranger to the place and country, and that he was assured by Colonel Lester, who had preceded him in the command for two months, that there was no danger of an attack and that no enemy of importance was nearer than Chattanooga."

All which is published for the information of the army.

II. The general commanding, after a careful examination of the testimony adduced before the court of inquiry, is of opinion that the defeat of our forces under Brig. Gen. T. T. Crittenden at Murfreesborough was chiefly owing to the withdrawal of picket guards from the roads leading to the town during the night and to the separation of the forces at the post; that the post was taken by surprise and the forces overpowered by being attacked in detail, all which would have been provided against had the timely orders of General Crittenden been obeyed.

By command of Major-General Rosecrans:

C. GODDARD,
Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

Report of Maj. James J. Seibert, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry.

GENERAL: I respectfully submit the following as my report of the battle at Murfreesborough, Tenn., on Sunday, July 13, 1862:

I first assumed command of the cavalry attached to that command, consisting of the Third Battalion Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, and one squadron of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, on May 29, but was called to Nashville on duty on June 19, returning again on July 6.

When I first assumed command it was the custom, as well as the order, of Colonel Lester, then in command, to send out daily from the cavalry a patrol of 5 men on each of the seven pikes leading to and from the town, starting out in the morning and returning in the evening. This order was not changed while I was in command until the day before the occurrence. When you assumed command you ordered me to double the number of the patrols on the roads to Lebanon and McMinnville, which was done. When the patrols returned in the evening I received the report daily from each of the non-commissioned officers in charge, which, after committing to writing, I handed to Colonel Lester.

The attack was made at daybreak in the morning, and I first saw the enemy when charging on my camp, which was a short distance to the right of the Woodbury pike. I had not over 80 duty-men in camp at the time of the attack, most of whom were captured there. We then left my camp and joined the Ninth Michigan and surrendered with them at noon. I lost 5 killed and 20 wounded.

Before closing this report I would state that a report reached me about midnight that several men were seen in the night between our pickets and the town on the Bradyville pike. I immediately mounted 12 men and went to the points named, but after examining the fields and several houses and barns on the Bradyville and Woodbury pikes and discovering no signs of the enemy I returned with the men to camp, having reached it only a little more than an hour before the attack.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES J. SEIBERT,

Major, Seventh Pa. Cav., Comdg. Cav., Twenty-third Brigade.

General T. T. CRITTENDEN,

Commanding Forces at Murfreesborough, Tenn. :

No. 5.

Report of Capt. John M. Hewett, Battery B, Kentucky Light Artillery.

GENERAL: I have the honor of making the following report of the part taken by my command in the fight at Murfreesborough, Tenn., on July 13, 1862:

Before it was fairly daylight my camp was alarmed by rapid discharges of musketry in the direction of the Ninth Michigan camp and in town, distant $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. I immediately ordered my horses harnessed and hitched in, supposing that an immediate advance would be made on the town. I left my park with the guns of one section advanced and the other passed to the rear, my caissons in the center.

I rode to the color-line of the Third Minnesota Regiment, which was forming, and informed Colonel Lester that I was in motion. He ordered me to wait till he came up. On his joining us I asked in what order we would advance on the town. He said he would halt in the old field on our left and wait for orders. The firing was still brisk in town. Twenty minutes or half an hour later the enemy was seen on our left flank, 1,000 or 1,500 yards distant. I opened fire on them; they instantly dispersed. I then placed the other section on the turnpike (the extreme right), in charge of Lieut. [Alban A.] Ellsworth, who was in position but a few moments when the enemy were discovered advancing from the town in considerable force. A few rounds drove them for protection into the woods immediately in our front and half a mile distant from our line. We then briskly shelled the woods for a few minutes, driving them out. Nothing further was seen of the enemy for nearly an hour, when they were discovered in our rear and about the same time saw the smoke from our camp, which they had gained. I ordered the guns from one section to shell them out, which was done. In a few minutes after a charge was made on us by 200 or 300, which was repulsed, the enemy retiring into the woods in front of the line. We again shelled the woods briskly for several moments. An hour later they were discovered tearing up the railroad track, half or three-fourths of a mile below. They were shelled from this. The train from Nashville had before this passed up and stopped under our guns. We saw them but occasionally for the next five or six hours. They made no further demonstrations of attack. We remained during this time, say from 4.30 a. m. till 2 p. m., in an open field, front, rear, and both flanks open to cavalry. About 2 o'clock we were ordered to fall back 500 yards toward our camp and take position in front of a frame house. We remained here about an hour, when Colonel Lester, in answer to a flag of truce, went into town. Returning, he surrendered the entire command. Up to the moment of surrender the utmost confidence was evinced by the officers and men. My command bore themselves like men. I turned over, by order of Colonel Lester, three 6-pounder smooth-bore and one 10-pounder Parrott gun, with the general property of the company. Officers and men lost all their clothing, blankets, &c., in the burning of the tents.

Lost 1 killed, 3 wounded and 9 missing. Seventy men were surrendered, though but 51 were fit for duty.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. HEWETT,

Captain, Comdg. Hewett's Battery, Kentucky Vol. Artillery.

Report of Col. John C. Walker, Thirty-fifth Indiana Infantry.

SHELBYVILLE, TENN., July 13, 1862.

SIR: An engagement has been going on at Murfreesborough nearly all day between our troops at that place and the enemy under Colonel Starnes. I give you the reports as they come to me through messengers of Colonel Hambright, who is stationed at Wartrace. It seems from these reports that Colonel Starnes, with about 5,000 cavalry and two pieces of artillery, attacked Murfreesborough this morning. After two or three hours' fighting he succeeded in taking prisoners seven companies of the Ninth Michigan Regiment and the entire provost guard. It is said that General Crittenden, of Indiana, is also taken prisoner. Since this the First Kentucky Battery was engaged for several hours in shelling the rebels. The battery, I believe, is sustained by the Third Minnesota Regiment. Toward evening the enemy withdrew to the woods.

I cannot vouch for the details of this statement, but will add that the cannonading has been heard distinctly at this place during nearly the entire day. Colonel Matthews, Fifty-first Ohio, arrived at this place this evening and will await further orders. Under existing circumstances I have taken the responsibility of ordering my regiment to this place, for the purpose of co-operating, if necessary, with the other troops in this vicinity. In the course of a day or two I will have the regiment proceed to Elk River Bridge, unless orders are received directing me to do otherwise.

Trusting that my action in the premises will meet with your approbation, I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. WALKER,

Colonel Thirty-fifth Indiana.

Col. J. B. FRY, Chief of Staff, Huntsville, Ala.

No. 7.

Report of Col. William W. Duffield, Ninth Michigan Infantry.

MURFREESBOROUGH, TENN., July 23, 1862.

COLONEL: Although I had not yet formally assumed command of the Twenty-third Brigade, yet, as Brig. Gen. Thomas T. Crittenden and the other officers of the command have been captured and forwarded to Chattanooga, permit me to submit the following report of such portion of the attack made on the 13th instant as came under my own personal observation :

I arrived here, after an absence of two months, on the afternoon of the 11th instant, coming down on the same train with Brig. Gen. Thomas T. Crittenden, the newly appointed commander of the post, and found that several material changes had been made in the location and encampment of the Twenty-third Brigade since my departure. Instead of the whole command encamping together, as it had done, it was separated into two portions and several miles apart. The brigade had never been drilled as such nor a brigade guard mounted. Each regiment furnished its quota of officers and men and watched certain roads ; and, worse than all, the commanding officers of the respective regiments were on ill terms with each other, and this feeling, upon one occasion, had broken out into an open personal quarrel. The result was a great lack of discipline and a bitter feeling of jealousy between the different regiments, manifesting itself in the personal encounters of the men when they met upon the street. There was no order, no harmony. The parts of the machine did not fit well, and the commanding officers seem either not to have possessed the will or the ability to adjust them. General Crittenden and myself, immediately after our arrival, visited the several camps, discussed the impropriety of a divided command, and decided upon a concentration ; but as neither of us had assumed command we deferred it until the morrow. But on the morrow the blow fell, and the danger we anticipated became a reality. General Crittenden made his headquarters in town, while I preferred camping with my own men, and therefore pitched my tent with the five companies of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers.

The force then at Murfreesborough was as follows : Five companies (A, C, G, H, and K), Ninth Michigan Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel Parkhurst commanding, 200 strong, together with the First Squadron Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, Capt. Levi Chilson, 81 strong, were encamped three-fourths of a mile east of the town, upon the Liberty turnpike ; one company (B) Ninth Michigan Volunteers, Captain Rounds, 42 strong, occupied the court-house, the other companies of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers having been ordered to Tullahoma a month since, while nine companies of the Third Minnesota Volunteers, Colonel Lester (one company being on detached duty as train guard), 450 strong, and Hewett's First Kentucky battery, two sections, 72 strong, occupied the east bank of Stone River, at a distance of more than 3 miles from the encampment of the detachment of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers.

Orders were received from Nashville the evening of the 12th instant directing the First Squadron Fourth Kentucky Cavalry to proceed immediately to Lebanon. The total effective strength of the command at Murfreesborough on the morning of the 13th instant did not therefore exceed 814 men, including pickets.

The attack was made at daybreak on the morning of the 13th instant by the Second Cavalry Brigade, C. S. Army, Brig. Gen. N. B. Forrest, over 3,000 strong, consisting of one Texas regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Walker ; the First and Second Georgia Regiments, Colonels Lawton and Hood ; one Alabama regiment, Colonel Saunders, and one Tennessee regiment, Colonel Lawton[?]. The noise of so many hoofs at full speed upon the macadamized roads was so great that the alarm was given before the head of the column reached our pickets, about 1 mile distant, so that our men were formed and ready to receive them, although they came in at full speed. The Texas and a battalion of one of the Georgia regiments, in all over 800 strong, attacked the detachment of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers. So fierce and impetuous was their attack that our men were forced nearly to the center of the camp; but they fell back steadily and in order, with their faces to the foe. But upon reaching the center of the camp their line was brought to a halt, and after twenty minutes of nearly hand-to-hand fighting the enemy broke and fled in the wildest confusion, followed in close pursuit by one company as skirmishers. A squadron of cavalry at this time launched at their heels would have utterly routed and annihilated them. Indeed so great was their panic that their officers were unable to check the fugitives for a distance of 7 miles, and Colonel Wharton,[?] commanding the Georgia regiment, was subsequently arrested by General Forrest for misconduct under the fire of the enemy.

During this attack both officers and men, with one single exception, behaved very handsomely. There was no excitement, no hurry, and no confusion. Everything was done calmly, quietly, and in obedience to orders. But it is with the deepest shame and mortification that I am compelled to report that one officer of Michigan has been guilty of gross cowardice in the face of the enemy. Capt. John A. Tanner, of Company K, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, at the first alarm left his quarters, abandoned his company, and fled from his command under the enemy's fire, and I therefore inclose you herewith charges preferred against him for violation of the Fifty-second Article of War. Capt. Charles V. De Land, Company C, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, deserves special mention for cool and gallant conduct throughout the action and the fearless mode in which he led his company as skirmishers in pursuit of the enemy when repulsed. Also First Lieut. Hiram Barrows, of Company A, same regiment, for the tenacity with which he held his ground, although sorely pressed by the enemy. The loss of the detachment of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers has been very severe for the number engaged, amounting to 1 officer and 12 men killed and 3 officers and 75 men wounded. The enemy's loss has been much more severe than our own. More than double the number of their dead were buried with ours and their wounded are found in almost every house. Among their wounded are a colonel, a major, two adjutants, and one surgeon. I inclose you herewith the surgeon's report of the killed and wounded of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers.

Not having been present at the subsequent surrender of the detachment of the Ninth Michigan Volunteers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Parkhurst, I can only state the facts as reported to me, which show that this force, isolated and reduced by killed and wounded to less than 75 men, after having held their ground from 4 a. m. to 1 p. m., were compelled to surrender or be cut to pieces by the entire force of the enemy. I am reliably informed that Company B, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, under command of First Lieut. L. J. Wright, held the court-house against an incessant attack by a greatly superior force from 4 a. m. till 7.30 a. m., and did not surrender till the enemy had possession of the lower story of the building and had started a fire, with the evident intention of burning them out.

Of the surrender of the Third Minnesota Volunteers and Hewett's First Kentucky Artillery, under command of Colonel Lester, I cannot speak from personal knowledge nor have I received any information from sources sufficiently reliable to warrant my communicating to you any details. Indeed I would much prefer not to do so. The circumstances of the case, as reported, bear painfully on the honor of a brother officer now a prisoner of war, and who is therefore unable to defend himself.

I inclose a list of killed and wounded of the Third Minnesota Volunteers, furnished me by the assistant surgeon of that regiment, amounting to 2 killed and 8 wounded,* one of whom was killed and 2 wounded in line, the remainder in camp.

In the early part of this attack I received two gunshot wounds, one passing through the right testicle, the other through the left thigh. These, although very painful and bleeding profusely, did not prevent me from remaining with my own regiment until the attack was repulsed, when, fainting from pain and loss of blood, I was carried from the field, and was therefore not a witness of what subsequently occurred. At noon the same day I was made prisoner by General Forrest, but, in my then helpless condition, was released upon my parole not to bear arms against the Confederate States until regularly exchanged.

I remain, colonel, your obedient servant,

WM. W. DUFFIELD,

Colonel Ninth Michigan Infantry, Comd'g. Twenty-third Brigade.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1862.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General. It is gratifying to discover anything to mitigate the mortification of the affair at Murfreesborough. This report seems to do so as far as Colonel Duffield is concerned, but does not alter the general features of the affair.

D. C. BUELL,

Major-General.

I respectfully recommend that Capt. John A. Tanner, Company K, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, be dismissed from the service for cowardly abandoning his company at the battle of Murfreesborough.

No. 8.

Report of Lieut. Col. John G. Parkhurst, Ninth Michigan Infantry.

LIEUTENANT: I have the honor to make the following report of the battle of Murfreesborough, Tenn., on July 13, 1862. Before giving the particulars of the battle I beg leave to report the strength and condition of the Ninth Regiment Michigan Infantry at the time of the attack:

This regiment, with the Third Regiment of Minnesota Infantry, Hewett's Kentucky battery, and a portion of the Seventh Pennsylvania

*Nominal list omitted.

Cavalry, had been encamped in one encampment, in the city of Murfreesborough, for some months, under the command of Colonel Duffield, when, on May 9, he was assigned to command of the troops of Kentucky, and Colonel Lester, of the Third Minnesota, assumed command of the forces at Murfreesborough.

On June 26 the force at Murfreesborough was divided and its strength greatly reduced by the Third Minnesota Regiment and Hewett's battery being sent $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of the city of Murfreesborough, on the Nashville pike, leaving the Ninth Michigan and a squadron of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry occupying the old camping ground, and the only troops in the city.

On June 30, agreeably to an order received from Colonel Lester, this force was further reduced, and Companies D, E, F, and I, of the Ninth Michigan, were sent to Tullahoma. Company B, Capt. [Oliver C.] Rounds, of the Ninth Michigan, was occupying the court-house, situated three-fourths of a mile from camp, and acting as provost guard for the city, leaving only five companies of my regiment in camp. From these companies heavy details for picket and other duties were constantly made, so that the force in camp was about 250 strong.

The weakness of my camp and the divided condition of the forces at Murfreesborough were observed by General Crittenden upon his arrival and viewing of the camp on the 12th, and the danger to be apprehended in consequence of such division was remarked upon by both General Crittenden and Colonel Duffield, who returned to Murfreesborough in company with General Crittenden, and it was by them determined to reunite the forces at once.

At 4 o'clock on the morning of the 13th I was aroused by the sentinel at my tent and informed that the enemy was advancing upon the camp. I at once turned out and gave the alarm in camp. The companies in camp turned out with alacrity, but before they had time to form square the enemy, mounted and some 1,200 strong, with terrific yells, dashed upon us from three directions, armed with double-barreled shot-guns and Colt's navy revolvers. Some of my men gave way under this charge, but the majority of them stood firm and returned the first fire with great precision and fatal effect. After discharging their pieces the enemy retired and dismounted a part of his force and advanced upon us mounted and on foot. I rallied my force, and, although the effect of the fire of the enemy was terribly severe, my officers and men stood their ground with heroic courage and poured a destructive fire into the enemy's ranks until he began to yield. Seeing this, I took advantage of it and ordered my force to advance and charge upon him. In obedience to this order my men, with a yell equal to that of the Texans, made a charge, driving the enemy before them until he was completely routed from my camp and driven out of and beyond reach of the camp of the Pennsylvania cavalry and brigade headquarters. I immediately ordered Company C, Capt. [Charles V.] De Land, to advance in pursuit, as skirmishers, as far as the second street in our front, which he did in good style, doing good execution and holding the line I had indicated to him and driving the enemy still farther in retreat.

Finding an opportunity I immediately occupied my time in preparing for another attack, and marched my force into a garden in front of camp, which was inclosed by a cedar-post fence, and made use of such forage as I had in camp to barricade Maney avenue, which led to our right, and made use of the transportation wagons for a protection on our left, thus securing quite a formidable position. After having secured this position and learning that Colonel Lester had not advanced upon the enemy I dispatched a courier to Colonel Lester, informing him of the fight and of the superior force of the enemy and that Colonel Duffield was wounded and had left the field and that my loss had been very heavy, but that we were then in a good position and could make a successful defense if we could be re-enforced, and asked him to send re-enforcements.

The enemy kept up a series of attacks and feints and he was as often repulsed.

Not hearing from the courier, I dispatched a second courier with similar information as to our position and urged Colonel Lester to advance to our relief, informing him that we were receiving frequent attacks from a vastly superior force, but that we could hold out if he would re-enforce us. After some four hours' time I received information that my couriers had been arrested by order of Colonel Lester as spies and that a courier from Colonel Lester had come over to ascertain our position. About 9.30 o'clock I sent by the courier who came from Colonel Lester a written statement of our position and requesting re-enforcements at once, knowing that if Colonel Lester would join us with his force we could drive the enemy from the city or capture his command.

I received no reply from this dispatch nor from any that I sent to Colonel Lester, though he has since informed me that my couriers as well as my dispatch through his own courier reached him and that his courier had no trouble in returning to his camp. I leave Colonel Lester to account in his report or otherwise for his neglecting my repeated calls upon him for re-enforcements.

The forces attacking my camp were the First Regiment Texas Rangers, Colonel Wharton, and a battalion of the First Georgia Rangers, Colonel Morrison, and a large number of citizens of Rutherford County, many of whom had recently taken the oath of allegiance to the United States Government. There were also quite a number of negroes attached to the Texas and Georgia troops, who were armed and equipped, and took part in the several engagements with my forces during the day.

Simultaneously with the attack upon my camp Company B, Captain Rounds, was attacked at their quarters in the court-house by a large force of Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky cavalry. This company fought nobly and held their position for two and a half hours, killing and wounding a large number of the enemy's forces, and until the enemy set fire to the lower part of the court-house, when they were compelled to surrender.

We maintained our position, despite the frequent attacks and desperate efforts of the enemy to destroy us, until 11.30 o'clock, when a flag of truce was sent to us, with a demand for a surrender, of which the following is a true copy, viz:

MURFREESBOROUGH, July 13, 1862.

COLONEL: I must demand an unconditional surrender of your force as prisoners of war or I will have every man put to the sword. You are aware of the overpowering force I have at my command, and this demand is made to prevent the effusion of blood.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. B. FORREST,
Brigadier-General of Cavalry, C. S. Army.

Col. J. G. PARKHURST.

This communication I forwarded to Colonel Duffield, who had been wounded in the first charge and removed from the field, asking for his order or advice in relation thereto. Colonel Duffield returned the communication with a message that he should leave the matter entirely to my discretion. Meantime I had ascertained that General Forrest had concentrated his entire force, save one squadron, which he had stationed on the Nashville pike, near the camp of the Minnesota regiment, in the immediate vicinity of my camp, hemming us in on all sides, and was preparing to make a charge upon us with his entire command, having surrounded us, and evidently intending, with this overwhelming force, to execute the threat contained in his demand for a surrender. Seeing our position, and concluding that I had nothing to hope for from Colonel Lester, having vainly looked for aid from him for seven hours, and ascertaining from actual count that I had but 134 men, including a few of Major Seibert's Pennsylvania cavalry, who had retreated to our lines, I called a meeting of my officers to consider the demand for a surrender. The officers of the regiment, after considering our position, deemed it rashness to attempt to withstand the forces now brought against us, numbering over 1,800, and unanimously voted to surrender, and at 12 o'clock, eight hours after the commencement of the battle, I surrendered my command as prisoners of war.

My loss in the battle was as follows: Of the five companies in camp, killed, 11; wounded, 86; missing, 36; total, 133. Of Company B, at the court-house, wounded, 3; missing, 1; total, 4. Making a total loss of 137. I append hereto a correct list of the killed, wounded, and missing.*

In the engagement I received a shot below the knee of my left leg, but no injury resulted from it.

The loss of the enemy was very much greater than mine. Among their killed is Colonel Anderson, of one of the Georgia regiments, and among their wounded is Colonel Wharton, of the Texas Rangers. A large portion of their officers were either killed or wounded.

I cannot speak in too high terms of the conduct of my officers and men, who, with only one exception, behaved nobly, fought like heroes, and conducted themselves like veteran soldiers; and where all behaved so well it would be invidious to attempt to discriminate. The exception I feel it my duty to mention. Capt. John A. Tanner, of Company K, at the first fire of the enemy retreated to the woods. This conduct needs no comment. Justice will overtake him.

Subsequent to the surrender my command, including many of the wounded and sick from the hospital, were marched to McMinnville, some 40 miles from Murfreesborough, where the non-commissioned officers and privates were paroled. The commissioned officers were marched to Knoxville, Tenn., and sent thence to Madison, Ga., where we were confined in an old filthy cotton factory, which was alive with vermin, and we were there compelled to provide ourselves with food, which was furnished, through the guard at the rate of $2 per diem per man.

I beg leave to further report that, though assured that our private property would not be taken, everything not worn upon our backs was taken from us. Our trunks, which we were assured we could take with us, were broken open and the contents stolen or appropriated by greedy rebels.

While on the march to Knoxville I was ordered to dismount and surrender my horse, which General Forrest instantly appropriated. Other officers were deprived of their horses.

* The nominal list omitted.

I remain, lieutenant, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. G. PARKHURST,

No. 9.

Report of Col. Henry C. Lester, Third Minnesota Infantry.

LIEUTENANT: I have the honor to report the share taken by my regiment in the action at Murfreesborough, Tenn., on Sunday, July 13, 1862.

The attack was made about daylight upon the camp of the Ninth Michigan, the pickets having been captured without firing a shot. With the first alarm my regiment was formed in line and marched from camp toward town, for the purpose of effecting a junction with the other troops, the camping ground of the two regiments having been necessarily separated about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in consequence of scarcity of water. We had proceeded nearly half a mile when the enemy appeared in force in the woods in our front, and also upon our left flank. Line of battle was at once formed upon the crest of a hill and we opened upon the enemy with shell. The firing was principally directed to the woods in front, where they were evidently forming for a charge. In the mean time a small force had made its way through a corn field on our left and attacked our camp, which, after a sharp skirmish with the camp guard they took, killing or capturing the guard and firing the tents. Some time was passed in shelling the woods, when a train arrived from Nashville, and was only stopped when it had reached a point opposite our position and distant from it about 100 yards. As soon as the enemy had seen the train pass they commenced to tear up the track between it and Nashville, and were repeatedly driven off by the artillery. A charge was made upon our left from the woods, but was easily repulsed, with some loss to the enemy. At this time a scout returned from the camp of the Ninth Michigan, reporting the enemy in strong force on the Lebanon road between the Michigan regiment and our position; and as the force in front seemed to be still too strong to attempt to push through with any prospect of success I determined to maintain my own position for the present. The firing in town having ceased for some time I sent a scout through the corn field to try and get news from our friends, but the effort was unsuccessful, the enemy being still in strong force on the Lebanon road. Shortly after a soldier of the Ninth Michigan came through and reported his regiment as having surrendered. Thereupon we fell back to a farm-house a short distance in our rear, which being surrounded by a fence I expected to make as strong as possible and to hold until the end.

While taking up our new position a flag of truce appeared, borne by yourself, and sent at the request of Colonel Duffield, commanding Twenty-third Brigade, for the purpose of procuring an interview with me. I returned to town with the flag and had an interview with the colonel commanding, in which I learned that we were attacked by the rebel General Forrest with a brigade of cavalry. Learning from the colonel that the enemy were in overwhelming force, and that even should the road be uninjured the forces at Nashville were absent upon an expedition and that there was no hope of re-enforcements, at his suggestion I agreed to refer the matter of surrender to my officers. Accordingly the matter was represented to them as derived from Colonel Duffield, and the great majority, looking upon further resistance as involving the certainty of an ultimate defeat with great loss, and with no possibility of an escape or assistance, it was decided to surrender, which was done at 3.30 p. m.

The force surrendered by me consisted of about 450 infantry. The enemy's force consisted of about 2,600 troops, together with some hundreds of citizens of the country between McMinnville and Murfreesborough, being in all about 3,000 men.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

H. C. LESTER,

Colonel, Commanding Third Minnesota.

Lieut. H. M. DUFFIELD,

Acting Assistant Adjutant-General, Twenty-third Brigade.

No. 10.

Report of Col. John F. Miller, Twenty-ninth Indiana Infantry, commanding at Nashville.

NASHVILLE, July 19, 1862—12 p. m.

GENERAL: Statements of prisoners and others establish these facts: Complete surprise of the Ninth Michigan and cavalry at about 4 a. m. Enemy attacked Michigan camp and provost guard in town simultaneously, approaching in two directions between roads; no grand guard; pickets only in roads; Michigan troops in discord; men killed in tents attempting to form square; Colonel Duffield wounded; failed to form, and surrendered. Provost guards in court-house did most fighting, holding enemy at bay perhaps an hour, killing 10 rebels; surrendered; part cavalry attempted to join Michigan regiment; did little fighting; surrendered.

Third Minnesota, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in rear, formed on alarm; had Hewett's battery; left their camp and reserve ammunition; marched short distance, halted, took position, waited for attack; enemy, some in front and flank. At 7 a. m. burned camp, charged on battery; were repulsed with slight loss; made several weak attempts to charge. Infantry hovered about in woods; but little firing by infantry. Enemy showed signs of intention to retreat; burned depot supplies; surrender demanded; men anxious to continue fight; colonel and six captains anxious to surrender. Infantry had plenty ammunition; battery short, but had 64 rounds left; surrendered at about 3 p. m.; loss, 2 killed, 5 wounded in Michigan. Colonel Lester reported as having been stupid with fear, some complain, cowardly; strength of enemy, five regiments; average estimate, 1,800. Marched the prisoners 7 miles beyond McMinnville. Whole force left for Chattanooga, moving rapidly.

Jealousy of officers, causing separation of troops beyond supporting distance in sudden emergency. Bad picketing, lack of skill, vigilance, and personal courage on part of officers caused the disaster according to testimony.

Loss of Ninth Michigan, 14 killed and 63 wounded.

Respectfully,

JNO. F. MILLER,
Colonel, Commanding Post.

Report of Maj. Gen. J. P. McCown, C. S. Army.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 17, 1862.

Colonel Forrest dispatches me as follows:

Attacked Murfreesborough 5 a. m. last Sunday morning; captured two brigadier-generals, staff and field officers, and 1,200 men; burnt $200,000 worth of stores; captured sufficient stores with those burned to amount to $500,000, and brigade of 60 wagons, 300 mules, 150 or 200 horses, and field battery of four pieces; destroyed the railroad and depot at Murfreesborough. Had to retreat to McMinnville, owing to large number of prisoners to be guarded. Our loss 16 or 18 killed; 25 or 30 wounded. Enemy's loss 200 or 300.

Leaves to-day for re-enforcements coming from Kingston.

Report of Brig. Gen. N. B. Forrest, C. S. Army, commanding Cavalry Brigade.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF EAST TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, Tenn., July 22, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to forward the report of an engagement of our forces under the command of Col. N. B. Forrest and the enemy at Murfreesborough, Tenn., the 13th instant. A portion of the captured property has been brought in and turned over to the department. Colonel Forrest is now on his way to Columbia, Tenn., purposing the destruction of the railroad and bridges between Nashville and that place.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. KIRBY SMITH,
Major-General, Commanding.

General S. COOPER, Adj. and Insp. Gen., Richmond, Va.

— — —, 1862.

SIR: We left Chattanooga on July 9 with the Texan Rangers, under Colonel Wharton, and the Second Georgia Cavalry, under Colonel Lawton. We made a forced march of nearly 50 miles, reaching Altamont on the night of the 10th instant. After resting one night we passed on to McMinnville, where I was joined on the night of the 11th by Colonel Morrison with a portion of the First Georgia Cavalry, two companies of Colonel Spiller's battalion, under Major Smith, and two companies of Kentuckians, under Captains Taylor and Waltham. After this junction my whole force was about 1,400 men, and both men and horses were much jaded and worn by their long travel. After feeding and refreshing for a single day and being joined by some few volunteers I left on the 12th at 1 o'clock for Murfreesborough. It was over 50 miles to our destination, but there was no halt except for a short time to feed the men and horses.

We approached Murfreesborough about 4.30 a. m. and fortunately captured the pickets of the enemy without firing a gun. I then learned that there were two regiments in and near Murfreesborough, one the Ninth Michigan and the other the Third Minnesota, 200 Pennsylvania cavalry, 100 of the Eighth Kentucky, and Captain Hewett's battery of four guns, numbering in all 1,400 or 1,500 men, under the command of General Thomas Crittenden, of Indiana. There were said to be two camps, one in Murfreesborough of one infantry regiment and the cavalry, the other with the artillery about a mile distant, and a small force with the officers in the court-house and private houses around the public square. I decided immediately to attack the camp in town and the buildings, while the camp with the artillery should be held in check until the first was stormed and surrendered. Colonel Wharton with his Texan Rangers was ordered to charge the camp in town. He moved forward in gallant style at the head of his men, but owing to the urgent necessity of using a portion of the Rangers for the attack on the buildings he did not carry with him but two of his companies. This fact, however, did not abate his courage or that of his men. They charged over the tent ropes right into the camp. Colonel Wharton was soon severely wounded and the command of his Rangers devolved on Colonel Walker.

Colonel Morrison with a portion of the Second Georgia was ordered to storm the court-house while the balance of the Texan Rangers were attacking the private buildings. After two or three hours' hard struggle the court-house was fired and surrendered to Colonel Morrison. The private buildings were also cleared by the Rangers and General Crittenden and his staff surrendered.

Lieut. Col. [Arthur] Hood, of the Second Georgia, with a portion of his force was ordered to storm the jail, which he did, releasing many prisoners confined for political offenses; he also took the telegraph office, capturing the operator.

Colonel Lawton, with the First Georgia, the Tennessees and Kentuckians, was ordered to attack the second camp with the artillery, which he did with great efficiency for several hours. The Tennessees, under Major Smith, and Kentuckians, under Captains Taylor and Waltham, stood the fire of shot and shell like veterans. The Georgians, under Captain Dunlop and Major Harper, made a gallant charge almost to the mouths of the cannon. After fighting them in front two or three hours I took immediate command of this force and charged the rear of the enemy into their camps and burned their camps and stores, demoralizing their force and weakening their strength.

The force of Texan Rangers sent to attack the first camp was so small that, although they fought with desperate courage and great skill, they were gradually driven back.

After the court-house and private buildings were surrendered and the fight had lasted five or six hours I prepared my whole force to storm both camps and summoned them to surrender. After some parley Colonel Duffield surrendered the infantry and artillery.

My aide, Colonel Saunders, rendered me efficient aid until he was severely wounded by a ball from the court-house. Major Strange, my adjutant, also performed his whole duty. Lieutenant-Colonel Walker and Major Harrison, of the Rangers, acted with their usual daring and bravery. All the officers and men who acted bravely cannot be particularly mentioned, but they acted their part nobly.

After the action was over I detached Major Smith to burn a railroad bridge below Murfreesborough, which he executed well. I intended to burn a railroad bridge above Murfreesborough and gave orders for the purpose, but by mistake they were not executed. I had the telegraph wire cut and a large portion of the railroad track torn up. I found four car-loads of provisions on the railroad track and the depot house full of stores, all of which I burned.

There were between 1,100 and 1,200 privates and non-commissioned officers captured and brought to McMinnville and paroled on condition not to serve until exchanged. The officers have been already sent to Knoxville, in charge of Colonel Wharton (and I trust have safely reached their destination), except one or two who were wounded and left at Murfreesborough, on condition to surrender when restored to health.

I captured four pieces of artillery—three brass pieces and one Parrott gun—which are still in my possession, with harness and ammunition. There were some 50 or 60 large road wagons with the mule teams, harness, &c., captured. I burnt some of the wagons, which could not be got away, and sent you the balance. There were a large number of cavalry horses, saddles, and small-arms, with the ammunition, captured, and such as I have not been compelled to use are also forwarded to you.

In consequence of our being compelled to leave Murfreesborough, and not having received reports of the killed from some of my command, it is impossible to report accurately my loss. My best information is that we had about 25 killed and from 40 to 60 wounded. Among those killed is Lieutenant Green, of the Tennessee Battalion. The reports of the officers under my command when furnished will show more definitely the loss.

The enemy lost about 75 killed and 125 wounded. The pecuniary loss to the enemy must be near half a million of dollars.

Yours, respectfully,

N. B. FORREST,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Brigade of Cavalry.

GENERAL: It is proper that I communicate to you the fact that our cavalry at Wallace's Cross-Roads (four companies), under the command of Captain Mims (Colonel McLin's Second Tennessee Cavalry), was surprised by the enemy at 11 o'clock this morning. Captain Mims reports from Mynatt's Cross-Roads that no scouts had been ordered out to-day, and when his pickets were driven in he advanced to meet, as he supposed, a small force, when he discovered two full regiments advancing upon his flank. He retreated with the loss of about 20 men (captured, killed, and wounded), all his baggage, &c. It is not stated in the report whether the enemy's force consisted of cavalry or infantry, but four fugitives of the command affirm that they saw infantry only. Captain Mims sent information of the surprise to Colonel McLin at Maynardville. I have no information from what quarter the enemy came.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 18, 1862.

The rebels have taken possession of Henderson, Ky., on the Ohio, below Evansville. They have also crossed the river and taken Newburg, Ind.; killed one of our men and taken 250 of our sick in hospital prisoners. They took 250 arms and destroyed the hospital stores. A boat has left Evansville with arms. I will send an extra train with artillery, arms, and infantry immediately.

O. P. MORTON.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 19, 1862.

Yesterday the rebels passed the Ohio River and seized Newburg, in Indiana, capturing a hospital with 80 sick and wounded soldiers. Indiana has a river border of 300 miles exposed to raids from Kentucky. A regiment of cavalry stationed in detachments and a gunboat would furnish great security. Arms for the State Legion are greatly needed.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 21, 1862.

The rebels under Johnson remained at Newburg, in our State, long enough to steal and destroy all the hospital stores, parole the sick and wounded soldiers, steal a few horses and wagons, then recross to Kentucky. The boys in hospital were armed and wanted to fight, but the surgeon ordered them to lay down their arms. Governor Morton has ordered the arrest of the surgeon. Two citizens of our State, who brought the rebels over and remained after they left, were killed by our citizens. We have sent a sufficient force to Henderson, under General Love, of our State Militia, to clean out Henderson, Webster, Davis, and Union Counties, at the request of General Boyle. Governor Morton has gone with him.

Report of Brig. Gen. William K. Strong, U. S. Army, commanding District of Cairo.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF CAIRO,
Cairo, Ill., July 19, 1862.

SIR: I have received telegraph this morning from General Boyle, dated Louisville, 18th, saying:

Henderson is taken by rebels. Governor Morton telegraphs Newburg, Ind., taken and 200 stand of arms. Can you send force to Henderson? Order gunboat up the river.

Also telegraph this morning from commander of post Evansville confirming above, and adds—

Also rebels have taken possession of the hospitals and have fired into passing steamer.

There is no gunboat here to send nor any force to spare. I have seen Captain Wise, of the Navy, and he has ordered the receiving boat Clara Dolson fired up. There are some 150 sailors on board that he can arm and he will put on some half dozen navy howitzers and ammunition, with arms for the men, and I shall put on board 200 infantry, well armed, with six days' rations. There will also go a small tug in company, with a howitzer or two. This is all we can do here.

I dispatch my aide, Lieutenant-Colonel Holt, with this, to suggest to you the importance of your doing all you can in the emergency to drive back or capture these marauding rebels. You have plenty of transportation. Now, if you can, spare for a few days two or three companies of cavalry, a battery of artillery, and three or four companies of infantry, well armed and rationed for five or six days and proceed at once to the points captured. If you could not spare all indicated above spare all you can, and if you cannot go yourself send Colonel Duff or some other brave officer and have those marauders wiped out in quick-time. I hope you will agree with me as to the propriety of prompt action. There is no communication to-day by telegraph to Saint Louis, therefore all we can do in the emergency is to act upon our own judgment. I have contributed all I could to the expedition and hope you will do the same on your part promptly.

I inclose you copies of telegrams received by me.

REPORTS.

No. 1.—Brig. Gen. William Nelson, U. S. Army, commanding at Murfreesborough.

No. 2.—Col. John F. Miller, Twenty-ninth Indiana, commanding at Nashville.

No. 3.—Brig. Gen. Nathan B. Forrest, C. S. Army, including operations July 18–24.

No. 1.

Report of Brig. Gen. William Nelson, U. S. Army, commanding at Murfreesborough.

HEADQUARTERS,
Murfreesborough, Tenn., July 24, 1862.

GENERAL: You will have heard that on the 21st instant Forrest went down the Lebanon road to within 5 miles of Nashville and burned a bridge and some trestle work. When this occurred I had only the cavalry companies I picked up at Nashville, Haggard having joined after the damage was done. I determined at once to cut off Forrest's retreat, and gave orders for the cavalry to march to Readyville (see inclosed paper*), and thence to Statesville, and close up to Milton, and I would march with infantry to the point where the Jefferson pike crosses the road from here to Lebanon, 2 miles beyond Stone River, it being my impression that Forrest, having gone by way of Lebanon, would return this way. Twenty minutes before marching a courier came to me from Franklin, bringing a dispatch that Forrest, with 2,500 or 3,000 men, was at Nashville. All sorts of reports came by the courier. I immediately, to save the stores at Nashville, changed the order and sent Haggard with all the cavalry to move rapidly to Nashville and attack the enemy wherever he could find them, telling Colonel Haggard that he would find the enemy scattered, marauding, and having his own men in hand all he had to do was to attack and destroy them as fast as he came to them. I immediately followed with the infantry, and at 10 p. m. was in 10 miles of Nashville. Colonel Haggard sent me several messages with various accounts of the supposed strength of the enemy in front. I answered him in writing to attack—to attack all the time.

* Not found.

When I arrived at the junction of the Old Franklin road, at 10 p. m., I found him and all the cavalry there awaiting my arrival. He had been there five or six hours. The enemy were so strongly posted, &c., that he had determined to wait for me and report, having held a council of war and all that sort of nonsense. In an hour's examination I was satisfied that there was not only no enemy, but that they had retreated over the identical road that I had expected they would. Being so sure that he would go that way in any event, I sent messengers back to Colonel Barnes at Murfreesborough for him to take the regiment remaining there and abandon everything there and move up that road; but, alas! he got there just after Forrest had gone by.

By the telegram sent me by Colonel Miller, indicating that Nashville was in danger, Forrest escaped; the 80 men that were guarding the bridge that was burned are lost, 3 of them killed, the rest taken. They were of the Second Kentucky. That regiment is much reduced since leaving Athens; 3 were killed and 48 wounded on the railroad; now 3 are killed and 81 taken, making a loss of 6 killed and 129 lost by death and prisoners.

Forrest was last heard of near Liberty. I have ordered a battalion of Wolford's cavalry to come here by way Shelbyville; a battalion of Board's by way of Versailles. When they do come I will have about 1,200 cavalry, and Mr. Forrest shall have no rest. I will hunt him myself. Where, O tell me, where is General Jackson? It's a chance for him.

I have called in 500 negro laborers from the country to build the field work indicated. When it is finished it will relieve the men here, and I can take the field with the whole force, and I will clear out the country if it can be done. I have stationed three regiments at the crossing of the Jefferson and Lebanon pikes, and will move on McMinnville from that point instead of from here.

Your order has been received to forward 100,000 rations to Stevenson, and I am using all energy to carry it into execution. I will be able to-morrow to send a train to within 5 miles of Nashville, when I will load it and send it along.

If you will send me the rest of my division I will settle the rest of this country in no time. The troops I find here are without discipline, and your orders in relation to marauding, stealing, and rascality generally are dead letters as far as many of them are concerned.

By the burning of the bridges provisions are scarce, and a train I have not, but will go ahead. I inclose some papers. Reports are constant that a large force is coming in at this point. Every man in this country yesterday, so soon as the troops changed direction, started, and I heard of several parties hurrying to Forrest to carry him the news.

I must tell you something that has transpired since you left here. The hostility to the United States Government and the troops has increased 1,000 per cent. It seems settled into a fierce hatred to Governor Johnson, to him personally more than officially, for in questioning many people they cannot point to an act that he has not been warranted in doing by their own showing; but still, either in manner of doing it, or that it should be done by him, or from some undefinable course touching him their resentment is fierce and vindictive, and this country, from being neutral at least, as you left it, is now hostile and in arms, and what makes it bad for us it is in our rear. The continual rumor of a large body of infantry coming into this country tends to make the discontented bold and active. Wherever Forrest stopped he found prepared (notice no doubt having been given) food and forage in ample quantities. Every man is an active spy, and guerrillas are now aiding him.

I send this letter by Messrs. William Spence and William Elliott, two good and true Union men, whom I beg to recommend to your favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

W. NELSON,
Brigadier-General.

PROCLAMATION.

HEADQUARTERS FOURTH DIVISION,
Murfreesborough, Tenn., July 18, 1862.

Information has been received at these headquarters that arms and other property belonging to the United States, captured with the troops last Sunday, were distributed yesterday to the disloyal citizens of this town. All persons having such arms or property in their possession will bring them immediately to the court-house and turn them over to the provost-marshal there. Those failing to do so will be arrested and sent to a military prison on the charge of treason.

By order of Brigadier-General Nelson, commanding.

J. MILLS KENDRICK,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

SPECIAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. FOURTH DIV. ARMY OF THE OHIO,

Report of Col. John F. Miller, Twenty-ninth Indiana Infantry, commanding at Nashville.

HEADQUARTERS, Nashville, July 22, 1862.

General Forrest, with forces variously reported from 1,200 to 4,000 strong, advanced yesterday on Lebanon pike within 8 miles of city, then marched across to Mill Creek Bridge, 7 miles out on Chattanooga Railroad; destroyed three bridges, taking 80 prisoners Second Kentucky Volunteers, killing 2; 1 wounded. Rebel loss reported, 20 killed and wounded. Took prisoners on Murfreesborough road 12 miles from this place, camped, paroled the prisoners this morning, and marched at daylight toward Murfreesborough to capture wagon train with 360 of Thirty-sixth Indiana, who left here yesterday morning for Murfreesborough, and supposed to have been 12 miles this side of Murfreesborough this morning.

The enemy menaced this place yesterday evening; drove in our pickets; captured 3 of our scouts. They are divided into parties and endeavored to draw out my forces after them. I held and will hold my forces under arms in city. I have no cavalry to pursue, but will hold the city. I telegraphed to Franklin last night and this morning to send couriers to Murfreesborough with all information. The paroled men have just arrived.

HEADQUARTERS SECOND CAVALRY BRIGADE,
McMinnville, Tenn., July 24, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that on Friday, the 18th, at noon I left my camp on Mountain Creek, 10 miles from this place, with about 700 effective men of this brigade, in the direction of Nashville, for the purpose of making a reconnaissance. On my arrival at Alexandria with a portion of my command (the Texas Rangers) I was advised that during the day some 700 Federal cavalry had been sent from Nashville to Lebanon. I immediately ordered forward the balance of my command, being portions of the First and Second Georgia Cavalry and the Tennessee and Kentucky squadrons, and by a forced march reached Lebanon soon after sunrise. We dashed into the city in fine style, but found that the enemy, having notice of my approach, had retired about 12 o'clock, leaving me in the undisturbed possession of that place. I found the entire population true and loyal, with perhaps a single exception.

I remained at Lebanon until Monday morning, and moved then with my command toward Nashville. On reaching the vicinity of Nashville, say 5 or 6 miles, I captured 3 of the enemy's pickets. I moved then around the city, semicircling it and the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, passing within 3 miles of the city, and capturing on the way 2 additional pickets. I moved on the road for the purpose of destroying the bridges on the railroad near the city, and to my entire satisfaction accomplished the purpose, destroying three important railroad bridges over Mill Creek and cutting the telegraph wires. At each bridge I found heavy pickets, and had some considerable skirmishing at each, and also at Antioch Depot.

In the several skirmishes there were 10 killed and some 15 or 20 wounded, 97 prisoners (94 privates and 3 lieutenants), besides destroying a considerable amount of stores at Antioch Depot. Our forces were reported to be four times their number, so I afterward learned.

The necessity of rapid marching to secure the end desired having exhausted to a very considerable extent both men and horses, I found it necessary to fall back to this point, with a view of recruiting, which I did in good order, having the satisfaction to report that I did not lose a single man on the expedition, either in killed or wounded. I regret the limited time allowed me in which to make this report will not permit me to enter minutely into the details of this exploit. I hope it will fully meet the approbation and expectation of the general.

Permit me to add that the entire force, officers and men, under my command acquitted themselves with great credit, and bore the fatigue and risk of the expedition in a manner only to be borne by Confederate troops. My demonstration on Nashville, I am advised, created great excitement in that city, by which the greater portion of the force at Murfreesborough was ordered to that point. I regretted then, and now sincerely regret, that the limited force I had with me, which was all that I had which was available, did not permit me to make a more solid demonstration against that city. They were evidently frightened. A few thousand would then have placed that city in our possession.

On my return I sent a flag of truce to Murfreesborough and found the troops at that city in great confusion and evident fright. They are attempting to fortify the place and have partially blockaded the road between that city and this. I am credibly informed that the same state of confusion and terror pervaded their entire army at Wartrace and all other points within my reach. I regret that my force will not permit me to avail myself of this terror.

The officers and men of my entire command, flushed with victory and our past success, are anxious and ready to meet the enemy. I feel secure in my present position. Should events render this an insecure place I will fall back to a less exposed point.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. B. FORREST,

Brigadier-General, Second Cavalry Brigade.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., July 26, 1862.

(Received July 27, 10.10 p. m.)

On yesterday the enemy's cavalry attacked the guards at several points on the road between Decatur and Tuscumbia; captured the one at Courtland; drove others into Decatur, and probably destroyed the bridge. These disgraceful and serious results are due to the neglect and disobedience of my repeated orders in regard to construction of stockades, and I shall bring every offender to trial. I am trying to make our lives secure against such occurrences, for they are fraught with the most serious consequences to an army operating on such long lines. I have requested General Grant to open the road again, for it is important to both of us.

D. C. BUELL.

Major-General HALLECK.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,
No. 37. } In Camp, Huntsville, Ala., August 1, 1862.

The major-general commanding has to announce other instances of disgraceful neglect and contrast them with another of gallantry:

The guard at Courtland Bridge—consisting of Companies A and H, Tenth Kentucky, under the command of Captain Davidson, and a part of Captain Eggleston's company, First Ohio Cavalry—was completely surprised and captured with but trifling loss on the morning of the 25th ultimo by a force of irregular cavalry. On the same day the companies of Captains Boyl and Goben, Tenth Indiana, which were ordered to protect two bridges on the same road, respectively 6 and 12 miles east of Courtland, deemed it wiser to bring in an empty train which came up than to defend their posts, threatened with an attack from the same irregular cavalry, and so put themselves on the train and arrived safely at Decatur, a few miles distant, without the loss or injury of a man. On the same day and on the same road, 8 miles from Decatur, a guard, consisting of 24 men, of Company E, Thirty-first Ohio, under the command of Lieutenant Harman, were suddenly attacked by a greatly superior force of the same cavalry. They defended themselves gallantly, however, and repulsed the enemy, killing several of the number. Lieutenant Harman and 11 of his men were wounded, himself in two places, and 2 of his men were killed.

The general submits these examples to the reflection of the troops. He reminds them that neglect and bad conduct on the part of guards bring dishonor upon them and may even jeopardize the safety of an army. If these appeals to their personal and professional pride should fail of their object, he warns them that the extreme penalty of the law must intervene to punish the guilty and save the army from the jeopardy in which they place it. The duty of guarding the communications of the army is among the most important with which an officer and his troops can be intrusted. Vigilance, determination, and the preparation of suitable defenses in the way of intrenchments or stockades will prevent such attacks or enable a small force to repel a greatly superior one. Had the orders for bridge guards to fortify their posts been promptly executed and proper vigilance been observed the attacks referred to, if made at all, would have had very different results.

This order and General Orders, No. 32, will be read at the head of every company and detachment.

By command of Major-General Buell:

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

No. 2.

Report of Capt. James H. Boyd, Tenth Indiana Infantry.

CAMP, NEAR DECHERD, TENN.,

August 9, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 25th ultimo I learned by the conductor of the train running from Decatur to Tusculumbia, Ala., and which had left the former place that morning, that the Federal forces at Courtland, commanded by Capt. [Henry G.] Davidson, Tenth Kentucky Volunteers, had been attacked by a superior force of the enemy and his entire command captured, the two companies of infantry and a large portion of the First Ohio Cavalry, Captain Eggleston, being prisoners. The road-master was on the train which brought the information, and requested me to put my command on board the cars, thereby protecting the interests of the Government in conducting the same to a place of safety, he representing that the train there was all the rolling stock that was available on the road, it having been transported across the river with great labor and expense, and that it would be impossible to procure another locomotive should the one then attached to the train be destroyed. After mature deliberation I determined to hold my position, and instructed the road-master to proceed to the camp of Captain Goben, some 6 miles distant, in the direction of Decatur, where he might learn more of the movements of the enemy. Arriving there, the road-master informed Capt. [Frank] Goben of the destruction of the Courtland Bridge and the capture of the companies of Captain Davidson's command, asking him, in the name of the Government, for his company, numbering about 40 effective men, to conduct the train through to Decatur. The captain, not thinking it advisable to abandon his position, gave the road-master orders to proceed in the direction of Decatur at a cautious rate of speed, keeping a good lookout for any troops that might attempt the capture of the train, and if attacked in front to fall back to his camp. The train had proceeded but about a half mile when it was attacked by a cavalry force, numbering about 300 men. The engine was reversed and the train run back to Captain Goben's camp, closely followed by the rebel cavalry, who advanced until within about 300 yards of the camp, where, finding Captain Goben's company drawn up in line of battle, they slowly retreated, placing obstructions upon the road of cross-ties, which they set on fire to destroy those laid down, intending to render the road unfit for the passage of trains. After consultation with the road-master in regard to the value and importance of the bridge at which his company was stationed both agreed that it was of but little importance, being merely constructed of square sills thrown across a small creek, which I will here state was exactly the case of the one I was guarding, and Captain Goben placed his company on board the cars and joined my command.

Both the positions, that of Captain Goben and the one occupied by myself, were rendered valueless by the destruction of the long bridge at Courtland and the burning of a wooden culvert on the road. After the arrival of Captain Goben I placed my entire command, camp equipage, &c., on board, preparatory to leaving. This was not done because I deemed the position untenable, but I was satisfied it was valueless, having been informed by a citizen captured by my pickets that Courtland was in possession of the rebels and that an attack upon Decatur was threatened by a large force of rebels. Other circumstances convinced me that his information was correct, and I decided to endeavor to get the train through to Decatur, knowing that if the attack was made upon that place my command could render efficient service there and my force being sufficient in my judgment to protect the train. After proceeding about 1 mile I formed my command in line of battle and proceeded in advance of the train a short distance, when the enemy, numbering some 300 infantry and cavalry, emerged from the woods, and I immediately advanced to meet them, firing a few shots to ascertain their distance, when the entire force, infantry and cavalry, fell back. I pursued them on double-quick for nearly half a mile, but finding it impossible to overtake them, I returned to the train and ordered the engineer to move forward.

A short distance in advance of the encampment of Captain Goben we found the cross-ties of the railroad for about 100 yards on fire and the wooden culvert over a small ravine burned. I put my men to work immediately, and in a short time had so far repaired the road as to allow the passage of the train. This work was considerably retarded from the fact that the iron rails had been much drawn and warped by the burning of the ties upon which they had been placed. While engaged in these repairs Lieutenant Harman, of the Thirty-first Ohio, with his command, was surprised, and, after a gallant fight, repulsed, falling back upon me. The lieutenant received two wounds while contesting the field with the rebels, and had 1 man killed and 12 wounded. He represented the attacking force as numbering from 300 to 400, and as his dead and wounded had been left upon the field, I proceeded with him to the place where the battle occurred with all possible dispatch. Arriving there, we discovered some 40 or 50 cavalry near, all of whom fled when they discovered we were advancing upon them. Placing his dead, wounded, camp equipage, and command aboard the train, we proceeded to Decatur, where we arrived without further accident.

Hoping that this plain statement of facts and my conduct in regard to the affair will meet your approval, I am, respectfully,

JAMES H. BOYL,

Captain Company C, Tenth Indiana Volunteers.

Colonel KISE.

[Indorsement.]

I herewith forward the report of Captain Boyl for your consideration and disposal. It contains a full report of the action of Companies C and B, of the Tenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, in the late affair near Courtland, Ala.

Colonel, Commanding Tenth Indiana Volunteers.

No. 3.

Report of Col. John M. Harlan, Tenth Kentucky Infantry.

HEADQUARTERS TENTH KENTUCKY REGIMENT,
Winchester, Tenn., August 8, 1862.

SIR: I seize the earliest moment since my regiment joined the brigade from detached service at Eastport, Miss., to advise you officially of the capture by the Confederate forces, on July 25, of Companies A and H, of this regiment, stationed at Courtland, Ala., together with such facts connected with their capture as I have been able to gather.

In the outset allow me to state that within a few days after the arrival of our division at Tuscumbia I was ordered to send one company to Courtland, Ala., 23 miles east of Tuscumbia. Company A, Capt. Henry G. Davidson, was detailed for that service. Shortly thereafter, in compliance with orders from division headquarters, I sent Company H, Capt. B. R. Pendleton, to re-enforce Captain Davidson, the two companies being placed by me under the command of the latter, who was the senior captain. A small force of cavalry from the First Ohio was stationed at the same point.

On the same day that Captain Pendleton left for Courtland the remainder of my regiment left for Eastport, Miss., where it continued on detached service until the 24th ultimo, when it left Eastport to rejoin the brigade.

The first reliable information received by me in regard to the affair at Courtland was when en route from Florence, Ala., to Pulaski, Tenn., when most of the men from Companies A and H joined the regiment. Being separated from my brigade and division commanders, I deemed it my duty to telegraph to Major-General Buell the substance of that information. At that time I also received a brief communication from Captain Davidson, which was written from Moulton, Ala., while a prisoner in the hands of the rebels. It was written, as I learn from my men, hurriedly, a few moments before they separated from him.

He writes that on the morning of July 25, about 8 o'clock, he was attacked by a large force of Confederate cavalry, under Brigadier-General Armstrong, believed to number 800. Seeing the enemy coming, he formed Companies A and H in line behind the railroad embankment and near the bridge, intending to give the enemy battle, and determined to guard that which he was sent there to do as long as he could possibly do so.

The position which he selected was so advantageous for defense against a force coming from an opposite direction that the presence of his men behind the embankment was not observed by the enemy until they came quite close to him. He fired two volleys into their ranks as they charged, which killed and wounded a number of the rebels, and also killed the horse of the rebel general. Seeing the enemy, with their greatly superior force, was flanking him and getting into his rear, Captain Davidson passed with his command by the left flank across the creek, running under the bridge, and took position in some gullies. About this time he observed a considerable force of cavalry coming from the direction of Courtland, and what appeared to be infantry (but which proved to be cavalry dismounted) in a corn field supporting the cavalry. Captain Davidson ordered bayonets to be fixed, intending to charge through them, get into the corn field, and from there into the woods near by, but finding himself surrounded, with no possible chance of escape, he surrendered his command.

He writes that his men behaved splendidly, obeying every command with promptitude and alacrity and fighting gallantly until the last moment. He says further that Captain Pendleton, Company H, Lieutenant Reynolds, Company A, and Lieutenants Barry and Shively, Company H, are worthy of all praise for the brave and gallant manner in which they managed their troops.

The loss on our side was as follows: William Farmer, Company H, killed; James Rogers, Company A, wounded severely in thigh; Mattis Cortes, Company A, wounded slightly in arm and cheek, and James Cable, Company A, in left arm.

Captain Davidson writes that the loss of the enemy greatly exceeded his. From my men I learn that the rebel loss was 11 killed and more than 20 wounded. The enemy took both officers and enlisted men to Moulton, Ala., at which place the latter were paroled and the former retained and sent to Tupelo, Miss.

I herewith inclose a complete list of the enlisted men who were taken prisoners and paroled (with the exception of James Rogers, who was too badly wounded to travel and was left with the rebels at Moulton). The paroled men were forwarded to Nashville, Tenn., with orders to report to Maj. W. H. Sidell, assistant adjutant-general, and from that place, I learn, were forwarded to Camp Chase, Ohio.

Justice to Captain Davidson requires that I should say that the unvarying testimony of all the men of Companies A and H is that he acted as became a brave and dauntless soldier under the trying circumstances surrounding him. The admirable manner in which he disciplined his company and his high character afford every assurance that he performed his whole duty. I feel sure that he did all that he could do with the small force at his command. The infantry numbered about 97 effective men. The cavalry force stationed there did not exceed, as I learn, 35 or 40 men, composing parts of two companies, under command distinct from Captain Davidson. They performed the picket duty for the station. Their operations upon the occasion alluded to will doubtless be detailed by others.

The enemy captured the entire camp equipage of Companies A and H, including 2 company wagons, 12 mules, and a small quantity of forage and provisions.

In conclusion, I beg that you will take such steps as will effect a speedy exchange of such of the officers and men of Companies A and H as were taken prisoners. They deserve to be returned to the service of the United States.

I should have stated that the rebel commander and his men were so enraged at Captain Davidson and his command because of the resistance made by them, attended by the killing and wounding of some of their number, that he (General Armstrong) and they threatened to kill them all. General Armstrong denounced Captain Davidson because he did not surrender, without fighting, to such a superior force. This is stated because it was rumored that my companies surrendered without fighting or firing a gun.

Respectfully,

JNO. M. HARLAN,
Colonel Tenth Kentucky Regiment.

G. D. HUNT, JR., Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

Reports of Col. Moses B. Walker, Thirty-first Ohio Infantry.

DECATUR, July 26, 1862—1 a. m.

General Scheopf is on the north side of the river with three regiments of his brigade. He directs me to say that all guards between this point and Tuscumbia have been attacked on yesterday and driven from their posts. Eighty men of the Tenth Kentucky have been captured at Courtland. The town is now in possession of the rebels. Captain Boyl, of the Tenth Indiana, stationed at trestle work near Courtland with one company Tenth Indiana, fell back on Company B, same regiment, at trestle work 12 miles this side of Courtland, defended the train, and brought it in safely to this place.

Company E, Thirty-first Ohio, stationed at Trinity, 6 miles from this place, was attacked at 4 p. m. Lieutenant Harman stood his ground, and with the small force he had of effective men repulsed the rebels, numbering 350 men, with a loss to his command of 2 killed and 12 wounded. Lieutenant Harman is himself wounded in two places, but not mortally.

The general wishes your order as to whether he should move from here at this time.

The Thirty-first Regiment is now all under my command in and about this place, having re-crossed the river to-night.

The wires are cut, bridges and trestle work burned, between here and Tusculumbia.

M. B. WALKER,
Colonel Thirty-first Ohio.

General D. C. BUELL.

HDQRS. THIRTY-FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY,
Winchester, Tenn., August 3, 1862.

GENERAL: I beg leave to report that about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 24th [25th?] ultimo Lieut. M. B. W. Harman, in command of Company E, Thirty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry—having one platoon of his company, numbering 25 men, including non-commissioned officers, stationed at a place called Trinity, near Decatur, Ala., for the purpose of guarding the Memphis and Charleston Railroad—was attacked by a force of rebel cavalry, numbering about 350 men. The attack was made at a time when Lieutenant Harman and his little force were engaged in erecting a stockade fort and had not their guns in their hands. They were fired upon and several of the men wounded by the first fire. They sprang to their arms, which were stacked near by, and then commenced the most Spartan-like resistance which the history of this war so far will probably furnish, killing 12 of the enemy certain and wounding not less than 38 or 40. The precise number killed and wounded of the enemy cannot be ascertained, as they were able to carry off all but 5 of their dead and all of their wounded. Lieutenant Harman held his position, fighting himself like a lion at bay, though badly wounded in the face and painfully, though not seriously, in the left arm. His example inspired his men to emulate his conduct, and all but 2 of the 26 fought with a most desperate valor.

You will see by this report that one-half of this little band was killed or wounded in the fight. Their work of fortification had not advanced far enough to afford them any protection. They remained masters of the field, remaining upon it until a late hour at night, when they were brought to Decatur, Ala., upon the train.

The same force, as is believed, which attacked Lieutenant Harman did much mischief on the railroad the same day and took about 80 prisoners from the Tenth Kentucky Volunteers, who were stationed near Courtland to guard the railroad, driving away two companies of the Tenth Indiana Volunteers and burning bridges and trestle work along the line between Courtland and Decatur, Ala.

This report would have been furnished at an earlier date but for the reason that we have been upon the march ever since the fight occurred.

Respectfully submitted.

M. B. WALKER,

Colonel, Commanding Thirty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Report of General Braxton Bragg, C. S. Army, including congratulatory order.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 31, 1862.

A cavalry expedition sent from Tupelo on 18th, under Col. Frank C. Armstrong—three Louisiana regiments—attacked the enemy at Courtland, Ala., on the 25th instant; took 133 prisoners (8 commissioned officers), 10 wagons and teams, quantity of forage, many horses and equipments, large number of arms, and the camp equipage of four companies; destroyed railroad depot, bridges, and telegraph. We lost 3 killed and 5 wounded; the enemy, 3 killed and 6 wounded. The men were paroled; officers sent to Columbus, Miss. Another small expedition to Town Creek, near by, captured 16 prisoners.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 2,
Chattanooga, Tenn., August 12, 1862.

The commander of the forces is gratified to call the attention of the army to another well-planned and vigorously executed cavalry movement on Courtland, Ala., led by General Armstrong, which resulted in a serious loss to the enemy in the capture of a number of prisoners, their baggage and camp equipage, arms, ammunition, and other military supplies, and in the destruction of the telegraph lines and railroad bridges on the enemy's line of communication. This expedition reflects credit upon the skill of the commander and bravery of all engaged, and gives another proof of what a few resolute men intelligently handled can accomplish. The commander of the forces is especially pleased to notice the gallant conduct of Capt. P. D. Roddey and the officers and men of his command, who on this occasion exhibited the same coolness and circumspection, and when necessary daring, which have enabled them in previous operations in the same quarter to accomplish results so highly creditable and satisfactory. These late successes of our cavalry should be regarded as presages of the coming campaign. Other arms of the service will emulate the example set them until by bold, rapid, and repeated blows our foe is driven from our soil.

By command of General Bragg:

THOMAS JORDAN,
Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE WEST,
Tupelo, Miss., August 2, 1862.

Brigadier-General JORDAN,

Chief of Staff, Department No. 2 :

GENERAL: I have the honor to forward to you the inclosed reports made by acting Brigadier-General Armstrong of two very successful engagements which he has had with the enemy in the vicinity of Courtland, Ala. I regret that the smallness of my cavalry force and the consequent necessity of concentrating it all here have compelled me to order Armstrong to return with his command to this point. I beg leave to commend him to the favorable notice of the general commanding the department and of the President.

I am, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,
STERLING PRICE,
Major-General.

HDQRS. CAVALRY BRIGADE, ARMY OF THE WEST,
Moulton, Ala., July 26, 1862.

MAJOR: I have the honor to report that I reached here on the evening of the 24th instant. After conferring with Captain Roddey, from whom I gained all the valuable information I could desire, I determined to move early on the morning of the 25th to Courtland, 16 miles north of this, on the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, and take the place, it being the center of guards and patrols for the portion of the road between Tusculumbia and Decatur. Sending Lieut. Col. D. C. Kelley with 140 of Forrest's cavalry to a point 7 miles west and two Partisan companies that are in the neighborhood 12 miles east of Courtland, to destroy and ambush the road from both directions, I moved from here with about 550 men, including the independent companies under Captain Roddey, at 1 a. m. on the morning of the 25th instant. Having arrived near Courtland, avoiding all roads as much as possible, I sent two companies under Captain Roddey and a detachment of 60 men, with long-range guns, selected from the several battalions, under Captain Champion, to advance upon the flank. I succeeded, through corn fields and by-paths, in getting within 500 yards of the enemy's camp, when I charged them with the main body of cavalry, the two commands of Captains Roddey and Champion moving promptly to the positions previously assigned them. The enemy's infantry fell back under cover of the railroad and fired a volley, but I soon crossed the railroad and charged down it on the north side, which drove them from the trestle work and forced them to take shelter under the bank of a creek, where it was impossible to get at them on horseback. I immediately pushed around some dismounted men to charge them on foot. Seeing this they ceased firing, threw down their arms, and surrendered. In getting to this infantry command I had to charge through the cavalry encampment, dispersed their cavalry, taking the commander and many others prisoners, captured 2 wagons and teams, 500 bushels sacked corn, many horses and equipments, a large number of arms, all the camp and garrison equipage of four companies, and six days' supplies; destroyed the telegraph line, three pieces of trestle work and a bridge, burned a depot, and took 133 prisoners (8 commissioned officers).

My loss was 3 killed and 5 wounded; the enemy same number killed and 6 wounded. From the statements of the officers I am satisfied that not more than 12 of the command made their escape.

My command was composed of portions of Webb's Louisiana Squadron, Barteau's Independent Battalion, McCulloch's Missouri Battalion, Captains Hill's, Sanders', Roddey's, and Newsom's companies. The officers and men behaved with coolness and gallantry, and I can proudly say gave entire satisfaction to myself, and gave evidence of what our cavalry can do if they are used with energy and boldness.

My thanks are due to Captain Hyams, assistant adjutant-general; Lieut. D. J. Armstrong, aide-de-camp, and to Col. T. J. Foster, volunteer aide-de-camp for the prompt manner in which my orders were delivered and for their gallant example in leading troops to the charge. Captain Roddey and Dr. Jones have my thanks for rendering me invaluable assistance, as it was from their information I based my plan that succeeded so well.

I would respectfully request that the balance of my brigade be sent to me, as I am satisfied that with it I can hold the valley of the Tennessee from Decatur to Tuscumbia, and prevent any communication by railroad or telegraph. This country is peculiarly adapted for cavalry service of this kind. Forage in abundance can be procured; subsistence, except sugar, coffee, and salt, can be purchased.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,

FRANK C. ARMSTRONG,

Brigadier-General.

Major SNEAD.

HDQRS. CAVALRY BRIGADE, ARMY OF THE WEST,
Moulton, Ala., July 26, 1862.

MAJOR: I send, under Major Smith (McCulloch's battalion), 8 Federal officers taken at Courtland on the 25th instant. The non-commissioned officers and privates I have paroled, numbering 125. I could not feed them and had not the men to spare to guard them to headquarters of department. I brought them to this place last night and will send them into Tuscumbia to-morrow. General Thomas' division has crossed at Florence and ordered to Huntsville. General Buell was at the latter place a few days ago. General Rosecrans' division is now or will be to-night at Tuscumbia. The railroad has been destroyed by my command, and I am fully under the impression that there are to-day no troops between Tuscumbia and Decatur. With the remainder of my brigade I can stop all communication on this side of the river between the two points. I can easily forage my command, and can also procure subsistence, excepting sugar, coffee, and salt. Corn meal and beef I can get in abundance. I hope the general will send every available man of my brigade immediately forward via Russellville and Mount Hope. After leaving Fulton forage sufficient can be obtained along the whole route. Major Smith would be a suitable officer to bring them up. I would request that you order my brigade commissary and quartermaster to procure funds and join me. The horses sent to Aberdeen might remain a few weeks longer. Instruct the officer who may bring the command to me to push up to Russellville rapidly and then to report his arrival to me, as I will have need of a force in that direction.

I have the honor to be, with respect, your obedient servant,
FRANK C. ARMSTRONG,
Brigadier-General.

Maj. THOMAS L. SNEAD,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

P. S.—Since writing the above I learn that a very large force moved up the railroad to-day toward Courtland from Tusculumbia.

JULY 25, 1862.—Skirmish at Clinton Ferry, Tenn.

Report of Assistant Adjutant-General H. L. Clay, C. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF EAST TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, Tenn., July 25, 1862.

COLONEL: Captain Blalock, commanding company of cavalry at Clinton, reports that at sunrise this morning his pickets at the ferry were fired upon by the enemy. He sent re-enforcements, when a skirmish occurred, resulting in the wounding of one man. Believing he was about being surrounded he retreated.

The major-general commanding directs me to give you the report of Captain Blalock, and suggests that the enemy may be a foraging party. If they cross the river you will move your brigade promptly forward and drive them back. You will be supported in the movement by Colonel Taylor's brigade.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. L. CLAY,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Col. A. W. REYNOLDS, Commanding Fourth Brigade.

(NOTE.—Similar letter to Col. T. H. Taylor, commanding Fifth Brigade.)

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF EAST TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, Tenn., July 26, 1862.

GENERAL: The enemy attacked our cavalry at Clinton yesterday morning. It was reported by our secret police last night that it was also intended to attack Knoxville with cavalry and infantry this morning at daylight. It seems that some of their scouts were within a very short distance from this place some time during the night. Information of these facts was sent to Colonels Reynolds and Taylor, with instructions to forward it to you without delay.

The major-general commanding directs that a regiment be ordered to this place from Colonel Reynolds' command, and dispatches to that end have been already forwarded to Colonel Reynolds. He further directs me to say that you will send some infantry to Clinton.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. L. CLAY,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Maj. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, U. S. Army, commanding District of West Tennessee.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF WEST TENNESSEE,
Corinth, July 28, 1862.

GENERAL: A report received late last night from General Morgan states that three companies of cavalry, under Major Moyers, went out southeast from Tuscumbia to attack a party of rebel cavalry which had surprised and captured two companies of General Thomas' command and burned the bridge near Courtland. They found the enemy about 200 strong and made the attack, losing 23 killed, wounded, and missing. Does not state whether the enemy were repulsed with loss or not and gives no dates.

General Ross, at Bolivar, is threatened by a strong force, possibly Price's. I have had him re-enforced as much as possible from Jackson and have sent six regiments of infantry and one battery from here. There was some skirmishing yesterday at the crossing of the Hatchie, northwest of Bolivar, about 8 miles distant. This change of troops is only intended to be temporary, but the necessity may arise to keep a larger force on the line of the Hatchie than we have had.

There is an evident disposition on the part of many of the citizens to join the guerrillas on their approach. I am decidedly in favor of turning all discontented citizens within our lines out south.

Colonel Sheridan has gone, with all the available cavalry belonging here, to attack and drive out a body of rebel cavalry that are pressing or conscripting men in that neighborhood. I will probably hear from them to-morrow.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT,

Major-General.

HDQRS. THIRD BATTALION THIRD MICHIGAN CAVALRY,
In Camp, near Tuscumbia, Ala., July 27, 1862.

SIR: Having been ordered at 1.30 o'clock on the morning of the 26th instant to take Companies L, H, and M, of the Third Regiment Michigan Cavalry, and move out to the south of Leighton and scour the country, for the purpose of intercepting whatever of the enemy's forces there might be in that direction, I respectfully submit the following report:

At daybreak I had gained the Tuscumbia and Chattanooga road, and moved southward on the road leading to La Grange until I came to the county-line road, which I followed until I came to a point about 8 miles south of the Tuscumbia and Chattanooga road, where I took a by-road, leading southeastward to the Russellville road; thence to Spangler's Mill, near which the Moulton and Courtland roads intersect. After I had gained the Russellville road, and when within about one-half mile of the mill, I halted near a school-house, standing in the edge of the woods on the left of the road, sent forward Company M, in command of Lieutenant McEntee, for the purpose of making a dash upon the mill, to secure, if possible, a small force of rebel pickets which I had learned were stationed at that point, and after having extended the advance and rear guards a little I ordered my men to dismount. While in this situation I was suddenly apprised of the approach of a column of rebel cavalry, since variously estimated at from 150 to 300 strong. I immediately formed my force, consisting of Companies L and H, in column of squadrons in the margin of the woods fronting the enemy's point of ingress. Scarcely had this movement been effected when the enemy dashed down, formed a line under our fire nearly parallel and not to exceed 6 rods in distance. For about ten minutes the fire from both sides was sharp and withering, both ranks being sensibly thinned. But the enemy still continued to rush down the road in overwhelming numbers, increased their front, and concentrated a fire upon my force, compelling them to give way, which movement was effected in tolerable order at a point about 10 rods in rear of my first position. I partially succeeded in forming a second line on the bank of a ravine, for the purpose of holding the enemy in check until I could rally upon the opposite bank. This I effected under a galling fire, and with a loss, by accident, of several horses and perhaps one or two men. While my men, thus formed, were pouring an irregular fire upon the enemy, Company M, having returned from the mill, formed in the road and poured in volley after volley with terrible effect. This timely and well-executed movement of Lieutenant McEntee diverted the attention of the enemy and gave me time to change my position to the enemy's left, upon which I advanced with dismounted skirmishers. Meanwhile Lieutenant McEntee, perceiving himself flanked, drew his men off in good order, but was hotly pursued for about 4 miles. He returned by way of the Courtland road.

Finding it impossible to push my men forward to a new engagement I deemed it proper to withdraw, which was done in good order. After proceeding a short distance I came to a by-road leading back to the same point, and induced my men to return again, to look after the wounded, and, if possible, to form a junction with Lieutenant McEntee; but, on coming within sight of the enemy, we were repulsed and forced to retreat for some distance through the woods.

The strength of my command was as follows: Company L, 33; Company H, 24; Company M, 32.

Our loss was 11 men missing and about 20 horses. The loss on the part of the enemy must have been far greater.

General S. COOPER:

JULY 27-30, 1862.—Expedition from Woodville to Guntersville, Ala., and skirmishes (28th) at Guntersville and Law's Landing, and (29th) at Old Deposit Ferry.

*Report of Maj. James W. Paramore, Third Ohio Cavalry.*WOODVILLE, ALA., July 31, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report the entire success of the expedition sent out under my command on the 27th instant for the purpose of destroying the ferries on the Tennessee River from Law's Landing down to Whitesburg.

In accordance with instructions, the expedition—consisting of the Fifteenth Kentucky Infantry, commanded by Major Campbell, and a section of Loomis' battery, commanded by Lieutenant Chandler—left Huntsville on the morning of the 27th and proceeded by rail to Woodville, where we were joined by the Third Battalion of the Third Ohio Cavalry, in command of Maj. [Charles B.] Seidel, from which place I proceeded with the whole command, as above stated, for the Tennessee River, which we reached about 8 o'clock the same day, and encamped opposite Matthews' Landing, a distance of about 20 miles from Woodville, and over a rough, mountainous road. This was the first point on the route where we could get forage and water for our animals, and although it was a fatiguing march, it was accomplished without a murmur, so eager were the officers and men for the accomplishment of the purpose for which they were sent. I sent out the same evening of our arrival a strong picket, consisting of infantry and cavalry, to each of the ferries at Law's and Matthews' Landings, and also a squadron of cavalry, in command of Major Seidel, down to Guntersville, to watch the movements of the enemy, guard the boats, and prevent any one from crossing to give information of our approach. A courier from Major Seidel informed me that he was apprehensive that they would move their boats from Guntersville unless prevented by our artillery.

Accordingly I left the guards at Matthews' and Law's Ferries and proceeded with the command by daylight the next morning to Guntersville. I found the town strongly garrisoned by Forrest's cavalry and some independent companies of guerrillas and bushwhackers raised in the vicinity, with a heavy picket guard down at the landing guarding their boats and a warehouse filled with forage and commissary stores. I concealed most of my forces and artillery in a wood a short distance back from the landing, and deployed two companies of infantry as skirmishers to reconnoiter the position and ascertain the whereabouts of the enemy at the landing. True to their bushwhacking mode of warfare the enemy soon fired on them from their concealed positions behind trees and the old buildings on the opposite side of the river. The fire was returned by our skirmishers and cavalry pickets and continued for a short time sharply on both sides, when I ordered one piece of artillery to be placed on the high bluff above the landing in a position to command their camp and the town and the other so as to command the landing and buildings opposite.

At about 7 a. m. we commenced a simultaneous shelling of their camp and the woods on the island above the landing with an occasional round of canister, which soon scattered the astonished rebels in every direction and set them to riding and running in the utmost confusion, and with the assistance of our carbines and long-range rifles soon cleared the opposite shore. The enemy having taken all their boats and skiffs to the opposite shore and concealed them in the creek between the town and the island (as shown in the accompanying diagram*), it was necessary that we should cross the river to destroy them.

Accordingly I set some men to work constructing a raft with such material as we had at our command for the purpose of crossing the river to destroy their boats. The enemy, perceiving our object, gathered in the old buildings opposite and commenced firing on the workmen. I then directed Lieutenant Chandler to shell those buildings, which he did, and they were soon discovered to be on fire, and the flames spread rapidly and consumed that part of the town.

As soon as the raft was completed Captain Allen, of the Fifteenth Kentucky, and 10 men volunteered for the daring feat of crossing the river in search of the boats, and the raft not being large enough to carry more, one brave fellow swam the river to assist them. The party crossed safely to the island, and proceeded under cover of our guns up along the bank of the creek, and found that their boats had just been destroyed and sunk in the creek, all except one large one, which laid near the mouth of the creek partially sunk, but not destroyed. This they tried to raise and bring across, but the fire of the enemy's sharpshooters rendered it too hazardous, and Captain Allen abandoned it, and returned safely with his men to the command. I then ordered one of the guns down to a position below the landing, where the boat could be seen, and a few well-directed shells totally destroyed it. A vigorous fire was kept up on both sides from about 7 a. m. till 12 m., when the well-directed fire of our artillery had driven them from their camp and town to the mountains for safety, and the firing gradually subsided into an irregular skirmish of sharpshooters with long-range guns from concealed positions. This was continued until about 6 o'clock in the evening, when, having completed the destruction of their boats, and having no sufficient means of crossing my command to pursue the enemy further, I withdrew all the command except one company of cavalry and one of infantry (which I left on picket at that place to hold and watch the movements of the enemy) back to our old camp near Matthews' Landing.

All this was accomplished without any loss on our side except one man of the artillery slightly wounded in the foot. The loss of the enemy we could not ascertain definitely, but learned from a citizen who crossed the river the next day that their loss was about 30 killed and wounded, besides their camp and town badly damaged by our shells and about ten buildings, including the warehouse, filled with forage and commissary stores, burned.

Their force at that point and Law's and Matthews' Landings was variously estimated at from 600 to 1,200, all mounted, with no artillery, and is said to consist of a battalion of Forrest's cavalry or battalion of Adams' cavalry and two or three companies of guerrillas and bushwhackers raised in that vicinity.

During that night (Monday, 28th) the boat from Matthews' Ferry was moved up to Law's Landing and an attempt was made to cross under cover of night and get in our rear, but by the vigilance of Captain Spaulding, of the Fifteenth Kentucky, and his company, who were on picket guard at that place, they were prevented from crossing, and compelled to leave their boat, with a loss of 2 killed and several wounded.

The next morning I took a part of my forces, consisting of one company of cavalry and one of infantry and one gun, and went to that point and destroyed their boat, also giving them a farewell salute of a few shell in their camp, about a mile distant, but with what effect we could not ascertain. Having previously sent out scouting parties and thoroughly canvassed the shore for boats and ascertained that there were none, at least that could be found between that point and Guntersville, we returned to camp and collected our forces and proceeded down the river toward Whitesburg and encamped at Cottonville, near the Old Deposit Ferry. Then I sent a small force, consisting of one company of cavalry and one gun, under command of Major Seidel, down to the ferry to destroy the boat at that point. On their approach the rebel pickets cut the boat loose and it floated down the stream over a mile before it was discovered, when the first shot from the artillery struck and sunk it. Having accomplished their object they returned to camp.

The next morning I sent Major Seidel with a detachment of cavalry on a scout to Ferrin's Landing, about 4 miles below Deposit, to ascertain if there were any boats at that place, and report if necessary to destroy them. I then left one piece of artillery and one company of cavalry and one of infantry at the road leading to this point to assist in destroying the boats, if necessary, and proceeded with the balance of the command to Vienna, and there awaited their arrival. When they came up Major Seidel reported that he found one large boat on this side of the river at that point and another on the opposite side. He dismounted a part of his cavalry and crossed in the boat lying on this side, and procured the other and brought them both to this shore, and totally destroyed and sunk them without the aid of the other forces. They then pushed on and joined us at Vienna, where our command separated, Major Campbell, with the infantry and artillery, proceeding toward Whitesburg, and I returned with the cavalry the same evening (Wednesday, 30th) to our camp at Woodville.

I regret to record that while proceeding with the command near Vienna one of my men—James Weldon, of Company K, Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry—was shot and instantly killed by a villain concealed in the thick woods near the road. I immediately sent out scouting parties in all directions, with instructions to shoot down all persons found in arms and arrest all male citizens found in the vicinity. Only one was found and arrested—McDonald, living in sight of where the man was shot. He denies all connection with or knowledge of the murder, but I think it almost impossible that he could not know something about it, if he was not actually engaged in it. I therefore send him to your headquarters for such punishment as you may think proper, fully satisfied that to put down bushwhacking vigorous and severe measures must be used, and all the citizens in the vicinity where these outrages are committed must be held responsible for them.

It would be injustice to close this report without speaking more particularly of the bravery and gallant conduct of all the officers and men composing the expedition. Without mentioning their names, I would say that all are entitled to great credit for the promptness with which they obeyed and executed all orders given and the energy they evinced in accomplishing the object for which they were sent; and I would particularly mention the names of Major Campbell, commanding the infantry; Lieutenant Chandler, commanding the artillery, and Major Seidel, commanding cavalry; also Captains Spaulding and Allen, of the Fifteenth Kentucky, and Lieutenant Heflebower, of Company G, Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, for their co-operation and valuable services rendered in the expedition.

During the route we destroyed seven boats, viz: one at Law's Landing, three at Guntersville, one at Deposit, and two at Ferrin's Landing; but I was hardly satisfied with our operations at Guntersville. I think that nest of treason and rendezvous of guerrillas and bushwhackers should be entirely destroyed and purified by fire, for as long as it is permitted to remain their facilities for reconstructing their boats and its proximity to the railroad will make it a dangerous place for the safety of our trains and railroad bridges and require it to be closely watched.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

AUGUST 2-6, 1862.—Operations at Cumberland Gap and skirmish (6th) near Tazewell, Tenn.

Report of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, U. S. Army.

CUMBERLAND GAP, August 7, 1862.

COLONEL: To obtain forage and feel and learn the strength of the enemy, De Courcy was ordered to Tazewell on the 2d instant. He secured 200 wagon loads of forage, all of which safely arrived on the 5th. Some slight picket skirmishing took place, in which we had 2 men wounded, while the enemy had 1 killed and several wounded.

Early in the morning of the 6th instant, not wishing to bring on a general action, I ordered Colonel De Courcy to return to this post, but he was attacked at daybreak on that day. Considering enemy's forces the attack was feeble. Two of his regiments surrounded two companies of the Sixteenth Ohio, detached to protect a section of artillery. The enemy's movement was well executed, and had it not been for the coolness and gallantry of Lieutenant Anderson we would have lost two pieces of artillery. Although surrounded by a vastly superior force, the two infantry companies, under command of Captains Edgar and Taneyhill, fought heroically, and three-fourths of them succeeded in cutting their way through to their regiments. But we fear that Captain Edgar, an officer of great merit, was killed, and Captain Taneyhill taken prisoner. There were several instances of distinguished conduct both on the part of officers and soldiers. A soldier of the Twenty-second Kentucky was shot through the neck and fell. His gun dropped from his hands; his foe contrived to advance upon him, when the wounded hero grasped his gun, rose to his feet and shot the rebel soldier dead when within five paces of him, when he again fell weltering in his blood. Two soldiers of the Sixteenth Ohio had lost their way and were going toward the enemy, when Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, of the Eleventh Tennessee, hailed them, demanding their regiment. With coolness and courage they required him to declare his rank and regiment and took him prisoner. Resuming their march by a circuitous route they rejoined their commands. Gordon speaks highly of their courage and courteous treatment. At 3.30 p. m. a courier arrived from Colonel De Courcy and asked for aid. Leaving three regiments to guard the Gap I marched with my remaining force to his assistance, but when within 2 miles of Tazewell I met him on his return. The enemy left the field at 5 o'clock and maintained his position until 7 o'clock p. m. The enemy's loss is believed to be considerable. I did not pursue, lest with a superior force, he should gain my rear.

Brigadier-General.

AUGUST 4-7, 1862.—Attack on Union pickets near Woodville, Ala. (4th), and reconnaissance from Woodville to Guntersville, Ala. (5th-7th).

Reports of Lieut. Col. Douglas A. Murray, Third Ohio Cavalry.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD OHIO CAVALRY,
Woodville, Ala., August 4, 1862.

COLONEL: I have the honor to inform you that between the hours of 3 and 4 our outward pickets on the Guntersville road were fired at from the bushes by a party of 10 guerrillas or bushwackers. One of the men was shot dead—the sergeant, a most worthy, good man, mortally wounded through the head, who died shortly afterward; the two other men were both dangerously wounded, only one of five escaping uninjured, who, being driven by the murderers, was forced to fall back. He describes the scene above as follows:

“The party, consisting of a sergeant and 4 privates, belonging to Company G, Third Ohio Cavalry, who were in the advance of the rest of the company at the outpost of the line of pickets on the road, about a mile and one-fourth distant from the camp, between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock p. m., were fired on by a party of 10 or 12 armed men. The first intimation they had of their approach was a volley of ball and buckshot. He, being the only one of the party who escaped its fatal effects, fired his carbine and revolver upon the party, but being so hardly pressed by the entire number had to retire. All this was so quickly done that the other pickets had not time to come to the assistance of the unfortunate man. The murderers turned into the bushes, which just at that place were thick, the mountain steep and rocky. Lieutenant Heflbower, the officer in charge of the picket, dismounted some of the men and searched all over for them without success."

Hearing the firing in camp from the line of pickets I immediately sent out a squadron to scour the country in the neighborhood of the scene. After much trouble, found the tracks of the murderers up and across the mountain; taking a circuitous route to some houses about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from where the firing took place, finding 4 men who could not account for themselves and from their contradictory statements were arrested. Finding any further efforts to make discoveries fruitless the command returned to camp. I brought each of the prisoners separately before the wounded men, then in the regimental hospital, one of whom, N. J. Fletcher, was identified immediately by Private [Lewis H.] Palmer, who is positive that he is the man that fired on him. Private Steckel, the only one of the party uninjured, also identified him, Fletcher, and one other, John Peters, jr., as being two of the men of the party of ten. The other two state that they were in company with Fletcher and Peters all day, and further their statements are both contradictory and changeable, and I have no doubt that each and all of them are guilty of the murders committed.

I had to use, assisted by the other officers of the regiment, the most strenuous efforts to prevent the men from lynching them, their guilt being so palpable. I hear from good authority that three of the ten men that are now in this vicinity bushwhacking are of those I have sent down to headquarters and who have been recently released, and are now boasting of being Union men.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. A. MURRAY,

Lieutenant-Colonel Third Ohio Cavalry, Commanding.

P. S.—Since writing the above Private Steckel has recognized Lewis Turner, another of the prisoners, also John Peters, as being two that were of the party. Private William Smith, Company C, recognizes one of the prisoners, Fletcher, as being one that fired upon him a few days since; Private Smith is now lying in hospital from wounds received, he states, by his hands.

Respectfully, yours,

D. A. MURRAY,

Lieutenant-Colonel Third Ohio Cavalry, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD OHIO CAVALRY,
In Camp, Woodville, Ala., August 7, 1862.

COLONEL: I have the honor to report for your information that the squadron of the Third Ohio Cavalry that left these headquarters on the morning of the 5th instant on a reconnaissance to the river opposite to Guntersville returned this day at noon.

The officer in command of the squadron reports that the encampment of the enemy has been moved back from the river about 2 miles, and there appears to be a larger force there now than when our troops, accompanied by artillery and infantry, were there. The enemy have dug rifle pits, and have also mounted two pieces of artillery to command the old ferries at that point. The ferry-boats destroyed by our troops are being repaired, and I have heard from good authority will be ready for use this day or to-morrow. It is rumored that they, the enemy, will cross with the intention of destroying the bridges on the railroad as soon as they possibly can. If not too great a liberty, might I suggest that two pieces of artillery may be sent to this point or the bridge near by. I have no doubt if artillery were here and could be spared they would render good service. The country being so miserably adapted for cavalry being as effectual as they otherwise would be on more suitable ground might be obviated by having the assistance of artillery. If artillery cannot be spared, two companies of infantry would, I have no doubt, prevent any damage being done to railroad in our vicinity.

The squadron arrested Mr. Hornbuckle, a noted bushwhacker, who attempted after his arrest to escape, and did succeed in getting off some distance; would have made good his escape but for the steps taken to prevent it.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. A. MURRAY,

Lieutenant-Colonel Third Ohio Cavalry, Commanding.

Col. J. B. FRY, Chief of Staff.

Report of Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell, U. S. Army, commanding Army of the Ohio.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., August 9, 1862.

It is with pain I inform you that Brig. Gen. Robert L. McCook died at 12 m. on the 6th of a gunshot wound or wounds inflicted by guerrillas on the previous day near New Market, Ala. He was indisposed, and was riding in an ambulance some distance ahead of brigade, with a member of his staff and a small escort. He had stopped to see about a camping ground for his command, when the party was attacked by a band of guerrillas, one of whom rode up to the ambulance and shot him in the side.

Reports of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, U. S. Army, commanding First Division, with order announcing death of Brigadier-General McCook.

HDQRS. FIRST DIVISION, DISTRICT OF THE OHIO,
Decherd, Tenn., August 7, 1862.

GENERAL: General R. L. McCook died of his wounds yesterday at 12 o'clock. It seems that he was riding some distance ahead of his command in an ambulance (being sick), with his escort, and stopped at a house belonging to a man named Petit to inquire about water and a camping ground; sent his escort a short distance ahead to the edge of a woods, where they were fired upon, and before he could turn his ambulance around and return to his command the escort retreated, and a man riding alongside of the ambulance shot him through the side.

His regiment were very much enraged, and before they could be stopped burned and destroyed some four or five farm-houses; but Colonel Van Derveer, by great exertions, succeeded in subjugating them to discipline before night, and they are now quiet.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major-General, U. S. Volunteers.

Major-General BUELL.

DECHERD, August 7, 1862.

The attack on General McCook occurred not far from New Market, on the road between Hazel Green and Winchester. Colonel Van Derveer thinks they were guerrillas, but Captain Brooke, who was captured, wrote a note to Colonel Van Derveer, stating that the attack was made by regular Confederate States cavalry, and that he was a prisoner of a Captain Hambrick, who offers to exchange him for his (Hambrick's) brother, a prisoner in Huntsville. I am inclined to the belief that citizens were giving assistance, but do not know who.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. FIRST DIV., DIST. OF THE OHIO,
No. 8. } Camp near Decherd, August 7, 1862.

The major-general commanding announces with deep regret to the troops of this division the death of Brig. Gen. Robert L. McCook, who departed this life at 12 o'clock m. on the 6th instant from wounds received from a party of guerrillas, who attacked him while proceeding in an ambulance en route from Athens, Ala., to this place.

General McCook entered the volunteer service at the commencement of the rebellion; won a name for himself and command by his daring exploits in Western Virginia, and added greatly to his fame at the battle of Mill Springs, where he was severely wounded whilst conducting a charge with his gallant regiment. He was affable in his manners and a courteous gentleman. A brave officer and a congenial friend is lost to this division, and the country has been deprived of a general who was firm and devoted to its interests.

Whilst we deplore his loss let us be steady in our efforts to maintain such discipline as will insure to our arms a just retribution upon the dastardly foe who could take advantage of his defenseless condition.

In respect for his memory the usual badge of mourning will be worn for thirty days.

By command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas:

GEO. E. FLYNT,
Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

Report of Col. Ferdinand Van Derveer, Thirty-fifth Ohio Infantry, commanding Third Brigade.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD BRIGADE, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Camp near Winchester, Tenn., August 9, 1862.

SIR: It becomes my melancholy duty to report that while a portion of the Third Brigade, composed of the Ninth Ohio Volunteers, the Second Minnesota Volunteers, and the Thirty-fifth Ohio Volunteers, under the command of Brig. Gen. Robert L. McCook, were on their march from Athens, Ala., to this point, at a point near the southern line of Tennessee General McCook, who was sick and riding in an open carriage upon his bed, about 3 miles in advance of the troops, accompanied by Capt. Hunter Brooke, of his staff, and Major Boynton, of the Thirty-fifth Ohio, together with nine members of his escort, was suddenly attacked by a band of mounted guerrillas, numbering between 100 and 200 men, about noon on the 5th instant.

Major Boynton, with one of the escort and a citizen mounted on the horse of another, had been sent a half a mile to the rear, and three members of the escort, including the sergeant, a like distance to the front, in search of suitable camping ground for the brigade, thus leaving but four of the escort with General McCook, one of whom was dismounted, and Captain Brooke, who was unarmed and in the carriage attending upon the general, when the attack began.

The general succeeded in turning his carriage, but not before the guerrillas were within range and firing. He was soon overtaken and surrounded, although his horses were running at the top of their speed. In reply to the oft-repeated cry of "Stop!" "Stop!" the general rose in his bed and exclaimed, "Don't shoot; the horses are running; we will stop as soon as possible." Notwithstanding this surrender those riding within a few feet by the side of the carriage fired, one ball passing through his hat and one inflicting a mortal wound in the abdomen, which produced death twenty-four hours after, at noon of August 6.

The alarm having reached the column, it was hurried up at double-quick and almost immediately encountered the advance of the band, but a few shots from the head of the Thirty-fifth scattered them instantly. General McCook was found in a house near where he was shot, whither Captain Brooke and the driver of the carriage had carried him. Of those in advance, Captain Brooke, two members of the escort, and two teamsters of the Ninth Ohio, who were driving General McCook's own wagons, were captured, and one member of the Ninth Ohio band wounded by a saber cut on the head. General McCook's wagons were fired but not greatly damaged. The three horses attached to this team and the mules of one other brigade team were taken.

The condition of General McCook could not but have been known to the attacking party, as he was on his bed, divested of all outer clothing, except a hat used as a shade, and the curtains of the carriage being raised on all sides. There are good reasons for supposing that the attack was planned solely for General McCook's capture or murder.

Infuriated by this cowardly assassination, many of the soldiers of the brigade spread themselves over the country before any measures could be taken to check them, and burned all the property of rebels in the vicinity and shot a rebel lieutenant who was on furlough and supposed to be connected with the gang.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FERDINAND VAN DERVEER,

Colonel Thirty-fifth Ohio Volunteers, Comdg. Third Brigade.

Report of Lieut. Col. Luther P. Bradley, Fifty-first Illinois Infantry.

HEADQUARTERS FIFTY-FIRST ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS, Decatur, Ala., August 7, 1862.

Wires cut, so I cannot telegraph you. The convalescent train from Tusculumbia was attacked this a. m., about 5.30, near Moseley's plantation, about 2½ miles from here. There were over 200 men in the column, and of these one-half are missing. One hundred came in, and we have 2 killed and 2 wounded.

The attack was made by some 250 rebel cavalry. They came from their camp, some 9 miles south of here, last night, and crossed over to the Courtland road before morning. Their designs were to attack and cut off our patrol, and if they had not fallen in with the convalescents would have done it without doubt. Major Koehler turned out promptly as soon as we heard of it and took the road after them. He followed them to Silses' plantation, near Minty, across the railroad and nearly to the foot of the mountains, but could not overtake them. I do not think they have taken a large number of prisoners. Most of the missing men are probably scattered through the woods and will come in to-day or to-morrow. You will see from this that the rebels are showing some little enterprise. It is already unsafe to send foraging parties over 2 or 3 miles out, and when Colonel Starkweather leaves (he is already under marching orders) you may expect to see a part of your command in trouble. Unless we are re-enforced we cannot protect this part of the line. They can run us into our defenses any day and keep us there if they choose.

Captain Rose sent out a corporal and 4 men yesterday to repair telegraph. Returning they were fired upon by a band of 50 rebels. One man mortally wounded, 1 slightly, and 1 missing.

COLUMBIA, TENN., August 11, 1862—3 p. m.

My movement against the guerrillas who have committed the great outrage has been completely successful. Megowan's command of Third Kentucky Cavalry and First Tennessee Cavalry, 108 men, engaged 175 of the enemy near Kinderhook at 5 a. m., continuing the contest fiercely for four hours. Seven were found killed, numbers wounded, 27 prisoners, among whom are a number of officers. Our loss was 3 killed. The woody and broken character of the country and the combatants scattered prevents an accurate estimate of the enemy's loss. I have received news from Maj. F. H. Kennedy, of my staff, commanding another portion of the expedition. He is driving the enemy in every direction.

Maj. Rogers, Kennett's cavalry, has just returned from Centreville, having driven the guerrillas from that place.

The Third Kentucky are just in from a scout. Part of the battalion is in Nashville getting horses.

The two companies First Kentucky are in readiness to surprise a small party of guerrillas at Cedar Springs.

The defeat of the guerrillas at Kinderhook was of greater importance than first reported, both in killed, wounded, and dispersion of the band.

COLUMBIA, August 17, 1862.

You will be pleased to hear that the defeat of Napier's and Anderson's guerrillas near Kinderhook was more complete than reported. Upwards of 20 are reported killed, the band stricken with terror, and scattered in every direction. A prisoner captured yesterday gives the following, I believe, reliable information: Headquarters Cooper's band removed to Persimmon Branch, 6 miles west of Ashland; Col. Jake Biffle's headquarters 5 miles south of Ashland; Tom Williams' Buffalo Creek, 8 miles southwest of Henryville.

When the Third Kentucky get their horses if they could be used against these nests it would be good policy. These sudden surprises frighten many of the scoundrels back to their homes. Six hundred citizens of this county have taken the oath this week. I hope to have every prominent citizen in this county under oath or out of the lines by the end of next week.

Report of Maj. William H. Sidell, Fifteenth U. S. Infantry, and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

NASHVILLE, August 13, 1862.

COLONEL: Colonel Miller has returned with his force, as by your dispatch ordered. Miller did not see Boone; he left in a wagon for Bowling Green, on parole, soon after Miller came. Cassilly saw Boone and also many paroled men, who accused Boone of complicity. These paroled men disappeared before they could be collected; supposed following Boone to Bowling Green. Only about 125 were captured; the rest guarding bridges and two companies absent on an expedition supposed escaped to Bowling Green. Boone and his staff were captured; no other field officers present. Morgan attacked at daylight; no gun was fired on either side. The pickets were asleep; were brought in by the enemy. Boone was in bed; all the others conveniently at hand for capture except 6 or 8, who were accidentally absent. When Miller saw the rebel force at Gallatin he found it difficult to distinguish between citizens and rebel soldiers either by appearance or conduct. One small bridge was destroyed 2 miles this side of Gallatin. Miller left his train there and marched into town. He drove such rebels as were there, killing a few. He sent out parties during the day to seek the enemy and examined damages. Fair Ground buildings destroyed; also 30 cars, of which 20 had Government forage and horses; depot was saved; wood work of tunnel and one bridge beyond Gallatin destroyed. A note-book found on a dead rebel captain revealed intentions some of which Miller prevented. The citizens helped burn the cars, and Morgan was highly applauded by the population, who came out from all the country around. On the other branch road bridge at Red River destroyed, thus interrupting both routes; supposed done by citizens.

This evening when Miller's men and guns were on cars to return rebel force closed in from all directions, firing. He got his men and guns down and the latter in battery; drove off the rebels, killing not less than 30. His loss, 1 killed, 3 wounded. Supposed enemy's intention to divert and detain him while their main force should come this way destroying bridges. Miller's success and return over the road to town prevented this.

Report of Capt. Walworth Jenkins, Assistant Quartermaster, U. S. Army, of the surrender of Gallatin and destruction of bridges in that vicinity.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 25, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith my report in reference to the surrender of Gallatin, Tenn., by Colonel Boone, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers, and a statement of the officers and men on that subject, which are marked respectively A and B, and inclosed herein.

I am, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. JENKINS,

Captain, Assistant Quartermaster, U. S. Army.

Capt. H. C. McDOWELL,

Assistant Adjutant-General, Louisville, Ky.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 23, 1862.

SIR: In compliance with Special Orders, No. 31, dated Headquarters United States forces in Kentucky, Louisville, August 17, 1862, directing an investigation of the circumstances attending the surrender of Gallatin, Tenn., I have to report as follows:

I have examined several of the officers and men belonging to Colonel Boone's command at Gallatin, Tenn. The results of this examination are embodied in a series of statements herewith inclosed, together with a copy of a rough pencil sketch* of the town of Gallatin and its approaches, made by Lieut. J. R. Boone, adjutant of the regiment. This sketch also shows the position of the various night pickets.

The statements of the various officers and men differ in many points, so that the true state of affairs can, in my judgment, only be reached by a properly constituted court of inquiry, which I would recommend be instituted.

With the slight information derived from these statements I cannot in justice to myself or the officers of Colonel Boone's command frame and prefer definite charges against them. I can only express the following general opinion and state a few facts which have been elicited by the examination:

It appears that Colonel Boone had been expecting an attack for some three weeks prior to the surprise and surrender of his command on the 12th instant, and that he had at various times applied to Colonel Miller at Nashville and to General Nelson at Murfreesborough for re-enforcements, which however, for reasons not within my knowledge, but doubtless known to those officers, were withheld.

Arrangements had been made to fortify the town and guard the bridges by stockades, but beyond cutting the timber for this purpose nothing had been done.

Colonel Boone's command consisted of five companies of his regiment (Twenty-eighth Kentucky), averaging, according to his statement, about 75 men each, making a force of about 375 men. Of this force one company (Captain O'Neill's) was detached from the main camp, guarding the tunnel and railroad bridges on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

On the night of the 11th instant Colonel Boone, at the request of Colonel Bruce, commanding at Bowling Green, detached two of the remaining four companies after a drove of beef cattle, intended for the rebel forces. This was done, notwithstanding the rebels were known to be in the vicinity, threatening his command. Although this was doubtless done with the best intentions, it appears to have been a very serious error. These two companies did not and could not return, and, as from all reports they threw away their arms when no enemy was in sight, it is perhaps as well that they did not return to their main body. As to their reasons for thus relinquishing their only means of defense I know not, as none of them were present to be examined. Future examination must decide upon their conduct. The absence of these two companies reduced the strength of the command to about 124 muskets.

It appears that the pickets were posted by Lieutenant Boone, the adjutant of the regiment, and cautioned to extra vigilance. The pickets were in the habit of relieving themselves at reveille and returning to camp. No pickets, mounted or foot, were posted during the day-time, and the excuse given for this great neglect is that the command was too weak.

It appears that Colonel Boone visited the pickets in and near the town between 1 and 2 a. m. on the 12th and then went to his hotel, where his wife was lying sick, and remained there until about 4 o'clock. As he was about returning to his camp, and just as he was leaving the room, some dozen or more rebels confronted him and made him prisoner. No alarm whatever had been given either by the mounted pickets stationed on the Scottsville and Hartsville pikes respectively, at a distance of some 4 miles from town, or by the pickets between the town and the mounted pickets, or by the guards stationed in the city. Not a gun was fired by any of those to whom the safety of the command was intrusted, and everything goes to show that they were either asleep or shamefully neglecting their duty. The result was a shameful and complete surprise within two hours after Colonel Boone had left his guards "on the alert and doing their duty," and the surrender of the whole command in camp, on guard, and at the tunnel and bridges without a shot being fired for the defense of their position, the reputation of their State, or the honor of their country.

The sleeping of sentinels on their posts appears to have been of no uncommon occurrence, and yet no punishment proportionate to this offense appears to have been inflicted; and from the statement of one of the officers it seems that there was an almost total want of discipline in the command.

Colonel Boone appears to have been vigilant and endeavoring to perform his duty as well as possible with the means at his disposal. Whether or not the command could have made any defense with a hope of success after they were surprised and surrounded I will not attempt to decide; but the fault of the surprise must rest on the pickets and guards in a great measure.

The absence of all guards and pickets during the day, and especially when an attack was expected, indicates great carelessness or wanton neglect on the part of the officers in command. I would recommend that a list of all the men forming the guards or pickets be furnished and a court of inquiry instituted to report on the conduct of each and every man on this duty.

Respectfully submitted.

W. JENKINS,

Captain and Assistant Quartermaster, U. S. Army.

Capt. H. C. McDOWELL, Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Inclosure A.]

Statement of Colonel Boone, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I took command at Gallatin, Tenn., about 1st May, 1862, with five companies of Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers, averaging about 75 men each. After being detached for some time at Lebanon and other points, guarding bridges, returned to Gallatin.

I have been apprehensive for about three weeks that an attack would be made on my position. This I made known to General Nelson, and applied for re-enforcements, and especially for some cavalry, for the purpose of scouting. Expected the enemy was at Sparta or above Carthage in that direction. Carthage is 32 miles above Gallatin, on the Cumberland River, and same side. Communicated my information to Colonel Miller at Nashville by telegraph, and also by adjutant, asking for re-enforcements. Morgan was supposed to have about 1,200 men and Starnes from 800 to 1,500, and were expected to combine forces.

My troops were disposed as follows: Captain O'Neill was sent with his company to the south tunnel, 7 miles north of Gallatin, on the railroad, with orders to have at least 20 men there, and the balance distributed between five bridges and the tank on the line of the road between the tunnel and the Kentucky line, the most distant being 7 miles north of the tunnel and 14 miles from Gallatin. The remaining four companies were distributed as follows: One sergeant and 10 men at tunnel 4 miles north of Gallatin; 1 sergeant and 10 men at bridge 2 miles south of Gallatin; 1 sergeant and 10 men at bridge at Pilot Knob, 7 miles south, and a regular daily detail of 1 sergeant and 10 men to guard the depot and tank at Gallatin.

The evening before the attack Colonel Bruce, at Bowling Green, sent to me to re-enforce a party of his command who were after a drove of beef cattle, moving in the direction of Carthage, for the Confederate forces. After some hesitation and on receiving a second dispatch from Colonel Bruce I finally concluded to scout in that direction, and sent out two companies, under Captains Noble and White, of about 50 men each, to scout toward La Fayette and Carthage (that being the direction from which I feared an attack), ordering them to press horses and mount the men as soon as they were about 5 miles from town, and to get all their men mounted. This was the only disposition possible to form a junction with the detachment of Colonel Bruce. But fearing they might be intercepted by Morgan's forces ordered them to retreat to our camp in case they discovered anything of them. I did not make known this movement or send the force out until late at night, when the people had retired, so as not to have my weakened position known. They were instructed to keep an advanced guard not less than 2 miles in advance (about 10 men), and a similar guard on each flank as scouts, so as to embrace a considerable tract for observation. Being more apprehensive of an attack on account of my weakened condition, I gave orders for greater diligence on the part of the pickets. The main camp was at the Fair Grounds, three-fourths of a mile westwardly from Gallatin, consisting of parts of two companies. The camp was encircled by the usual camp guard, and an infantry picket guard, more extended, in the fields and woods, encircling the camp at a distance of about 300 yards. The adjutant placed the pickets. Infantry pickets were posted also at the bridge near town, at the court-house, and at the upper end of the street running in front of the court-house. Cavalry pickets were stationed on the various roads leading from Gallatin at distances from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 miles. The mounted pickets were ordered in case of an alarm or advance of the enemy to fall back to the vicinity of the infantry pickets and fire so as to give the alarm, and the infantry pickets were then to fall back firing so as to alarm the camp guard.

I occupied the time, after sending out the two companies above mentioned, in visiting the infantry pickets, to see that all were on the alert until 2 o'clock at night, and found them all at their posts doing their duty, and I cautioned them to extra vigilance. I then went to my hotel, where my wife was dangerously ill, and spent about an hour and a half there. I then adjusted my pistol, and just as I was starting out to make my final tour of the pickets I heard a knock at my door and supposed it was some of my pickets, as I had told those nearest where to find me if anything occurred. On opening the door some 20 men were seen, about a dozen of them presenting their revolvers at me and demanded my immediate surrender. Their pistols were cocked and the men much excited, apparently being afraid of shots from my pickets. I endeavored to gain time in parley, hoping my pickets would take the alarm and come up. On my asking by what authority their demand was made one of them stated that he was Captain Desha, of Brig. Gen. John Morgan's cavalry; that I was completely in their power, as my camp was surrounded by 1,200 cavalry, and demanded the surrender of myself and camp. I told them that I didn't believe it, and that I would never surrender my camp. They then demanded the immediate surrender of my person. I told them I would surrender my person if they would state the terms and I liked them. They replied, "As a prisoner of war, with the privilege of an immediate parole." I replied, "On these terms I will surrender." They then took my pistol and hurried me away in the direction of the court-house, where they said 2 of my pickets were found asleep. Morgan's whole force then filled the town and were eager to go to the camp. Morgan's adjutant-general came to me as soon as the greater portion had passed toward the camp (the men were going as fast as they could) and called on me to surrender my camp. I replied I had no command, as I had surrendered personally to Captain Desha. They threatened to shoot me if I did not surrender the command. I told them I could not and would not; that no one could do it but Captain Hughes, the senior officer at the camp. Captain Desha commanded them to desist; that I had surrendered as a prisoner of war to him, and that I should not be shot. They then said they would take me to General Morgan and let him decide whether I should surrender the camp or not. When we came up to General Morgan he received me very kindly, and first concurred with the adjutant-general that I should surrender the camp, but afterward concurred with me that my position was correct, and would not force me to do so. By this time we were within 300 or 400 yards of the camp. A flag of truce was sent in to Captain Hughes, who came out and spoke with General Morgan. I informed him that I had surrendered, and it was now for him to say whether the men in camp should fight. He asked for time to consult with his officers, which was granted. We then returned to General Morgan and surrendered the camp. General Morgan ordered the arms to be stacked, which was done, amounting to about 120 guns. The troops in camp were in line, ready to fight.

Subsequently Captain O'Neill's guard at the tunnel were captured. They were in position for action in a sort of block-house, and were ready to fight until they saw the large force opposed to them.

Morgan insisted on my surrendering the forces out, as they were not under Captain Hughes' command. I declined to do so, as I was confident they could escape. I gave a line to Captain O'Neill, saying that Morgan's forces had possession of our camp, so that he might understand the position of affairs and not rely for re-enforcements upon the camp.

My command was all paroled, except Captains Noble's and White's commands, who were not taken. Captain Benson, commanding the other company in camp, had gone to Nashville in charge of a prisoner.

Statement of Capt. F. M. Hughes.

There were 120 guns stacked at the time of the surrender. I considered Colonel Boone's words to me as an order to surrender.

Colonel Boone wrote a letter to Captain O'Neill, as I understood, to surrender his command. Our pickets were surrounded. We never had pickets out during the day and no scouts. The men in camp were anxious to fight. Lieutenants Davis and Conaway usually slept about half a square out of camp, having their wives with them, in a house.

Colonel Boone was in town when the attack was first made. He was generally in the habit of visiting the pickets and camp guards.

I called several times for my officers to give me their attention, as I wished to consult with them, but could not get their attention.

Two companies had been detached the evening before. I think some of the pickets were asleep. It was usual for the pickets on the same post to take turns sleeping.

I told my first sergeant I thought we would have to fight. We had about 30 men on guard and picket duty. I think Morgan had 1,200 or 1,500 men. When I saw the two detached companies, after the surrender, they had their arms, but threw them away. I do not know who ordered them to do so.

Statement of Capt. H. J. O'Neill.

I had 36 men with me at the time of the attack. Some were washing and cooking and the balance of my company were distributed about at bridges. I usually had pickets out in the immediate vicinity of my camp. We never had pickets out during the day. I often found pickets sleeping on their posts while I was in camp. We had no guard-house or systems of punishment, and what we lacked most was discipline. There was no discipline among the men. I would not have surrendered could we have made any reasonable resistance.

[Inclosure B.]

Statement of Corpl. James E. Mullin, Company B, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was on picket duty and posted about a half a mile from camp in the direction of the city, on a path running through the woods and a corn field, with orders to arrest any one, not a commissioned officer, going to or from the camp with or without the countersign after tattoo. The first I heard of the attack was after I was relieved from picket duty. Private Selvage, of Company B, who was on picket, came running back and said the rebels or some one were in the city and that it was filling up with cavalry. At that time I was cooking breakfast in camp. There were no day pickets out. None of the officers, so far as I could see, noticed his statement. I heard nothing until I saw the flag of truce coming in about 5.30 a. m. Soon as it arrived the officers ordered the men to fall in. The flag was in camp two minutes after we first saw it and the rebels were closing in all the time. My company being absent I fell in with Company A. Captain Hughes went to meet the flag, and the next I knew the camp was surrendered. There were about 83 men in camp for duty at the time the flag came up. As I was told, there were from 1,100 to 1,500 rebels opposed to us. I don't think there would have been any use in resistance at that time. There were no scouting parties sent out, only a heavy camp guard and pickets. There were a few mounted pickets sent out on the roads at night about a mile from camp on impressed horses. I was not visited during the night by any one. I always found Colonel Boone with his clothes on at night, and think he was as watchful as possible, and as far as he was able did his whole duty. I never knew Colonel Boone to be out of camp except the night of the attack, when his wife was very sick. Have often seen him late at night visiting the guards and pickets. The enemy kept closing in and surrounding us while the flag was being received.

Statement of Corpl. T. T. Baldwin, Company E, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was on camp guard and had 8 men on guard; but after 10 o'clock, on account of the absence of two companies, only had 4 men. The pickets relieve themselves about reveille, and most of them were in camp at the time of the surrender. The first I saw or heard of an attack was a soldier of our camp running in and saying the town was full of cavalry. The next was I heard the men saying the rebels were coming and had our colonel prisoner. They then fell in of their own accord and appeared anxious to fight. We formed around the amphitheater and some one asked if they were going to fight, and the reply was made that there was no use, as there were too many of them. The adjutant, Lieutenant Boone, said, "For God's sake let us fight and show them that the Twenty-eighth was not afraid of them!"

Captain Hughes went out to see the flag of truce. I met him coming in and asked him what was the prospect. He said, "I expect we will have to fight them." He said they claimed 1,500. The rebels, as far as I could see, were on both sides of the road and in the corn fields all around us.

Statement of Private John Shirley, Company E, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was a mounted picket, posted about 3 miles from camp, on the Harts-ville road. Was ordered not to interfere with citizens coming into camp and to pay no attention to what was going on off the road. These orders were given by the adjutant. Was not visited during the night. Was on post until about daybreak with Private Hardy; he was watching while I laid down to sleep. The first I knew we were surrounded by the rebels and captured.

Statement of Private James Coomes, Company E, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was an infantry picket, posted at the depot in Gallatin, in sight of the court-house. Colonel Boone visited my post between 12 and 1 o'clock that night. I left my post as usual about sunrise and went into camp. The pickets had not all got into camp when the camp was surrendered. The adjutant gave orders for us to fall into line. The men were anxious and willing to fight. I think Colonel Boone was very watchful and did all he could, but don't think him capable of commanding the post.

Private George Hand, Company B, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers, states substantially the same as Private Coomes, being on the same duty with him. States that there were 83 muskets stacked at the time of the surrender.

Statement of Private John C. Hardin, Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was posted at the court-house, with orders to keep soldiers out of town who had not the countersign. I was visited twice by Colonel Boone during the night of the attack; the first time when he was sending out the two companies and the last time between 1 and 2 o'clock a. m. Near 4 a. m. some 8 or 10 men in citizens' dress, armed, came upon me from the rear of the court-house, apparently through the fields and corn, as they were very wet and covered with grass-seed, &c. I was in front at the time they came up. They demanded my surrender, pointing their guns at me, and I was obliged to do it. Osborne and the sergeant were with me at the time and were arrested also. The main force came up about ten minutes after. We had returned from Lebanon about two months before the attack.

Statement of Private Layton Jones, Company E, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was on picket duty about 500 yards from camp. Was not visited during the night. Was in camp when the cavalry came up. No pickets were posted during the day-time. We could have done nothing in the way of defense. No defensive arrangements had been made in the way of stockades, though we were expecting an attack.

Statement of Private Benjamin Fuell, Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers.

I was posted 4 miles from camp, on the Scottsville road, mounted, with one other man. Was sent out as an advanced guard to the two companies which were sent to intercept cattle. I returned about 8 o'clock to Gallatin, not knowing the rebels were there, and was arrested at the court-house. Most of the enemy were in town at the time. I don't think the camp had been captured at that time.

Statement of Lieut. J. R. Boone, adjutant of the regiment.

On the 1st day of May five companies of Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers (Companies A, B, D, E, and F) arrived at Gallatin, Tenn.; the remainder of the regiment was scattered along the railroad line back to Lebanon, Ky. These five companies were together at Gallatin doing duty until after the fight at Lebanon, Tenn., when Companies A and E were sent as a garrison for Lebanon, Tenn., and Company F sent to Hartsville, Tenn., and Companies B and D were left at Gallatin, together with one company of the Fiftieth Indiana. In about three weeks Company F was recalled to Gallatin and Company D ordered to Lebanon. There were then three companies of the Twenty-eighth Kentucky and three companies of Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry at Lebanon and two companies, B and F, of Twenty-eighth Kentucky at Gallatin. These two companies were called to Nashville to go with General Dumont to Murfreesborough; they were again sent back to Nashville, and from there to Franklin, Tenn., where they guarded the whole line of the railroad down to Columbia. They were finally relieved and returned to Gallatin. Upon their return the three camps which were at Lebanon were ordered to report to Colonel Boone at Gallatin, and it was promised that the regiment which had for so long a time been doing guard duty should be brought together and put forward. But in a few days we were ordered to guard the two tunnels and eight bridges on the railroad from the Kentucky line to within about 15 miles of Nashville. Accordingly Company D was stationed at the tunnel 7 miles above Gallatin. The captain was ordered to keep at least 20 men there, and with the rest of his company keep guard at the other tunnel, water-tank, and bridges north of him. This left Companies A, B, E, and F at Gallatin, generally averaging about 65 men each fit for duty. To the bridge north of Gallatin and south of tunnel and to each of the three bridges south of Gallatin were sent a sergeant and 10 men, until we were relieved by a lieutenant and a squad of men, who took charge of the bridge nearest Nashville. This duty, besides guarding the depot and water-tank at Gallatin and the necessary picket and camp duty, we performed until Murfreesborough was attacked and Nashville threatened, when we were ordered to leave one company at Gallatin and with the other three companies repair by rail to Nashville. We were on the cars and off in twenty minutes.

At Nashville we did a heavy duty; slept on the bare ground under the canopy of heaven, and could get nothing to eat from Sunday at 11 o'clock, when we started, till Monday at 12. When General Nelson was near Nashville with his re-enforcements we were ordered back to Gallatin, and found evidence that had the place not have been re-enforced Company F stationed there would have been cut off. We had reports of a force concentrating at Sparta and Hartsville and apprised the authorities at Nashville of the fact, and asked for some cavalry to scout in that direction, but got none.

About this time Forrest, who had taken Murfreesborough, where two regiments were posted, was advancing on Lebanon, where the Fifty-fourth Ohio was stationed. They burned their camp equipage and baggage and retreated to Nashville. Thus we were left at Gallatin with four companies, reduced to mere squads by heavy details, and Forrest, with a force supposed to be about 3,000, at Lebanon, 17 miles distant. Time and again we apprised Colonel Miller, commanding at Nashville, of our critical situation and asked to be re-enforced. They told us they could not even send us a company of cavalry to watch the river, and we were ordered to press horses, saddles, and bridles. This we did, but between the two armies the country about Gallatin was about stripped of horses; but we pressed some fifteen horses, and with blind bridles, and in some cases no saddles, began picketing the roads with mounted men along the river and between Gallatin and Hartsville. We burned all the ferry-boats from Hartsville down between Gallatin, and waited for Forrest in the court-house, where we had determined to give him an obstinate fight. An accident, which appeared like an interposition of Providence, saved us. The river, which was fordable in many places, raised to an impassable height in one night. For a day or two we felt comparatively easy, when we were notified that a mounted infantry force, supposed to number 1,500, had possession of the railroad at Richland. Colonel Boone called in the company at the tunnel and bridge guards, and with the five companies determined to force a passage for the cars through to Louisville. We went as far as Mitchellsville, a few miles above Richland, and found no enemy, the small force which had been there having left in the direction of Hartsville. We returned to Gallatin, distributed the force as before stated, and called for re-enforcements. Some paroled prisoners, who had been taken about Murfreesborough and carried by Forrest to Lebanon and up to Sparta and then let go and who came down to Gallatin, were surprised to find so small a force at that post, and said we were in the greatest danger and had no force to fight the numbers that were preparing to come against us; that Forrest and Starnes were up there and would undoubtedly attack us in a short time. We again called for re-enforcements, and Colonel Boone tried until 1 o'clock at night to get a telegraphic dispatch to General Nelson at Murfreesborough, but could get no response.

Our scouts reported the country full of the rebels' scouts and pickets above Gallatin about 6 miles. Other information received led us to believe we would certainly be attacked by an overwhelming force; and that night a messenger was dispatched on horseback at the dead hour of night (for we could get no word from there by telegraph), and went to Nashville in two hours.

Mr. Fowler, comptroller of the State of Tennessee, was at that time in Gallatin and saw our critical situation, and promised Colonel Boone to do all in his power to have him re-enforced. The next day Colonel Boone sent me with these paroled prisoners to Nashville, and directed me to take them to Colonel Miller, and let him hear from them the danger of keeping so small a force at Gallatin. Mr. Fowler went with me. We first saw General Campbell, late Ex-Governor Campbell, and told him of these things, and he expressed surprise at the small force at Gallatin, and said he had been assigned to no command at that time, and if he had the authority he would send a strong force there.

We then went to Colonel Miller's headquarters, but he was absent, and we went around to Governor Johnson's. He was also surprised at our little squads being left with no re-enforcements, and after having heard the statement of the prisoners he jumped up out of his chair and walked across the floor and said emphatically, "I have said all along that a strong force should be kept at Gallatin;" that he could see how exposed the post was, and had urged the military authorities to put a force there, but they had paid little attention to what he had said. He said he would do anything in his power for us, and would telegraph or write to General Nelson and urge him to send a force to Gallatin. We then took the paroled men to Colonel Miller's headquarters again and explained to him our situation; and Mr. Fowler, who knew the country about Gallatin, having resided there, pointed out our exposed position and impressed upon him the importance of sending re-enforcements immediately. He said he had telegraphed General Nelson about it and had received no answer. We asked if he could not let us have a few cavalrymen for scouts and pickets, and if he could not do that could we not get a few saddles? That it was bad enough to have to send the men out on old broken-down horses and brood mares without having to send them out barebacked and with blind-bridles; but we could get neither. Mr. Fowler and myself asked if we could get no cannon. Colonel Miller said that there was a howitzer there that was not in use and he would send it up to us. I then left, but called again after supper to see if an answer had been received from General Nelson. Colonel Miller was out, but I found a gentleman who had been run off from his home at Lebanon at 2 o'clock the night before because he was a Unionist and feared Starnes' men, who were then in Lebanon. With him was a brother-in-law of Colonel Stokes or General Campbell—I do not exactly remember which—but they waited with me until Colonel Miller came and told him what they knew. Col. Jordan Stokes came in to warn the authorities of danger. He had received a letter from his wife at Lebanon, in which she reported Starnes at that place. They all thought we should be re-enforced at Gallatin. Colonel Miller had received word from General Nelson to re-enforce us if he thought best; said he had telegraphed to Colonel Boone about it. I then reminded Colonel Miller of his promise to send the cannon and left. The next morning I returned to Gallatin, and the next morning succeeding my return the Thirty-first Indiana arrived and encamped near us. Brigadier-General Cruft was commanding the regiment. He thought there should be at least one regiment of infantry and two or three companies of cavalry there. The second day after their arrival they were ordered to go back to Murfreesborough, leaving us as exposed as before. Colonel Boone then was notified by Colonel Miller that he would send 150 men with axes and tools to put up stockades at each of the bridges and a fortification at Gallatin. The day following a lieutenant and 26 men from an Ohio regiment arrived and reported for duty. They brought no axes or tools and none had arrived. The next day they were ordered back to Nashville, and authority came to Colonel Boone to press negroes and build the fortifications; and that night Lieutenants Keegan and Platt, of Eleventh Michigan, arrived with some 60 men and some wagons, but no tools of any kind. The same day a lieutenant of Sixty-ninth Ohio arrived from Nashville with 37 negroes, and we were getting a pretty good force on hand, but no tools to work with. Colonel Boone telegraphed to Nashville after axes and picks, and was ordered to press axes. In a country where everybody is an enemy it soon became known that we were pressing axes, and although we started out two wagons, one under charge of Lieutenant Platt and a squad of men and the other under charge of a sergeant and a squad instantly, they found it difficult to get the axes, and it took several days to collect enough to go to work with. Lieutenant Keegan was ordered by Colonel Boone to take charge of the business, and to employ all the available force in the construction of the stockades and to shove the work forward as rapidly as possible. Nearly every ax that was pressed needed a new handle and grinding; they were put in order and employed immediately in cutting timber for the stockades. Still we had no plans nor pickaxes, and not near enough axes; but all that we had were employed.

About this time, say four or five days after the arrival of Lieutenant Keegan with the Eleventh Michigan men, Lieutenant Howland, aide-de-camp and acting assistant adjutant-general to Colonel Miller, came up, and brought with him plans and specifications for building stockades at the bridges, but no plan was sent for the fortifications at Gallatin.

Lieutenant Howland inquired about how we were progressing with the stockades, and seemed satisfied that we were pushing their erection forward as rapidly as possible. Lieutenant Keegan went to Nashville that same evening to get some to work with. A box of some fifteen axes came up, but Lieutenant Keegan never returned, and Lieutenant Platt and men were ordered next day to Nashville.

At this time we had about 68 negroes on hand, and knew that this, together with the fact that it had become known that we were putting up fortifications, would only greatly increase our danger at Gallatin, and our vigilance was increased as much as possible.

The negroes were sent about 7 miles above Gallatin, to where the timber was most plentiful and better suited to the purpose, and Lieutenant Weatherford was appointed to oversee the work, and a guard was furnished him to protect the negroes and keep them at work. He is a pushing, industrious man, and worked the negroes hard. They were getting along well. The stockades were about cut, and Colonel Boone had telegraphed to Nashville to have a construction train sent up to distribute the stockades at each of the bridges, and a part of the negroes were brought to camp to begin the erection of the fortifications at Gallatin the next day, and had we been undisturbed for two days longer the fortifications would have been about completed.

Monday evening, August 11, Colonel Boone received a telegraphic dispatch from Colonel Bruce, commanding Bowling Green, to send about 100 men out the Scottsville pike toward La Fayette, to intercept some fine beef cattle that the rebels were driving south. This dispatch came about 3 o'clock p. m. We had no way to mount the men, and if they marched out there they could not drive the cattle back very well, they being on foot; so Colonel Boone did not send them.

Late in the evening, however, Colonel Bruce sent another dispatch, saying he had sent a force of cavalry in that direction, and wanted Colonel Boone to send those men to operate with the cavalry. They were going directly in the direction from which we apprehended an attack; and as we had previously been ordered to co-operate with Colonel Bruce Colonel Boone thought that sending out this force spoken of would serve three purposes: to reconnoiter the country in the direction of the enemy, to press horses, which were much needed, and to get the cattle if possible. Accordingly Companies B and F were detailed for that purpose, and Captain White, commanding, was ordered by Colonel Boone to press horses for all the men after they had got some 6 miles from Gallatin; to keep out a good advanced and rear guard, and if they came across the rebels in force to fall back upon the camp at Gallatin. The precaution was taken to slip them out quietly at night after the people had retired, and they got off without being observed, and no one but Captains White and Noble knew whither they were going. Captain Noble, commanding Company F, was officer of the day. As he was going with his company I took his place. The rest of the officers were pretty well worked down, and Colonel Boone ordered the very strictest vigilance; so I took the place of officer of the day myself. I had posted the new picket at sunset and given them good instructions. I put out 34 pickets (foot), 1 sergeant and 1 corporal, a patrol for the town, and guards for the water-tank and depot, and 2 mounted pickets of 2 men each. I sent one out the Hartsville pike and the other out the Scottsville pike with instructions to keep the strictest watch, and keep moving about between a distance of about 4 miles out and the picket stationed at the forks of the roads above town, and in case they should see an enemy to fall back, and as soon as within hearing of the other pickets to fire, so as to alarm them, and they to alarm the camp.

The guards at camp were directed to give the alarm in case they heard the report of a gun and the sergeant of the guard to have the long-roll beat instantly. The companies were then to be quietly formed on the color front.

The sergeant of the guard and myself visited the sentinels frequently during the night, and cautioned them to be watchful and attentive. I had every light in camp extinguished and all noise silenced, and staid with the sergeant of the guard and corporal of relief at post No. 1 all night. We went the grand-rounds before and after 12 o'clock.

About 2 o'clock the hospital steward came in from the hospital in town, and with him I visited the pickets below town and renewed the instructions and charged them to keep on the alert; that any negligence on their part would not only jeopardize their own but the lives of those who were sleeping quietly, thinking their comrades would warn them of any danger. Colonel Boone had just visited the pickets and in town.

I then went back to camp, and the first intimation I had of an enemy was about 4.30 o'clock. One of the pickets which I had placed at the intersection of a dirt road with the pike leading to Cumberland River, about a mile from town (a place where I had not placed pickets before), made their escape and got into camp and reported a force of cavalry in Gallatin. Immediately I ordered the long roll to be beat. I also ordered my horse and some men to go with me to reconnoiter, but saw what was up and helped form the men. We got formed and counted the men and am certain we had not more than 96 men to fight with. They had captured our pickets, and by the time we got formed closed in around us so that the Texas Rangers, on our left, were no farther than 40 yards from us. At this juncture a flag of truce came in. Captain Hughes, the senior officer present, went out to receive the flag. They told him they had captured Colonel Boone, just as he came out the door on his way to visit the picket, and that the camp was surrounded, as he could see himself, by 2,500 men. Captain Hughes said he saw that our little squad would soon be cut down, situated as they were, but told the bearers of the flag, Colonel St. Leger Grenfell and Lieutenant-Colonel Duke, that he did not like to take upon himself the responsibility of surrendering the men, and requested a short time to confer with the other officers, which was granted. Captain Hughes called the officers together, and after a short consultation they concluded that it would be sinful to have the little batch of brave men cut down by a force that was supposed to be about 1,800, and accordingly agreed that Captain Hughes should surrender us upon condition that officers and men should be well treated and paroled. We then surrendered 124 guns, including the guns of the pickets. After we surrendered they sent out and picked up the little squads along the railroad.

Officers and men were well treated. The officers were allowed to retain all personal property. I saw no officer or soldier who appeared frightened in the least, and believe if it would have conduced any to the good of the country every man in the little band would have fought while a spark of life glowed in his bosom.

Additional statement of Lieutenant Boone.

There were no pickets posted during the day on account of the weak condition of the camp. Colonel Boone did not direct the surrender of the camp. Was informed that the rebels came down between the Scottsville and Hartsville roads till they got in rear of our mounted pickets and then sent parties back and captured them. Was informed by the rebels that one of the pickets at the court-house was asleep. There was no drunkenness among the officers or men. Occasionally found men asleep on post, but had no way to punish them except by a regimental court-martial, which the men did not mind. We asked for a general court-martial several times, but were ordered to try them by a regimental court.

I think the rebels were piloted by citizens living around, who knew the whereabouts of the pickets. The pickets relieved themselves about 8.30 o'clock. It was about 5 o'clock when the flag of truce came up. Only one of our pickets had reached camp that I knew of, and that was the man stationed on the pike to Cumberland River near the dirt road leading through the woods and a corn field.

No. 5.

Report of Asst. Adjt. Gen. J. F. Belton, C. S. Army, of the surrender of Gallatin and destruction of bridges in that vicinity.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., August 17, 1862.

Col. John H. Morgan reports that on the 11th [12th] instant he captured Gallatin; about 200 Federal soldiers, including Colonel Boone, commanding, and other officers of the Twenty-eighth Kentucky, were taken and paroled. The tunnel and trestle work between Bowling Green and Gallatin were set fire to; totally destroyed. The bridge between Nashville and Gallatin blown up and 40 cars burned. A large quantity of Government stores were destroyed. Over 100 horses taken.

AUGUST 13, 1862.—Skirmish at Huntsville, Scott County, Tenn.

Report of Col. William Clift, Seventh Tennessee Infantry, including operations of his command in East Tennessee, July 1–October 31.

HEADQUARTERS,
Somerset, Ky., October 28 [31?], 1862.

DEAR SIR: I avail myself of the present opportunity of reporting to you my movements for the last three months. The way has been so blockaded by the enemy as to entirely prevent my reporting to you sooner.

I was ordered by Major-General Morgan about June 1 to go to Scott County, Tennessee, and commence recruiting and making up the Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, and was also ordered that so soon as I had a sufficient number of men to attack the small bodies of rebel troops stationed in different parts of East Tennessee to do so. Accordingly about July 1 I made a scouting expedition to Montgomery, Morgan County, Tenn., to engage a party of rebels that were in the habit of coming up to that place from Kingston, Tenn., but the enemy had left on the day before we got to Montgomery, and we had to return without any engagement.

About July 20 I made another expedition to Anderson County, Tennessee. Our friends in that county had promised to provide means for us to cross Clinch River to engage same cavalry from Alabama that was stationed near Clinton, Anderson County, Tenn.; but no preparation was made as promised. I then turned my course, after taking several guerrillas prisoners near Clinton, Tenn., and returned by way of Wartburg and Montgomery, Morgan County, Tenn., to Huntsville, Scott County, Tenn.

About August 8 I made another expedition into Anderson County, Tennessee, at the request of our Union friends of that county, who had again promised to provide means for us to cross Clinch River, but again failed and we were disappointed.

At intervals when I was not scouting I was busily employed fortifying an eminence near Huntsville, Scott County, Tenn.

On the morning of August 13, about 8 o'clock, our pickets were driven in by the enemy. My command, numbering about 250 men, were soon in order for battle. I was attacked about 9 o'clock by the enemy, numbering from 1,500 to 2,000 men. On the appearance of them in such disproportionate numbers my men (who were mostly new recruits) left my breastworks in wild confusion. But while I speak in dishonorable terms of a part of my command I am proud to speak in the most honorable terms of a part of the officers and men that remained under my command. About 50 men held our breastworks for one hour and forty minutes against the enemy, at least 1,500 men. Maj. James S. Dunan, Captains Robins, Wilson, and Shelton fought with great coolness and deliberation. When our numbers in the breastworks were reduced to about 20 men I ordered a retreat, which was conducted in good order, carrying with them our guns without any loss.

My position in Scott County, Tennessee, has been very perilous until within the last few days; but I kept my men in the most obscure parts of the county, and posted my pickets from 20 to 25 miles from my camps and within a short distance of the enemy's lines, and in this way I evaded collision with the enemy until General Bragg's army retreated out of Kentucky.

I again sent out a scouting party October 1 and we passed over the counties of Scott and Morgan and a part of Fentress County, Tennessee, capturing some prisoners and a little of the rebels' property.

I sent out another scouting party about October 15, which returned on the 29th instant, and report that they passed over Scott, Morgan, and Fentress Counties, Tennessee, and had a skirmish with Ferguson's guerrillas, killing 4 of them, and among the number was the cruel murderer Captain Milliken. They also captured some property.

On October 31 I sent out another scouting party from Somerset, Tenn., to traverse the country toward Monticello and Jamestown, Tenn.; hence from the line of Kentucky and Tennessee to Post Oak Springs, Roane County, Tenn., with a view of breaking up several guerrilla companies that are roaming in the mountains between the line of Kentucky and Tennessee and the Tennessee River and sometimes in the counties of Clinton and Wayne, Kentucky. I have been subsisting my troops on corn bread and beef since the fight at Huntsville, Tenn., at a cost to the Government from about 10 to 15 cents for each soldier per day and about the same for about 50 horses for mounted infantry.

I deem it highly indispensable to break up these guerrilla companies as speedily as possible, as there can be no safety to the peace of the country while they are permitted to exist.

About August 1 I had a correspondence with General Boyle, of Kentucky, in which he proposed to co-operate with me along the line of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, and authorized me to mount a part of my men for that service. I find but little trouble in procuring horses, but find a great deal of trouble in getting saddles and bridles suitable for such a service. If the War Department will furnish me with cavalry saddles, bridles, &c., suitable for such service, I can place myself in a condition for active operations in a few days.

I hope for the future to be able to keep up a regular correspondence with you by way of Louisville, Ky.

AUGUST 14, 1862.—Skirmish near Mount Pleasant, Tenn.

Report of Brig. Gen. James S. Negley, U. S. Army.

COLUMBIA, August 14, 1862.

Major Kennedy attacked Williams' guerrillas 8 miles south of Mount Pleasant this morning at 7 o'clock, killing 2 and taking several prisoners. The enemy fled to woods after the first fire. Our horses were too much exhausted to follow them.

AUGUST 16-22, 1862.—Operations about Cumberland Gap, Tenn., including action at London, Ky., and skirmishes at Flat Lick, Ky., and Pine Mountain, Tenn. (17th).

*Reports of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, U. S. Army, commanding Seventh Division, Army of the Ohio.

CUMBERLAND GAP, TENN., August 19,
Via Lexington, Ky., August 22, 1862.

GENERAL: On the night of the 16th the enemy, said to be 20,000 strong, arrived in our front and drove in our pickets. The morning following there was a brisk skirmish, in which there were trifling losses on either side. During the morning the enemy commenced to emerge from Patterson's woods, and with his artillery opened upon our cavalry. We returned the fire from the pinnacle forts on the right and left and compelled the enemy to withdraw his guns. We also drove him from the adjacent woods. He now envelops our entire front.

On the 16th instant 6,000 infantry and cavalry, with one battery of mountain howitzers, passed through Rogers' Gap. Deserters say that that column is 15,000 strong, but an intelligent scout estimates it at only 6,000. It cannot be the strength of the column which passed Big Creek Gap, for it is said to be 20,000 strong. I had stationed five companies of infantry at Cumberland Ford, five at Barboursville, and a similar force at London and Richmond. I requested General Boyle to re-enforce Richmond and London, and on the 11th instant he informed me that he would do so, but as Boyle's troops were elsewhere ordered London was not re-enforced, and I ordered Colonel Houk to concentrate his regiment and fall back upon Cumberland Gap. It is rumored that Houk was attacked on the 16th instant and his command captured.

On the morning of the 16th I sent Captain Martin via Cumberland Ford to observe Big Creek and Rogers' Gap. On the 17th instant he was attacked by Ashby's cavalry, 600 strong, and 60 of his men are missing.

I have called in my force from Barboursville and Cumberland Ford and they have safely arrived with 150 wagons of forage and subsistence.

Two men who left Knoxville three days ago report that 30,000 men are en route from that place to attack and surround us. My troops are in good condition and spirits and the position shall not be yielded while we have a pound of meat and an ounce of powder; but I trust that the road to Lexington may soon be cleared by a column from Lexington.

A letter received from Kingston states that John Morgan, with 6,000 cavalry and artillery, will be in Nashville in less than twenty days, and confirms the reports of our scouts that the rebel forces in East Tennessee are from 80,000 to 100,000 strong. Kirby Smith commands the column invading Kentucky, and Bragg is at Loudon, 30 miles southwest of Knoxville.

This telegram is sent to Generals Halleck and Buell by courier to Lexington.

GEORGE W. MORGAN,
Brigadier-General.

CUMBERLAND GAP, TENN., August 23,
Via Lexington, Ky., August 27, 1862—8.30 p. m.

On the 17th instant Colonel Houk, Third Tennessee, with part of five companies, amounting to 180 men, was attacked at London [Ky.], by a large force of cavalry. After a gallant resistance of an hour's duration, in which the enemy lost one lieutenant-colonel and a number of soldiers, Colonel Houk retreated to the mountain ridges, and after five days of privations and dangers reached this stronghold. Among the prisoners sent in by the rebels on the 20th instant are two soldiers, not paroled, who estimate the enemy's force at Barboursville and Flat Lick at 15,000 men. Rebel soldiers said that when their heavy guns arrived they would attack us, and others claimed that we were already prisoners. On yesterday I sent a flag of truce, with 11 prisoners, to Pogue's, near Flat Lick, but the officers in charge have not yet returned. A forage train of 100 wagons, protected by the guns of the fort, and a convoy of three regiments of infantry and a section of artillery, went up the Virginia road 3 miles to get fodder for the mules. The forage was obtained and there was a slight skirmish, during which 6 or 8 of the enemy were killed and a number wounded. We captured 8 horses, 12 swords, 15 rifles, and 8 barrels of salt, which had been smuggled through the mountains. The enemy's force, as far as seen, consisted of one regiment of infantry and a body of cavalry. On last evening he concentrated his forces 5 miles in front. I believe that he has now but two brigades in our front and that the other three have gone into Kentucky. Our troops have been on half rations for six days, but they are in high spirits and feel confident of victory. Should the enemy attack, Nashville is certain to be attacked. Bragg and Hardee are at Chattanooga.

AUGUST 17, 1862.—Skirmish near Mammoth Cave, Ky.

Report of Capt. W. E. Wortham, Rock Creek (Kentucky) Home Guards.

LITCHFIELD, KY., August 26, 1862.

DEAR SIR: On the 17th instant a party, composed of small squads from five different Home Guards, after pursuing a company of guerrillas about 40 miles, came upon them near Mammoth Cave, in this State, killed and captured the entire gang, numbering 66, together with their horses, there being 43 horses. After restoring to the owners the horses which had been stolen, upon proof of the fact, under the order of General Boyle, the 43 horses have been divided among the men who captured them, 9 of said horses falling to the company under my command.

My company has been in service eleven months, and has done good service in guarding roads, capturing contrabands of war, &c., all of which has heretofore been turned over to the Government, we paying our own expenses up to the time of the last capture and have never received any compensation whatever. My men are poor men, some of them having no horse to ride upon a scout and not able to buy. We have no arms but the common musket.

* Same report to Generals Buell and Wright.

We now hold these captured horses subject to the order of the United States Government; some of said horses are unfit for any kind of military service. I wish an order from my Government to dispose of the 9 horses in my care to reimburse my men for the expense they have been at during the past eleven months and purchasing such side-arms as we can after mounting men who have no horses.

If this meets with the favor of my Government address me at Litchfield, Ky.

Yours, with due respect,

W. E. WORTHAM,
Captain, Rock Creek Home Guards.

P. S.—Not being acquainted with the military law it may be that I am not addressing the proper authority. If so, you will please lay this before the proper authority.

Your obedient servant,

W. E. WORTHAM.

CORINTH, MISS., August 22, 1862.

Colonel Mason, with a portion of the Seventy-first Ohio, surrendered Clarksville to guerrillas. Prisoners were paroled and sent down the river. I ordered them to Benton Barracks. I have put Forts Donelson and Henry under command of Colonel Lowe, and have ordered six companies of infantry up to re-enforce him.

Reports of Col. Rodney Mason, Seventy-first Ohio Infantry, with War Department General Orders, No. 115, of 1862.

PADUCAH, August 20, 1862.

(Received August 21, 1862.)

GENERAL: I report my detachment, being the garrison at Clarksville as paroled prisoners. I applied to Buell for re-enforcements in vain. With the support of artillery we were attacked on Monday by a force of cavalry and infantry, 800 strong, with a battery of 6 and 12 pounders, under command of Cols. (A. R.) Johnson and Woodward. They were immediately joined by large numbers of armed citizens. My little force was reduced by details on telegraph and river to 150 effective men in camp. It was thought best to surrender. I refused to give my parole, but otherwise would do it. I then gave it for thirty days, when I am to surrender myself at Hopkinsville, Ky. Where shall I take my men? Other forces are organizing to attack Donelson and Henry. Donelson is very weak, and will, I think, be overwhelmed unless immediate relief is given. The enemy will be able to overrun this country again. They can any day bring over 2,000 armed men to Donelson.

R. MASON,
Colonel Seventy-first Ohio.

Major-General GRANT.

CAMP CHASE, Columbus, Ohio, August 27, 1862.

GENERAL: Pursuant to your orders I reported with paroled prisoners at Benton Barracks, and then, by order of Major-General Halleck, proceeded with them to this camp.

Before receiving your command, through Colonel Lowe, to leave Clarksville I had repeatedly asked re-enforcements from General Buell, whose stores were accumulating at that point to a considerable amount. After receiving that order I went to Nashville, and explained fully to Major Sidell, Fifteenth U. S. Infantry, acting assistant adjutant-general to General Buell, the situation of affairs. I told him that forces had been collected; that Lieutenant-Colonel Bristow, of the Kentucky cavalry, had sent me notice they were going to attack me; that I should be attacked in overwhelming numbers, and would not hold myself responsible for the stores, but would hold my camp against infantry. He still insisted on my remaining until you were heard from, and I consented. I received your orders to remain on the day I had fixed for departure.

On Monday, August 18, I had, according to the morning reports, for duty: Commissioned officers, 18; enlisted men, 225; on extra duty, 36; sick, 34; in arrest, 7; total, 320. The extra-duty men were at the stables and post commissary and quartermaster's offices in the city.

A little before 9 a. m. I was informed that the enemy were in force near town. I immediately started for camp (I was at my headquarters in the city), and arrived there just as the enemy came into the city, a party of about 150 dashing at a gallop for my headquarters, where they had hoped to capture me. The men in camp had been formed (according to instructions previously given by me) by their officers, the immediate command of the camp having been devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews.

The enemy halted, deployed a considerable portion of their forces, and held the remainder in mass out of range and under cover of houses, placing a battery in position in a corn field southeast of the college, about which we were encamped. They then sent in a flag of truce, demanding a surrender. I laid the matter before the commissioned officers. While they were considering the matter I returned to the flag and asked whether I would be permitted to verify the statement of their forces. He went away and returned, saying that Colonel Woodward, who commanded the force attacking us, requested a personal interview, to which I saw no objections, and we met midway. I made the same inquiry of him and he assented. I sent Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews to examine and count their force, which he did, and on his return stated that they were over 800 strong one company armed with volcanic rifles (16-shooters); one with Sharps carbines; the remainder of the cavalry with double-barreled shot-guns, and part of the infantry with muskets. They had a battery of three guns, with caissons, in the corn field, but he did not go to them. They were afterward found to be 6 and 12 pounder field pieces. This report was made to the officers, and their vote was reported to me as about three-fourths for surrender and the remainder against it. I told them to rejoin their companies; that notwithstanding the disparity of force I would fight them.

Before or about the time I reached the flag I was called by Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews, who informed me that owing to the overpowering force opposed, their display of artillery, to which we had nothing to reply, and only brick walls to oppose, the men were found, in some companies at least, to be discouraged, and that the officers unanimously recommended a surrender.

Of the 225 men reported for duty 22 were on river guard, 7 on telegraph guard, and 6 out on telegraph line, repairing it—in all 35; leaving of those who ought to have been in camp 190; but of those only 152 were reported to me as in camp, including the camp guard of 42 men. Where the other 38 were I do not know.

I was then to determine whether I would, with this force of 152 men, or may be 175, by arming prisoners and bringing in men who might not be in line, fight over 800 men, armed as well as we were for the sort of a fight that was impending, most of their men being soldiers of the regular army, who had been sent home to recruit under Johnson, Woodward, and Garth, the 800 being increased by several hundred citizens who had appeared already in arms, and who were being constantly increased by men coming in from every direction. Had it been simply a fight of small-arms there would have been a general willingness to attempt to hold the college against any odds; but their artillery gave them complete control of this, and then we had nothing left. We had, as you are aware, no artillery. A little gun (found at the rolling-mill), that would not chamber a grape-shot, had been sent from Fort Donelson, and mounted on a gun carriage for a 24-pounder, was of no earthly value, and if it had been we had no ammunition for it. All the men in the city, nearly one-third of my aggregate, were already in the hands of the enemy. We had no hope of re-enforcements and no possibility, with the Cumberland and Red Rivers on three sides of us and an enemy indefinite in numbers in front, to retreat. To me then was submitted the question whether, against the judgments of all my commissioned officers, and my own most deliberately formed judgment (for I was dealing with a state of facts that for weeks I had contemplated and attempted to provide against), I should sacrifice the lives of my soldiers to the hope of retrieving a reputation for myself and survivors. However strongly personal considerations required my making a desperate resistance my conscience required me to surrender, and now, reviewing all the facts, I think I did my duty.

Anxious to save every possible chance, I stipulated that the surrender should not be made until sundown, at which time I yielded my camp, the entire mass of public property outside having been inevitably in the hands of the enemy from the beginning. I advised against giving parole, and refused to give my own, as did also Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews, Captain Houck, of Company I, and Lieutenant Hetzler, of Company H, acting commissary of subsistence at the post. Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews afterward made an arrangement for a parole for thirty days, at the end of which time we agreed to report to the officer commanding the Confederate forces at Hopkinsville, Ky. The other officers and the enlisted men gave their parole not to take up arms against the Confederate States until exchanged. These paroles I suppose to be binding, as Lieutenant-Colonel Woodward held the commission as lieutenant-colonel of the C. S. Army, and his men were all regularly mustered into service.

I am, general, respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. MASON,

Colonel Seventy-first Ohio Volunteers.

No. 3.

Report of Lieut. Col. George W. Andrews, Seventy-first Ohio Infantry.

COLUMBUS, OHIO,

Camp Chase, September 30, 1862.

SIR: Understanding some censures have been cast upon me by officers dismissed I submit the following:

After the surrender of Clarksville, while the detachment was on its way up the Mississippi River to Benton Barracks, to which General Grant had sent us by telegraphic dispatch, several of the company officers asked me to sit down and write a short statement of the facts as to the surrender. Just as we were going into Saint Louis I sat down and hastily drew for the company officers such a statement as a favor to them, acting, as I supposed, as a mere secretary. I read it over to them, and some of them took it and read it for themselves. One or two read it before it was finished. There had been a difference of opinion as to the surrender between most of them and myself. I was opposed to it, as every one of them well knew, and I supposed they wished to justify their votes by the circumstances, which I was willing they should undertake to do. I had no earthly object to represent them improperly, as we well understood our relative positions on the subject of the surrender.

Previous to that unfortunate affair not a word within my recollection of unpleasantness ever passed between myself and any one of the company officers concerned. For nearly four months I had been separated from them and had a separate command at Fort Donelson of the balance of our regiment. I had never visited Clarksville but once, and then to stay but a very short time, which visit was made nearly three months before the surrender. I was at this time, as I supposed, upon a mere visit, expecting to very shortly return to my own command at Fort Donelson. I had thrown up a small fort at Donelson, the old fort of the enemy being greatly too large for my small force to occupy. I had got up a couple of pieces of artillery that were attempted to be disabled by the enemy at the old fort, repaired them, and so arranged the little fort, as I believed, and as I expressed to Colonel Mason, I could defend and hold it against any force that could, in the then condition of the country, be brought against it.

I was at Clarksville but a short time when the attack was made, and knew little or nothing about the approaches to the town or the arrangements made by our force to resist attacks, and though believing the force menacing us much superior to us in numbers, I thought we ought to fight with the hope of driving the enemy back. For the first time I had unpleasant words with some of the company officers.

I think Colonel Mason committed a great error in calling the company officers together, and so expressed my opinion at the time. I had the men drawn in line ready to fight when he came and when the flag of truce came, and I thought then, as I think now, a good fight could have been made. But the vote stood greatly against it; that is to say, when first taken four company officers with myself voted to fight and balance to surrender, and part of the latter were exceedingly eager so to do. Now that the Government has condemned the act of surrender I am informed that the officers who voted to surrender desire to excuse their conduct by saying, among other things, that they did not understand a statement they asked me to write for them. It was right their position should be known.

They voted to surrender and of course advised it. If they had done otherwise no responsibility but to fight would have rested on them. In this I only desire to set myself right, and having done so I subscribe myself, very respectfully,

GEO. W. ANDREWS,

Lieutenant-Colonel Seventy-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

No. 4.

Statement of Company Officers of the Seventy-first Ohio Infantry, with War Department General Orders, Nos. 120, 133, of 1862, &c.

The undersigned, commissioned officers of the line, who were at Clarksville, Tenn., on duty at the time of the surrender, have read with deep regret a telegraphic dispatch purporting to come from Russellville and comments thereon, giving a basely false report of the action. To the end of obtaining simple justice we submit a faithful statement of the facts:

About ten days after the battle of Shiloh our regiment was sent from thence to garrison and hold Fort Donelson and Clarksville. Four companies were stationed at the former place, under Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews; the other six at Clarksville, under Colonel Mason. We had lost 137 men in the battle of Shiloh out of 510, balance of regiment being sick in hospital at the time.

We were divided to garrison the above places. After sending back to Ohio the sick we did not all told number 300 men fit for duty; still both places have been held for more than three months. Our number for duty has never at Clarksville numbered 200. Colonel Mason constantly called on superior officers for re-enforcements and for artillery, but because of supposed greater necessity at other places neither were sent. Rumors of designed attacks upon us were received for seven days, and by Colonel Mason's order several temporary rifle pits were constructed. A few days before the attack Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews came up from Donelson, 45 miles distant, and Major Hart was sent to take his place at the fort.

On the morning of the attack Colonel Mason was near the river attending to the duties of the post, and upon hearing of the enemy's approach made his way to the camp. Upon the approach of the enemy Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews immediately placed all men in camp in line of battle. Detachments had been sent to guard steamers with Government stores on the way to Nashville, others on telegraph line, and still others to guard Government stores on the landing, so that at the time not more than 125 were in line.

As Colonel Andrews was preparing to open fire upon the enemy Colonel Mason had by a circuitous route and rapid movements reached the camp. At that moment a flag of truce approached from the enemy. Of course all movements were halted, and the messenger was sent to Colonel Mason. He immediately summoned us to his quarters in council. The messenger stated he was sent to demand a surrender, with the condition that private property should be respected and the force allowed to retain its colors.

The true condition of affairs was for a moment canvassed. It was certain that a force of from 800 to 1,000 was drawn up before us, supported by two batteries of artillery; the messenger said a greater number. Colonel Woodward, commanding, conjointly with Col. A. R. Johnson, the enemy, was called, and Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews asked to be permitted to pass along the enemy's lines to ascertain the true number. After some parleying the request was granted. He returned and reported that as near as he could ascertain about 400 cavalrymen were drawn up in line some 400 yards distant, one company armed with new 16-shooter rifles, one company with carbines and sabers, balance with double-barreled shot-guns; at the left and rear were drawn up about 100 infantry; at other points of street crossings were stationed probably 200 men; besides these about 150 cavalry had dashed through the city to the landing. This was Colonel Andrews' report. But several others had reconnoitered and discovered two batteries of artillery planted within 500 yards of us. The people, 6,000 or 7,000 in number and containing at least 1,000 fighting men, were rising and turning out armed. There were but five or six Union families in the city. We had not the sign of artillery but a little bell-muzzled piece Colonel Andrews had patched up at Donelson and brought along; a grape-shot could not be put in its chamber; we had no ammunition for that. Under these circumstances we thought it madness to hold out, and we unanimously advised Colonel Mason to surrender.

Report of Maj. William H. Sidell, Fifteenth U. S. Infantry, and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

NASHVILLE, August 20, 1862.

GENERAL: Five companies Seventy-first Ohio, 350 men; one small gun, with intrenchments and rifle pits, captured without resistance on Monday noon. Enemy entered suburbs at 10; sent flag of truce and received capitulation at 12.

Steamboat Fisher just coming up with corn and oats and other stores taken and grain thrown in river. Mason and his men sent down (destination Camp Chase) with Confederate guard as far as latter could safely go. Enemy only 300 strong, all cavalry, under Johnson, Woodward, and Garth. Nothing but shot-guns, and their vicinity known to Mason at the time. Postmaster, collector, and railroad engineer kept prisoners on demand of citizens, who want to hang them, but Johnson opposes. Half the Confederates left yesterday, supposed for Fort Don-elson, and remainder probably went last night. Enemy had no artillery or wagons or respectable arms; came from Hopkinsville and State Line.

Public goods were sold at auction; private respected. The wires were cut both ways prior to attack.

AUGUST 19-20, 1862.—Scout from Woodville to Guntersville, Ala., and vicinity.

Report of Maj. James W. Paramore, Third Ohio Cavalry.

CAMP THIRD OHIO CAVALRY,
Woodville, Ala., August 21, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report the safe arrival on last evening of squadron A and D, sent out on the 19th instant, under my command, on a scout to Guntersville and vicinity. I proceeded via Vienna and around the bend of the river, and returned by Law's Landing, camping at Henryville. On the first [day] of the scout I captured as prisoners Capt. J. B. Turney, Company K, First Tennessee, and Private John T. Wilson, same company and regiment, with a large number of letters, which they were attempting to smuggle through our lines into Tennessee; took as prisoners, with their horses, Thomas B. Yates and A. C. Shaffner, with Southern papers, letters, and about $960 in Confederate bonds and money, which they were also smuggling through our lines from rebel officers and soldiers. I think they are also connected with the rebel army as soldiers or spies.

On Wednesday, the second day of the scout, I seized 12 good working mules from the estate of Alexander Erskine, and receipted for the same for the use of the United States; also 6 negroes, belonging to the same estate, who have recently been employed in the rebel service at Guntersville, Ala., in constructing earthworks, digging rifle pits, &c. I also seized 1 mule of John Rayburn, 3 from John Ryan, and 1 from William Read; also 14 head of cattle and 3 mules from B. Mathews, for which no receipts were given. These last-mentioned persons were all over the river, having deserted their homes, and are engaged either as members of companies or aiders or abettors of the guerrillas and bushwhackers in the vicinity. No responsible person could be found to whom to receipt for said property, but I left word that if the owners would call at our headquarters proper vouchers would be given. I sent a small detachment of my command, under command of Lieutenant Williams, to Law's Landing, who captured as prisoners G. W. Morgan, of Colonel Howard's Alabama cavalry, and Ira T. Cobb, an active aider and abettor of the rebels, and also thought to be a bushwhacker. He was armed at the time of his arrest. Also a colored boy, private servant of Major Weeden. He also destroyed two skiffs in which they had crossed the river. The forces across the river continue about the same as contained in my last report.

The letters captured contained valuable information of the movements of the rebel army.

The highest praise is due the officers and soldiers of the command for their energy in procuring the property taken and prisoners captured and the good behavior and gallant conduct during the scout. All of which property is hereby turned over to you, together with the prisoners taken, for your disposal.

Respectfully submitted.

Your obedient servant,

J. W. PARAMORE,
Major, Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

Report of Brig. Gen. Richard W. Johnson, U. S. Army, of action August 21.

HARTSVILLE, TENN., August 22, 1862.

I have the honor to report that on the 11th instant I left McMinnville, Tenn., in command of three regiments of infantry, one battery of artillery, and 640 cavalry, taken from the Second Indiana, Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart; Fourth Kentucky, Captain Chilson; Fifth Kentucky, Major Winfrey, and Seventh Pennsylvania, Colonel Wynkoop. With this force I marched to Smithville, where I was joined by two additional regiments of infantry. With this command I proceeded to Liberty. Here I received an order recalling my infantry and artillery, and I sent them back to McMinnville.

Hearing that the enemy, under Colonel Morgan, was encamped in an old field, in the angle formed by the Cumberland and Caney Fork, with my cavalry I marched to the point designated, and found that I had been incorrectly informed, but was here told that the force had left for Kentucky. I determined to return to Liberty, thence to Cookville, and await their return.

On my arrival at Cookville I received reliable information to the effect that the enemy was encamped in or near Hartsville, and I took up the march for that place; but on reaching it found that he had left the evening before, going in the direction of Gallatin. I took possession of his old camp, captured several prisoners, a number of wagons, mules, horses, &c., which had been taken from Colonel Boone's command.

At this place I heard of the approach of Forrest in my rear, and decided upon uniting my force to the one in Gallatin, for the purpose of resisting an attack from the combined forces of Forrest and Morgan; but on my approach to Gallatin I found that it was in the possession of Morgan's forces, which I was satisfied did not exceed 800 men. I immediately ordered an attack. Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart and Major Winfrey, gallantly leading the charge of their respective regiments, threw their whole strength against the enemy with terrible effect. Colonel Wynkoop and Captain Chilson also brought their commands handsomely into action, and for some time the conflict seemed to progress finely for us. Soon some horses were wounded, riders killed, and confusion began to appear. Regimental and company organizations were lost, and without any apparent cause at least half of my command precipitately fled, throwing away their arms, &c. Many of the men, after getting a thousand yards from the enemy, wildly discharged their revolvers in the air. I sent back a staff officer to rally them, but they could not be induced to reappear on the field. Seeing my advance wavering, I ordered a retreat and tried to rally them behind a hedge and fence, but as soon as the firing became general the whole line gave way. I tried to get them to stand at several different points with the same result. Finally, seeing that I could get them to fight no longer, I ordered a retreat, and marched to the rear about 3 miles, and undertook to reform them.

While reforming, seeing that I was not pursued, I sent in a flag of truce and asked that I might be allowed to bury the dead, but was informed that the dead were being buried, and I was requested to surrender, men and officers being promised their paroles. This request I declined.

Being well satisfied that my men would stand no longer I took up the line of march for Cairo, on the Cumberland, hoping to be able to take a strong position on the river and hold it; but my rear being hotly pressed I formed line of battle with the Second Indiana and Fifth Kentucky and made my arrangements to fight on foot. Soon the firing became brisk, and my line of battle broke and the men fled in every direction, leaving only about 75 on the ground.

Seeing Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart and Major Winfrey I asked them if they thought it possible for them to rally their men, and they replied that they could not, and that a surrender of the few left was all that could be done. Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart made his escape.

With the few left I remained and held the enemy in check long enough to enable the greater portion of my command to ford the river, but finally, being completely surrounded by overwhelming numbers, I was compelled to surrender.

I regret to report that the conduct of the officers and men as a general thing was shameful in the lowest degree, and the greater portion of those who escaped will remember that they did so shamefully abandoning their general on the battle-field, while if they had remained like true and brave men the result of this conflict would have been quite different.

I turn from the mortifying recollection of their action to mention the names of those whose conduct was meritorious in the highest degree. My assistant adjutant-general, Capt. W. C. Turner, exhibited the same cool courage which characterized his conduct on the field of Shiloh. Lieutenant Hill, Second Indiana Cavalry, and acting aide-de-camp, was of great service to me, and proved himself a man of courage. Adjutant Wynkoop, when his regiment became disorganized, joined me, and his gallantry and courage were conspicuous. He was killed at my side assisting me to rally the troops. Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, commanding the Second Indiana, was foremost in the charge, and exhibited great coolness and courage. Captain Leabo, Second Indiana, had command of four companies of his regiment and handled them well, but was taken prisoner early in the action. Captain Starr, with his company (C), did good execution. Major Winfrey, Captain Duncan and his company, Lieutenants Campbell and Cheek, and Captain Carter and his company, all of the Fifth Kentucky, behaved well, and managed their troops with skill and proved themselves gallant men.

My loss was 30 killed, 50 wounded, and 75 taken prisoners. About 200 horses were killed or disabled in this action.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. JOHNSON,
Brigadier-General.

Report of Col. Edward M. McCook, Second Indiana Cavalry, of action August 21.

MURFREESBOROUGH, August 31, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose the report of Lieut. Col. R. R. Stewart, commanding that portion of my regiment engaged in the fight with Morgan's rebel forces at Gallatin on the 21st instant. It is a plain and concise statement of facts, to which I would most respectfully call your attention.

At the time the last expedition in pursuit of Morgan started I was absent on special duty, but from the past good conduct of my regiment, as well as reports, official and unofficial, which I have carefully compared, I feel satisfied that none, either officers or men, in Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart's command were responsible for this disaster or should share its disgrace.

I have carefully preserved and examined the reports of company officers, and of course drew my conclusions concerning this fight from them. These conclusions differ so widely from the statements contained in a printed paper published in the Louisville Journal, purporting to be the official report of Brigadier-General Johnson, that I feel it to be my duty to respectfully request a court of inquiry, to convene at the earliest day practicable.

If my command or any of them have conducted themselves in a manner unworthy brave soldiers and true men I desire to know it, that their shame may be exposed; if otherwise, then simple justice demands that they shall be fully exculpated from any disgrace which may attach to this affair. If there has been cowardice or incompetency, or both combined, on the part of either officers or men, is it not due the gallant Army of the Ohio, upon which no stain has ever yet rested, that the responsibility should be fixed where it belongs?

I have the honor to inclose herewith a list of killed, wounded, and missing of my regiment in the engagement,* and should the general commanding deem copies of reports of company officers necessary to sustain my request for a court of inquiry I will forward them so soon as required.

* Nominal list omitted shows 14 enlisted men killed; 2 officers and 40 enlisted men wounded, and 1 officer and 29 enlisted men missing.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK,
Colonel, Commanding Regiment.

Col. J. B. FRY, Chief of Staff, Army of the Ohio.

No. 3.

Report of Lieut. Col. Robert R. Stewart, Second Indiana Cavalry, of action August 21.

NASHVILLE, TENN., August 22, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report herewith the part taken by my command in the engagement which occurred between General Johnson and General Morgan on the 21st instant near Gallatin.

Leaving McMinnville on the 11th instant, our efforts to find or obtain intelligence of the whereabouts of the enemy were fruitless until the 19th instant, when at Cookeville we obtained reliable information that General Morgan, with a command 800 strong, was at Hartsville. This intelligence we got by intercepting the enemy's mail.

General Johnson here asked my advice as to whether we should follow in pursuit. I replied that we had been in search of the information just received, and urged that we should follow in the morning, with a force of cavalry about 700 strong, consisting of detachments of the Second Indiana, Seventh Pennsylvania, Fourth Kentucky, and Fifth Kentucky Regiments. We took up the line of march and moved 2½ miles beyond Hartsville, where we recaptured some prisoners, horses, mules, and wagons which had been taken from Colonel Boone a few days previous. At this place we learned that Morgan had gone to re-take Gallatin. Early next morning we pushed forward in the direction of Gallatin. My command—the Second Indiana—composed the advance of the column. I threw forward Companies C and D as an advance guard. After moving some 9 or 10 miles, Captain Johnson, of Company D, sent back word that they were in sight of the enemy's pickets. I returned the order to the advance guard to press them. This being done, and 1½ miles farther advanced, word was returned from the front to the column that the enemy in force were moving to the right and left. We also received reliable intelligence that Morgan had been re-enforced, and that his command was at least 3,000, consisting of cavalry and infantry, all of which I communicated to General Johnson, who in reply ordered me to engage them.

I here halted the advance guard, and the enemy appearing in heavy columns on my right, I had my men to throw down the fence of an open field, marched my regiment in, formed it into line, gave the command forward, and opened fire upon the enemy's column, which after two volleys was broken, and we drove them about 500 yards, when a terrific fire was opened upon the right and left flanks of my command. Seeing that no support came to my aid, I ordered Captain Leabo to take command of the right squadron, face it to the right, and protect the right flank. Discovering that this force was insufficient for the purpose I ordered Companies A and B to charge in aid of Captain Leabo, which they did, but the fire being so destructive, they were compelled to retire after severe loss. At the same time I made an effort to change front to the left, but here I received orders from General Johnson to fall back, which command my men executed in perfect order, marching off the field in a walk.

I gained my second position and formed my command front to the rear on the left of an old log stable, and held the ground until the Fifth Kentucky, panic-stricken, fled from the field in disorder. Here I again received orders from General Johnson to fall back. In the execution of this order the enemy pressed us hard, yet I am proud to report that my men moved in order and gained their third position unconfused at a place called the Cross Lanes, a distance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

General Johnson at this time remarked to me, "Your men have acted most nobly in this fight, but the Kentuckians have disgraced me and my State." Said he, "I believe I will send in a white flag, asking permission to bury my dead." I replied that the idea was a good one, as it would give us an opportunity to restore order and fortify. He called for a white flag, and Captain Turner, with one of my orderlies, proceeded with it to the enemy's lines. While this was transpiring, with my command I gained the advantage of 100 yards of picket and rail fence, which by means of some labor I formed into fortifications, protecting the right and left flanks of my command. This was by far the best position we had occupied, and here we determined to make our best effort. I dismounted my men and ascertained the number of cartridges left, which I found to be an average of 7 rounds to the man.

When Captain Turner returned he reported that the wounded would be properly cared for and the dead decently interred and that General Morgan desired an interview with General Johnson. Whereupon General Johnson, with the white flag, rode to General Morgan, and in about twenty minutes returned and informed me of the result of the interview, namely, that Morgan had demanded an immediate surrender and would parole without delay both officers and men—allowing the former to retain their side-arms—which he had refused, and, said he, "We must get out of here," and ordered a retreat.

I commanded my men to mount, and taking my place in the advance marched off in column of fours and in a walk. We had gone about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the direction of Cairo when the report came forward that the enemy were charging our rear. General Johnson here ordered me to face my men front to the rear and resist the enemy's charge, which I executed, and had formed line, when the Fifth Kentucky came dashing through in a style of confusion more complete than the flight of a drove of stampeded buffaloes, if possible disgracing their former glorious conduct. There appeared to be a question of rivalry between officers and men for which should outvie in the disgrace of their cowardly scamper. After they had got through my ranks order was restored, and we waited some ten minutes for the reported enemy, giving my men orders to reserve their fire; they faithfully did so until the rebels advanced to within 25 yards, then, upon order given, opened a volley which broke the rebel line and threw them back in confusion some 500 yards. In the mean time General Johnson's whole command, save the Second Indiana, had left and taken up a hurried retreat.

Here General Johnson rode up to me and asked what he should do. I replied that no officer could command those damned cowards, pointing toward the Fifth Kentucky retreating. He then said to me, "I shall surrender," and asked me for a white handkerchief, which I refused to give. He then asked my chief bugler to sound a parley; the bugler replied that he "did not know the call." General Johnson then obtained a white handkerchief from some one and started it through the lines of my regiment. It was here that I rode in front of my regiment and told my men that they were about to be surrendered; and, said I, "Indianians, never surrender; follow me!" and moved off with all of my men who had heard the order. We found the enemy on our right and left. On our retreat luckily we found a negro, whom I pressed, and who guided me to a ford, and we were enabled to cross the Cumberland River. Having crossed in safety, I posted Captain Ross and 5 men as pickets, to watch and report the movement of the enemy. I had proceeded about 5 miles when Captain Ross reported a portion of the rebels had crossed and were in pursuit. I ordered the "Trot—March," but soon learned that it was a portion of my own men, with Captains Johnson, Kessler, Adjutant Woolley, and Lieutenants Beck, Barnett, and Barnes, who, occupying a position at the left of my line, did not hear my order to follow. I ordered a halt and waited until they came up; then moved to Stone River and encamped for the night.

Along the whole line of retreat evidences of the disgraceful conduct of the Fifth Kentucky appeared. Enfield rifles, pistols, sabers, saddlebags, canteens, curry-combs, brushes, and hats had been thrown away and abandoned in helter-skelter style. Perfect disorder must have prevailed during this cattle-like scamper.

With my command I arrived at Nashville on the morning following at 8 o'clock a. m., when I learned that the Fifth Kentucky and other portions of General Johnson's command had been swift enough to reach Nashville on the evening before.

Although the result of the engagement was an unfortunate one, yet I am happy to report the uniform good conduct of the Second Indiana Cavalry.

Further evidence of the gallantry of my command appears by reference to the printed report of Adjutant Woolley, to which your attention is most respectfully called.*

I have not space to enumerate individual acts. Suffice to say that the highest compliments which I could pay to any one is due to all.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. R. STEWART,
Lieutenant-Colonel Second Indiana Cavalry.

Col. E. M. McCook.

No. 5.

Report of Col. George C. Wynkoop, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, of action August 21.

NASHVILLE, August 26, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the forces engaged near Gallatin, Tenn., on the 21st instant, under command of Brigadier-General Johnson, now a prisoner of war.

We left Hartsville early on the morning of the 21st instant and marched in the direction of Gallatin, which is 14 miles west of Hartsville, with the Second Indiana Cavalry, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, numbering 287 men, in the advance; then my command, consisting of detachments of three companies of my regiment and two of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, numbering in all 187 men, and a detachment of the Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, under command of Major Winfrey, numbering 293 men, in the rear; our force, including officers and men, numbering some 767 men.

We marched on slowly until about 8 o'clock, when General Johnson was informed that the rebel pickets were driven in 3 miles from Gallatin. We were then ordered to march in close column by fours. Soon after the general received word by a courier from the advance guard that the enemy were flanking us right and left. We then moved on rapidly about 1 mile, when we were ordered to halt and take down the fence on our right, and soon our line of battle was formed in the field.

The enemy then made a stand to our right, and the Second Indiana was ordered to charge upon them; the charge was a complete success, and threw the rebel line into great confusion. Too great praise cannot be awarded Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart for the manner in which he conducted this charge.

My command was ordered to engage the enemy on the left, where they were firing from behind trees and bushes, but owing to the superiority of their arms I could not do effective service. I ordered my men to take down a fence and was about to charge upon them, when I was ordered by General Johnson to fall back.

About this time the Fifth Kentucky seemed to have been panic-stricken and retreated in great disorder. I fell back to the brow of a hill and formed a line, men dismounted; the rebels pushed forward and a fiercely contested battle ensued.

The general, seeing the superior numbers of enemy, ordered us to retreat to a cross-road, where we halted, and the general sent in a flag of truce by his adjutant, asking permission to bury his dead. Col. John H. Morgan, who seemed to be in command of the rebel forces, sent word that he would attend to our wounded and bury our dead, and solicited an interview with General Johnson. The general rode over and had an interview with Colonel Morgan, who demanded an immediate and unconditional surrender, saying he was prepared to march three heavy columns of cavalry on us.

General Johnson returned, saying that further resistance would be useless, owing to the superior number of the enemy. He immediately ordered a retreat, and after retreating about 1 mile found that the enemy were charging on our rear guard. We then halted and again formed a line of battle, with the men dismounted. We held our fire until the enemy advanced within about 50 yards, when we poured in a volley which scattered them in all directions.

We now fell back to a ravine and awaited their coming; they soon advanced, and met with the same result as before. We were about to charge upon them when to our right a heavy column of rebel cavalry dashed forward and was about to cut us off from the river. General Johnson, seeing them, hoisted a white flag and proposed to surrender his whole force. Seeing that to stand now would be useless, I, with part of my command and parts of the Second Indiana and Fifth Kentucky, numbering in all about 200 men, dashed forward through their lines and made good our escape; the balance of our force, consisting of parts of the three commands, broke to the left and crossed the Cumberland River about 4 miles to the east of the town of Lebanon. We arrived in Nashville about 2 o'clock next morning.

The force of the enemy I estimate at about from 1,400 to 1,500 of Morgan's cavalry and about 1,000 armed citizens.

The following is a list of the killed, wounded, and missing of the three different commands, as near as can be ascertained:

Of my command—

Commissioned officers killed, 1 (Adj. N. Wynkoop); commissioned officers wounded 2 (Capt. Levi Chilson and Lieut. Joseph Vale). Non-commissioned officers and privates killed, 8; missing, 43.

Of the Second Indiana Cavalry—

Commissioned officers wounded, 2; missing, 1. Non-commissioned officers and privates killed, 12; wounded, 40; missing, 31.

Of the Fifth Kentucky Cavalry—

Commissioned officers wounded, 3. Non-commissioned officers and privates missing, 101.

Total killed, wounded, and missing, 244.

The report of killed may not be correct, as many of the missing may have been killed. All the officers and men of my command fought with great courage and coolness during the engagement, promptly obeying all commands.

Great credit is due Captain Chilson and Lieutenant Raplee, of the Fourth Kentucky, as well as their men, for courage shown throughout the engagement.

My report would have been handed in much sooner had it not been for my illness since my arrival here.

I am, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

GEO. C. WYNKOOP,

Colonel Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Reports of Col. John H. Morgan, Second Kentucky Cavalry (Confederate), including proclamation.

HEADQUARTERS MORGAN'S BRIGADE,
Gallatin, Tenn., August 22, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that having received information while at Hartsville that a force of 300 Federal infantry had arrived in this place on the morning of the 19th and were committing depredations on the inhabitants, robbing houses and arresting all those citizens who had shown kindness to the officers and men of my command while stationed here, I left my camp near Hartsville at 12 m. on the same day and encamped about 5 miles from Gallatin.

Fearing that the Federals would return by rail to Nashville, I dispatched Capt. [J. B.] Hutcheson with Company F and a portion of my advanced guard to burn up the trestle work at Saundersville, and thus cut off their retreat, while I attacked Gallatin. Some delay was experienced owing to the difficulties of the ground during a dark night, but the plan met with entire success. The trestle work was burned, and the guard of about 60 men driven into a stockade were followed so closely by my men that they ran them out on the other side, killing some and taking 16 prisoners; the remainder got into the woods and escaped.

The 300 Federals having, I suppose, advice of my arrival, attempted to leave by train with some 60 citizens they had arrested in Gallatin, with no other charge against them than that of being favorable to our cause, but cut off by Company E, of my command, they were obliged to leave the cars and march their prisoners along the Nashville railway track. I pushed on with four companies and came up with a detachment of about 80 men, under command of Captain [Abraham H.] Miller; 35 prisoners were taken by my men and the remainder either fell or escaped into the woods. A second detachment were reached who had charge of the prisoners. I recovered 40 of these poor fellows, who had been treated with great cruelty; the remainder were hurried on by the Federals and lodged in a block-house, or stockade, which I attacked, but met with such determined resistance that I retreated toward Gallatin. Before this fort I lost 2 of my best officers and 3 men.

I took in this expedition some 120 prisoners, killed and wounded some 60 of the enemy, and carried off at least 200 muskets, which I have distributed among my new recruits.* Had I not been obliged to leave my howitzers at Knoxville to repair the carriages worn-out in my last expedition to Kentucky I could have captured every detachment of guards on bridges between Gallatin and Nashville; but these stockades are not to be taken by troops unaccompanied by artillery.

When evening came I was with my command within 8 miles of Nashville, having destroyed every bridge between Gallatin and the Edgefield Junction. I have learned also from an engineer of high standing that the tunnel burned on the last expedition is so completely destroyed that it never can be repaired, the rocks having fallen in in every direction.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, general, your most obedient servant,

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel, Commanding Cavalry.

General RANDOLPH.

HDQRS. MORGAN'S REGT., Hartsville, Tenn., Aug. 22, 1862.

GENERAL: I beg to confirm my dispatch of the 22d instant announcing the result of yesterday's expedition. My command, consisting of my own regiment, 700 strong, and a squadron of Texas Rangers, numbering about 100 men, returned that day, worn-out, to Gallatin.

* As reported by the regimental records the Union loss in the skirmishes at Pilot Knob, Drake's Creek, and Manscoe Creek, near Edgefield Junction, August 20, was 2 men killed, 3 men wounded, and 5 officers and 158 men captured.

At 11 p. m. I received information from one of my friendly scouts that the enemy's cavalry were encamped on the road-side between Castalian Springs and Hartsville, a distance of only 12 miles from my camp. Judging from the fact that they had halted by the road-side, I concluded that they intended to march at night and attack early in the morning, and I made my preparations accordingly, dispatching scouts upon whom I could depend to bring me positive information as to the enemy's movements. At daybreak my column was on the move, and as the advanced guard reached the head of the town my pickets came galloping in, followed by my principal scout, who reported that he was closely pursued by a large body of cavalry. Not wishing, on account of the inhabitants, to make Gallatin the scene of our contest, I advanced my column, and was greeted on reaching the Hartsville pike by a heavy fire from that direction. I dismounted the two leading companies to fight and threw them into the woods on the left of the road. The enemy increased his fire and I gradually had my whole command engaged.

The fight began at 6.30 o'clock and was maintained without much advantage on either side, the enemy having perhaps rather the best of it at first, until about 8.30 o'clock, when they began to fall back and my men to redouble their efforts. At 9.30 o'clock I had driven them 4 miles and was preparing for a final charge, when a flag of truce was brought proposing an armistice in order to bury their dead. My reply was that I could entertain no proposition except unconditional surrender. I learned then that the troops were commanded by Brigadier-General Johnson. During the parley the enemy had formed into line of battle, and were evidently ready to defend themselves from any fresh attack. I divided my force into three divisions, leading one myself in the direction which I thought General Johnson had taken. Maj. [G. W.] Morgan had five companies under his orders on my left. Lieut. Col. [B. W.] Duke, on my right, had three companies and his advanced guard. Some delay was occasioned by the non-arrival of my gallant Texas Rangers, who formed part of the body under my own immediate orders. They had been separated from their horses during the preceding fight and had not been able to recover them in time to come to the front. On their arrival we marched on in the direction of the enemy, and Colonel Duke's division, coming within sight, advanced at a canter and opened fire. General Johnson's forces, being on a good pike, retreated for some time faster than my men, who were on difficult ground, could follow, but after a pursuit of some 2 miles they were overtaken and compelled to fight.

They were dismounted and formed behind their horses. The position they had selected was a very good one, especially as they considerably outnumbered Colonel Duke's force, which was the only one opposed to them; Major Morgan and my own detachment, in the eagerness of pursuit, having taken too far to the left.

Colonel Duke reports that on perceiving that the enemy had halted he formed his three companies and the advanced guard into columns of squadrons, preserving the regular distances between each, so as to be able to form into line at command and attack. This was done with admirable precision and coolness by his men, and nothing could exceed their gallantry. The enemy were formed under the brow of a hill, and my men were drawn up above them, so that their fire told with effect on my line, while that of the attacking party went over their heads. After a very sharp engagement of about fifteen minutes they broke and ran. General Johnson, his adjutant-general (Captain Turner), Major Winfrey, and a number of privates were captured, but the main body escaped to the hills through the woods and high corn, making for the Cumberland River.

Thus ended an action in which my command, not exceeding 700 men (one whole company being in the rear with prisoners), succeeded in defeating a brigade of 1,200 chosen cavalry, sent by General Buell expressly to take me or drive me out of Tennessee, killing and wounding some 180 and taking 200 prisoners, including the brigadier-general commanding and the greater part of the regimental officers.

My loss in both actions amounted to 5 killed, 18 wounded, and 2 missing. Among the wounded was Captain Huffman, who had his arm shattered by a ball while leading gallantly on his brave Texan Rangers, a small body of men commanded by Maj. [R. M.] Gano, of whom I cannot speak too highly, as they have distinguished themselves ever since they joined my command not only by their bravery, but their good, soldier-like conduct.

To all my officers and men my best acknowledgments are due. Nothing but hard fighting carried them through.

To my personal staff I am deeply indebted. Col. St. Leger Grenfell, acting adjutant-general, ably supported me; Captain Lewellen, my quartermaster, and Capt. Green Roberts, who acted as my aides-de-camp, were most active and fearless in carrying my orders, and the captains of companies cool and collected in the performance of them.

Lieutenant-Colonel Duke led on his regiment, if possible, with more than his usual gallantry, and contributed, by the confidence with which he has inspired his men, to insure the success of the day. Lieutenant-Colonel Duke makes particular mention of the cool and determined manner in which Lieut. [W. S.] Rogers, commanding advanced guard, Capts. Hutcheson, [J. T.] Cassell, and Lieut. [George] White, respectively, commanding the three companies composing his division, behaved. In fact the conduct of both officers and men deserves the highest praise.

I received every assistance from the patriotism and zeal of the neighboring citizens, among whom Major Duffey and Capt. R. A. Bennet were pre-eminent.

I have also to report that I have received a dispatch from General Forrest, stating that he has encamped within 8 miles of me with a re-enforcement of 800 men, but no artillery. The want of this arm cripples my movements and prevents my advance with that certainty of effect which a battery would afford.

Recruits are daily and hourly arriving. The population seems at last to be thoroughly aroused and to be determined on resistance.

I hope shortly, general, to be able to report further successes, and rest assured that no exertions on my part shall be wanting, no sacrifices on that of my officers and men will prevent our giving as good an account of the enemy as our small numbers will admit of.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, general, your most obedient servant,

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel, Commanding Cavalry, C. S. Army.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL.

P. S.—This morning I received positive information as to General Nelson's intentions and movements. He is retreating from Nashville to re-enforce Bowling Green at the head of 1,500 infantry, 200 cavalry, and 12 cannon. It is evidently the intention of the Federals to attempt the defense of the line at Bowling Green and Lebanon.

Proclamation.

HEADQUARTERS MORGAN'S BRIGADE,
Hartsville, Tenn., August 22, 1862.

SOLDIERS: Your gallant bearing during the last two days will not only be inscribed in the history of the country and the annals of this war, but is engraven deeply in my heart.

Your zeal and devotion on the 20th at the attack of the trestle work at Saundersville and of the Edgefield Junction stockade, your heroism during the two hard fights of yesterday, have placed you high on the list of those patriots who are now in arms for our Southern rights.

All communication cut off betwixt Gallatin and Nashville, a body of 300 infantry totally cut up or taken prisoners, the liberation of those kind friends arrested by our revengeful foes for no other reason than their compassionate care of our sick and wounded, would have been laurels sufficient for your brows; but, soldiers, the utter annihilation of General Johnson's brigade, composed of twenty-four picked companies of regulars and sent on purpose to take us, raises your reputation as soldiers and strikes fear into the craven hearts of your enemies. General Johnson and his staff with 200 men taken prisoners, 64 killed, and 100 wounded, attest the resistance made, and bear testimony to your valor. But our victories have not been achieved without loss. We have to mourn some brave and dear comrades. Their names will remain in our breasts; their fame outlives them. They died in defense of a good cause; they died like gallant soldiers, with their front to the foe.

Officers and men, your conduct makes me proud to command you. Fight always as you fought yesterday and you are invincible.

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel, Commanding Cavalry.

No. 1.

Report of Col. John K. Mizner, Third Michigan Cavalry.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE CAVALRY DIVISION,
Tusculumbia, Ala., August 24, 1862.

Having been directed to furnish a special report touching the conduct of the cavalry in the affair at Trinity, in which our force was driven off by the enemy and a train destroyed, I have the honor to submit the following, which has been furnished me by Major Nelson, Seventh Illinois Cavalry, stationed at Courtland:

Lieut. S. F. Lee, commanding 26 men of Company F, Seventh Illinois Cavalry, reports that when within about 2 miles of Trinity he became aware that three companies of the enemy were moving to intercept the train. On advancing farther he learned that there were six companies one-quarter of a mile from him taking dinner. Here he took 2 prisoners (surgeons) and 3 horses and then turned toward Trinity. Half a mile above Trinity he found the train off the track. He dispatched a messenger to Fox Creek, requesting re-enforcements, the whole force at the train being 20 infantry and 26 cavalry. They formed a line to defend the train, and remained in line about an hour before the enemy advanced. Lieutenant Lee then dismounted his men, leaving one man to hold four horses, and placed his men behind the embankment of the road, when the enemy, advancing to within gun-shot, commenced firing. He says:

We returned the fire, which caused our horses to break loose, and the enemy closed rapidly upon both flanks, and I saw, if we remained, we would be cut off. I therefore ordered my men to fall back, but too late for all to escape. There are 1 commissioned officer and 18 men missing. I learn that 4 were wounded.

Lieutenant Voris, in command of 27 men, Seventh Illinois Cavalry, reports that he had patrolled the road to Fort Rose, and started back for Decatur at 10.30 a. m. Had got as far as Bolding's farm when he met the messenger from Company F, informing him of the condition of the train and threatened attack. He says:

I proceeded through the woods and fields until within about one-half mile of the railroad, where I met Lieutenant Lee, in full retreat. The timber and brush was so thick I could not form my men in line, so I fell back one-half mile, where I endeavored to form a line in a small open space. Before one-half the men were in line the enemy were upon us, breaking my ranks and scattering the men in every direction. I succeeded in getting them together at the Decatur road.

His loss is stated at 1 man dangerously wounded and 2 missing.

Major Nelson says that although Lieutenant Voris is quite a young man there is no braver officer. He is reported to have killed 2 of the enemy with his own hand.

It is possible that more might have been done, but our force being so small, the train off the track, and the enemy appearing in such greatly superior numbers, compelled our men, for their own safety, to abandon the train to its fate.

Major Koehler's report, since received, is the same in substance. Reports from other sources reflect great discredit upon the cavalry, but the faults of others are more easily seen than our own, hence the probable cause of discrepancy. I understand that many reported missing have since returned.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. K. MIZNER,

Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF THE TENNESSEE,
Tupelo, Miss., August 31, 1862.

GENERAL: I have just received from Captain [P. D.] Roddey a report of an engagement which he had with the enemy on the 22d instant at Trinity, near Decatur. He states that the enemy's loss in killed and wounded cannot be less than 30; that he captured 37 prisoners, 4 of whom, being wounded, were released on their verbal parole; that he took 5 horses and their equipments, 37 stand of small-arms, and $407 in specie, together with some clothing and sutler's stores. He also destroyed a locomotive and train of cars.

Captain Roddey asks permission to increase his command to a regiment, which he says he can easily raise for the war. I submit the matter to the decision of the general commanding, and respectfully suggest that the four companies of Forrest's cavalry, commanded by Capt. [W. C.] Bacot, which were lately near Guntersville, might be placed under Captain Roddey. These companies were detached by the general commanding some six or eight weeks ago under orders which were not communicated to me, and I do not know therefore whether they are still under my command or not. The headquarters of their regiment are here. It might be well to disband this regiment and to attach the four Alabama companies to an Alabama regiment under Captain Roddey and to consolidate the Tennessee companies here into another regiment.

Yours, very respectfully,

STERLING PRICE,
Major-General, Commanding.

LEXINGTON, KY., August 24, 1862.

GENERAL: I regret to report that the enemy moved against Colonel Metcalfe yesterday afternoon. The colonel led his men to attack them on the Big Hill, but they broke and fled, leaving him and his lieutenant-colonel alone on the field. A small body of the Third Tennessee stood and fought, but were driven back to Richmond, after rescuing Metcalfe and Oden. Then enemy advanced and demanded surrender of Richmond. Metcalfe refused to surrender. Link's brigade reached the place in time and is now ready to defend it. Link has three regiments and three field pieces. The conduct of Metcalfe's men was most disgraceful. He refuses to command them any longer. He thinks his loss about 50. I am arresting his runaways as they come to town. Link will whip the rebels if they attack him.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. OF THE ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
No. 2. } Richmond, Ky., August 26, 1862.

On Saturday, the 23d instant, the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, under Colonel Metcalfe, together with a battalion of Houk's Third Tennessee Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles, attacked the enemy on Big Hill, in Rockcastle County. Colonel Metcalfe led the attack with much gallantry, but had the mortification to find that not more than 100 of his regiment followed him; the remainder, at the first cannon-shot, turned tail and fled like a pack of cowards, and are now dispersed over a half dozen counties, some fleeing as far as Paris.

All provost-marshals are hereby ordered to arrest and commit to jail any of this regiment, officers or men, who may be found, under any pretense, to be in their neighborhoods, and report their names and rank to the adjutant-general at these headquarters, and to hold them subject to orders.

The conduct of the Tennessee battalion, under Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles, presents a refreshing contrast to the foregoing. They met the enemy bravely, checked his advance, rescued Colonel Metcalfe, abandoned by his own regiment, and, though too few to retrieve the action, at least saved the honor of our arms. Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles will accept the thanks of the major-general, and convey to his officers and soldiers his high appreciation of their gallantry and good conduct.

By order of Major-General Nelson, commanding:

J. MILLS KENDRICK,
Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS KIRBY SMITH'S BRIGADE,
Big Hill, Madison County, Ky., August 24, 1862.

GENERAL: After leaving you I moved the evening of the 21st with the remaining portion of my command toward Mount Vernon to sustain Colonel Morrison, who had been sent two days previous with instructions to occupy Mount Vernon and Crab Orchard. The latter place he failed to occupy, General Smith, with his brigade, having taken possession several hours previous to his arrival. Finding the forces of General Smith too strong to be dispersed, I concluded to drive in his pickets and engage his attention until I could remove all the wagons along my route, hoping by that time to be re-enforced by Colonel Starnes. Having accomplished my objects, and the re-enforcements failing to arrive, I determined to cross over to the Richmond road and move against that place.

On the morning of the 23d instant I left Mount Vernon and took a mountain path that led me into the London and Richmond road. About 3 o'clock in the evening I came within the vicinity of their pickets and learned that Colonel Metcalfe was posted in a strong position on Big Hill with 800 or 900 cavalry and 300 or 400 infantry. My force now numbered about 650, but notwithstanding his advantage in numbers and position I determined to give him battle, and immediately ordered my men forward and the fight commenced. After an engagement of one hour and twenty minutes I succeeded in driving them from the strongest natural position I have ever seen in complete rout toward Richmond, when night put an end to the pursuit. The jaded condition of my horses alone prevented my capturing the whole command. Learning this morning that Richmond was re-enforced during the night with a brigade of infantry and four pieces of artillery from Lexington I fell back to this place.

My loss in the engagement is 4 killed, 12 wounded, and 21 horses. The enemy left upon the field in killed and wounded 120 men. I have captured and paroled near 150 prisoners and my men are still bringing them in from the mountains.

I captured and brought away from the vicinity of Richmond a wagon train (27 in number), with 40 to 50 extra mules. I have taken up to the present time about 175 wagons and 650 mules and horses. I am unable to give you a report of the contents of the wagons, as I have not received the statement from my brigade quartermaster and commissary, who are stationed at London to forward the trains to you.

I refer you to the inclosed letter* for the numbers and positions of the enemy, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

I cannot close my report without making mention of the gallant conduct of the troops comprising the Kirby Smith brigade—First Georgia Cavalry, Colonel Morrison; First Louisiana Cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Nixon commanding, and the Buckner Guards, a Kentucky company, commanded by Captain Garnett. They all bore the privation and fatigue of the trip without murmur and conducted themselves most gallantly in the presence of the enemy.

Very respectfully,

J. S. SCOTT,
Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

Maj. Gen. E. KIRBY SMITH.

HEADQUARTERS KIRBY SMITH'S BRIGADE,
Big Hill, Madison County, Ky., August 24, 1862.

SIR: I have forwarded to General Smith through you a report of my engagement near this place. During the chase I captured the horses of Colonel Metcalfe and his coat containing his private papers, among which was a letter from General L. Wallace, commanding at Lexington, stating that he would move a brigade of infantry and four pieces of artillery to Richmond on the 23d. A portion of this force reached Richmond on the 23d and the remainder on the morning of the 24th. I would have taken Richmond on the night of the 23d, but had ridden 25 miles over a very broken country before the fight commenced and chased the enemy 10 miles, which so completely crippled up my horses I could go no farther. General G. Clay Smith has a brigade of cavalry at Crab Orchard.

Enlisting is going on rapidly under the various appliances of the Federals and the State is in great excitement. The camp of instruction has been changed from Dick Robinson to Cynthiana, in Harrison County. The Legislature is in session. George McDuffie has resigned and James F. Robinson elected in his stead. Forty or fifty Kentuckians came into my camp this evening to join me, and report large numbers in the adjacent counties anxious to enlist in the Confederate service, but have no means of escape. They are hemmed in by the Home Guards and Federal troops. I have now captured all the trains on both roads to the Gap, and do not see how I can subsist many days longer without going down into the blue-grass region, and this I cannot do without being sustained by infantry. The troops in this State are all raw recruits, and could be scattered to the winds by one-third their number if the move is made at once. My men are very much fatigued and my horses broken down. I would like to have a few days' rest, unless the necessities of the service demand my immediate assistance. I will be on the road (the London and Richmond) between this point and the Potomac River until I receive orders.

*Not found.

Very respectfully,

J. S. SCOTT,
Colonel, Commanding.

Col. J. PEGRAM, Chief of Staff.

AUGUST 27, 1862.—Skirmish at Round Mountain, near Woodbury, Tenn.

Report of Col. William Grose, Thirty-sixth Indiana Infantry.

MURFREESBOROUGH, TENN., August 30, 1862.

GENERAL: I arrived here this morning at 6 o'clock. The forces under my command had an engagement with General Forrest between 3 and 4 o'clock p. m. on the 27th instant at Round Mountain, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Woodbury. He made the attack upon our rear, and as he supposed upon our train. But instead of my train his heavy force came in contact with the Twenty-third Kentucky, under Colonel Mundy. The enemy was handsomely repulsed, and with a portion of Captain Mendenhall's battery, the right wing of the Thirty-sixth Indiana, and Colonel Mundy's regiment we pursued and drove them over 2 miles, scattering them in every direction.

Our loss is 4 of Twenty-third Kentucky and 1 of Lieutenant-Colonel Cochran's cavalry wounded. The loss of the enemy is much larger.

Your obedient servant,

WM. GROSE,
Colonel, Commanding Tenth Brigade.

Brig. Gen. JACOB AMMEN, McMinnville, Tenn.

AUGUST 27, 1862.—Skirmish at Bridgeport, Ala., and attack on Fort McCook, Battle Creek, Tenn.

REPORTS.

No. 1.—Col. Leonard A. Harris, Second Ohio Infantry.

No. 2.—Brig. Gen. Samuel B. Maxey, C. S. Army, with congratulatory orders.

No. 1.

Report of Col. Leonard A. Harris, Second Ohio Infantry.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 21st of August I was directed by Major-General McCook to occupy the fort at the mouth of Battle Creek. On that night I marched into the fort with two regiments of infantry (the Second and Thirty-third Ohio), Edgerton's Ohio battery, and 110 of the Fourth Ohio Cavalry.

On the 22d Major-General Buell directed me to send four companies to Bridgeport to take the place of a regiment of infantry withdrawn from that point.

On the same day I received an order to send one regiment and the battery to General McCook. This left me six companies of the Thirty-third and the cavalry to hold this fort.

On the evening of the 26th, all of the stores having been removed from Bridgeport, in pursuance of orders I withdrew the command of Major Lock to the fort.

On the morning of the 27th I received information that the enemy were crossing at Bridgeport. I ordered the cavalry to Bridgeport, with instructions that if the enemy had crossed to attack him at once, and if possible to drive him into the Tennessee River. I also directed the cavalry on picket on the Jasper road to push forward as far as Jasper and report promptly the advance of the enemy in that direction.

Major Pugh, with the cavalry, had no sooner engaged the force at Bridgeport than the enemy put a battery of four guns, one a siege gun, in position on the opposite bank of the Tennessee River, about 800 yards from the fort. They opened on the fort and camp and shelled it without intermission, except to allow their guns to cool, for twelve hours. I soon received information that the enemy had crossed in force at Bridgeport; that the cavalry had attacked them without success, and were then falling back to the fort. I was satisfied that my scouts would report the Decherd road in possession of the enemy. I therefore made preparation as a last resort to hold a small mountain path which I understood tapped the Decherd road about 8 miles from the fort. I placed three companies of infantry and the cavalry, which had just arrived, at that point, with instructions to hold it to the last extremity.

In the evening my scouts from Jasper reported that the enemy were not advancing in that direction. I immediately directed two companies to proceed to the Battle Creek Ford, where the Jasper road joins the Decherd road, and to hold it against any force that might be brought against them. I also threw a company of riflemen in the pits to annoy the enemy and cover the withdrawal of our forces and stores from the fort. The wagons were loaded with the most valuable stores; the balance were piled up ready to be burned. The tents were cut up and the wagon wheels were wrapped with them. As soon as it was dark I commenced the withdrawal of the forces and the stores for which I had transportation. This I succeeded in doing without loss.

The casualties in the fort were 1 killed and 9 slightly wounded, including my acting assistant adjutant-general, Vandegrift, and orderly, Henry Norris, who is a brave and cool little fellow.

An hour after the last of the forces had been withdrawn Captain Mathews, of the Fourth Ohio Cavalry, applied the torch to the stores which were left behind, completely destroying them.

I arrived with the command at Decherd on the 29th and reported to Major-General Buell at that point.

The enemy had on the day before the attack four regiments of infantry and a battalion of cavalry, under command of General Maxey, and were also in direct communication with Chattanooga, 27 miles by rail, from which place they could receive re-enforcements to any extent.

My force, all told, for duty were 450 of the Thirty-third Ohio Regiment and 110 of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry. Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, who commanded the Thirty-third Ohio, his officers and men, with few exceptions, acted gallantly and to my entire satisfaction. I cannot speak too highly of Captain Mathews, of the cavalry, who executed with promptness and fidelity the arduous duties assigned him. I am also under many obligations to my acting assistant adjutant-general, who acted coolly and gallantly in communicating my orders to the command. Brigade Quartermaster Bird, Commissary Hills, and Quartermaster Colburn, of the Thirty-third Ohio, conducted themselves so as to meet with my entire approbation. They coolly and effectually, under a heavy fire, directed the loading and removal of the stores. Under the circumstances, the necessity of longer holding the fort having passed, I acted according to instructions in withdrawing my command. I believe that the enemy, relying on their command of the Decherd road by their artillery and infantry fire, neglected until it was too late to throw a force in my front as they had done in my rear, which would have necessitated a retreat through the mountains by uncertain and difficult paths.

Very respectfully,

L. A. HARRIS,

Colonel, Commanding Ninth Brigade.

Captain JONES, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Brig. Gen. Samuel B. Maxey, C. S. Army, with congratulatory orders.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., August 31, 1862.

COLONEL: I send with this a copy of Brigadier-General Maxey's report of the affairs at Bridgeport and Battle Creek, in which a part of his command was engaged on the 27th instant. The affairs were conducted with judgment and spirit, deserving high commendation, and I shall be gratified if the general commanding sees proper to notice it in general orders. Such notice of the good conduct of new troops in their first engagement with the enemy would be gratifying and encouraging.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAM. JONES,

Major-General.

Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Inclosure.]

HEADQUARTERS CONFEDERATE STATES FORCES,
Near Graham's, opposite Mouth of Battle Creek, Tenn.,
August 30, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the affairs in which a portion of the troops under my command were engaged on the 27th instant:

Early in the morning I ordered Capt. P. H. Rice, commanding Company A, [J. R.] Howard's battalion Georgia and Alabama cavalry, to ford the Tennessee River about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Bridgeport, and cautiously approach that place and attack the enemy. Captain Rice found, however, that the enemy had precipitately evacuated the night before. This being communicated to me, I ordered the Thirty-second Alabama Regiment of Infantry, Col. [A.] McKinstry, which was concealed on the bank of the river, to cross. Captain Rice was in the mean time ordered to throw his cavalry well out on the Battle Creek and Stevenson roads. Scarcely had the Thirty-second crossed when the cavalry reported enemy's infantry and cavalry approaching in force, the truth of which was made apparent from the clouds of dust in the roads. I immediately ordered the Thirty-second to be formed in line of battle near the crest of the hill in the town, and in a few moments the enemy's cavalry (Fourth Ohio and one other, name not known) dashed up in full speed, and were permitted to come within less than 50 yards of the infantry before a gun was fired, when a galling fire was poured into them and they retreated in great confusion. In a short time clouds of dust warned me of the enemy's approach on our left, and to meet it I had the front of the left wing changed forward in time to receive another dash of cavalry, which was again thrown in confusion by another volley more effective than the first, and he again retreated but reformed, and by the dust I soon saw he was approaching the center. A company of the Thirty-second Alabama, armed with the Enfield rifle, commanded by Lieut. [A.] Sellers, was placed in the center in ambush, and as the enemy came up the hill in very close range this company arose and delivered its deadly fire simultaneously with the wings (separated for cover), and this time they broke and fled in perfect confusion. While this portion of the fight was going on my batteries, consisting of Capt. [S. L.] Freeman's [Tennessee] and Capt. [G. A.] Dure's [Georgia] artillery and one 24-pounder rifle gun, opened out (by previous agreement) on the enemy's works at the mouth of Battle Creek, about 5 miles distant up the river, and continued incessantly during the entire day. The heavy columns of dust bearing toward Stevenson from the enemy's camps around there showed a general commotion. At night I ordered the battery commanders to keep the fire up, believing the enemy, if properly managed, would evacuate before day.

At about 2 o'clock in the morning the work was abandoned in great confusion, the enemy burning most of his commissary stores, but leaving in our possession some $30,000 worth of valuable property, embracing some commissary stores, ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, clothing, all his tents, 32 horses and 4 mules, a few wagons and ambulances, and some few medicines, and a splendid case of surgical instruments, besides some sutlers' stores, a number of officers' trunks, many of the post commander's papers, and some very valuable maps.

It is proper to observe that after the fight commenced at Bridgeport the Third Georgia Cavalry and Twenty-fifth Tennessee Infantry were ordered across, but did not reach the place in time to participate; indeed it was only after the fight had opened that I received notice that the Third Georgia was placed at my disposal temporarily.

I was informed by the major-general commanding several days ago that some cavalry under Colonel Lay would move down the Sequatchie Valley, and I had hoped to have its assistance. At 10 p. m. on the 27th I received a note from Colonel Lay, dated Jasper, 5.30 p. m., informing me that he was there with 550 cavalry, and desired me to inform him of my movements, stating that he heard the cannonading, &c. This I did, with an expression of belief that the enemy would be shelled out before morning, and saying to him in substance that if he would take his position about the mouth of Sweeden's Cove about daylight he would probably get them. It is unfortunate that these suggestions were not acted on, for if they had been the enemy, being panic-stricken by throwing cavalry in his front, the hills on either side, and my forces in rear, would have been easy prey.

I am indebted to Capt. T. M. Scott, assistant adjutant-general; Capt.

C. G. Schultz, assistant inspector-general; Capt. W. H. Lewis, ordnance officer of my staff, and my aide, Lieut. R. C. Andrews, for valuable and efficient aid. The work between the two points kept the first three constantly busy, Captain Scott personally superintending the throwing forward re-enforcements. My aide, Lieutenant Andrews, was with me at Bridgeport, and did his duty coolly and well.

The Thirty-second Alabama did nobly, fighting like veterans, under their able colonel (McKinstry), seconded by Lieutenant-Colonel Maury, distinguished for gallantry and coolness on the field.

Captains Freeman and Dure and the officers under them did their whole duty. Lieutenant Holtzelaw, of Captain Dure's battery, worked the siege gun most of the time and splendidly. It was handled part of the time by Captain McCreery.

Captain Rice and his command acted in a manner worthy of all praise. In short I never saw troops behave better than did the Thirty-second Alabama, Rice's cavalry, Freeman's and Dure's batteries, and the detachment with siege guns. I particularly call your attention to the boldness of this regiment of infantry in wading a broad sheet of water, such as the Tennessee, up to their arm-pits, with retreat cut off and the enemy known to be strong in front.

Should I be furnished with sufficient cavalry to reap the fruits of this movement our cause will be greatly benefited. The work out of which the enemy was shelled is a splendidly constructed field work, admirably executed; is the key to the Sequatchie Valley, and its possession completely breaks the enemy's chain up the Tennessee River. With cavalry to operate from that point toward Stevenson and Huntsville the enemy could be kept in constant alarm.

I neglected in its appropriate place to say, which I do with gratitude, that our loss was trifling—only 6 wounded and 1 missing; thus small owing to the fact that the grounds on which the fight took place at Bridgeport were perfectly well known to me, and the men most of the time had the advantage of cover. The enemy's loss for such an affair was heavy, variously estimated from 50 to 75 killed and wounded in the two engagements—certainly not less than 50, and the indications are it was greater.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. MAXEY,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

CUMBERLAND GAP, August 29, 1862.

GENERAL: Nothing of interest on the 28th instant. On the 27th, a small detachment from the First and Second Tennessee, commanded by Captains Meyers and Robbins, attacked and surprised a party of the enemy's cavalry, commanded by Acting Brigadier-General Allston, of South Carolina. Allston, his colors, and 3 privates were captured. The enemy left 4 dead men upon the field and had a considerable number wounded.

The affair was a complete surprise, and we did not sustain any loss.

Report of Brig. Gen. Joseph Wheeler, C. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY,
Knoxville, Tenn., October 30, 1862.

COLONEL: I have the honor to report that on August 27 I moved across the Tennessee River at Chattanooga with a brigade of cavalry, consisting of parts of the First Alabama and First Kentucky Regiments.

On the 28th we moved in front of General Hardee's wing. The next day I received an order to march toward Altamont and drive in the enemy's scouts on the mountain. We arrived near Altamont at daylight on the morning of the 30th and drove in their pickets on three sides, firing into their camp and killing, as we afterwards learned, 1 colonel, 1 captain, and 2 privates. The enemy were so alarmed and deceived that General Buell reported in his official statement, subsequently made to a council of war at Nashville, that General Hardee attempted to cross the mountain with his corps, but by his placing a large force at Altamont he had compelled General Hardee to fall back into the valley. A few hours before we reached Altamont the enemy had an infantry brigade in ambush on the road, but on our approach they marched in and joined their main body. After having menaced their flanks until 12 m. we returned to Sequatchie Valley. We then moved northward, covering the rear and left flank of the army, having a slight skirmish near Fleming's.

We arrived at Carthage on September 7, where we were joined by the Third Georgia Regiment, and the First Alabama was detached. That night I received orders to proceed toward Nashville and harass the enemy, &c. At Hartsville I was joined by Col. [J. D.] Bennett [Ninth Tennessee Cavalry], with about 200 men. The enemy being on the march from Nashville to Bowling Green, we hovered along their flank, occasionally skirmishing and making captures and destroying the railroad and telegraph at every opportunity. A scout succeeded in capturing a stage, containing a Federal colonel and lieutenant bearing important dispatches. The two Federal officers and the dispatches were sent to the main army.

On the night of the 11th General Crittenden's entire division encamped at Woodburn, Ky. My entire command, consisting of nearly 700 men, were placed in ambush on the road he would have to pass in moving on his way to Bowling Green. Soon after daylight he commenced to move, but when near our position the head of the column, discovering us, turned back. After waiting for some time, having captured a captain and several privates, we withdrew about 2 miles from the pike to rest and feed the command.

About 2 p. m. the enemy followed us with infantry and cavalry. After warmly engaging them for some time we endeavored to draw them down to a position where the bulk of our force was stationed and where we could develop their strength, and, if possible, separate their infantry from their cavalry. In this we failed. The enemy soon retired, leaving 1 man dead on the field and carrying off 1 major and 10 privates wounded, some of them seriously. We followed them a short distance with about 200 men, but as night was coming on and we were near their strong force we soon rejoined our reserves. General Forrest came up in the rear while the fight was going on, but finding he could not engage the enemy to advantage he retired toward Glasgow.

The next day we proceeded to Merry Oaks, a place midway between Bowling Green and Glasgow, to cover our army and watch the movements of the enemy. We remained at this point, watching the several approaches to Bowling Green, until the 16th, when we moved down to Oakland Station, 7 miles east of Bowling Green, leaving a small force at Merry Oaks to watch the movements of the enemy on the two lower roads.

That night the enemy moved Rousseau's division and a large cavalry force over the river on the Glasgow or Cave City pike, while at the same time more extensive arrangements were being made for a movement across the river in a northerly direction, which led me to believe that the bulk of General Buell's army was to move in that direction. This was also the opinion of all my agents who had been sent into the town. In this we were deceived. The wagon train of General Buell's army, consisting of over 2,000 wagons, crossed in the northerly direction with a comparatively small guard, while the rest of the army moved toward Cave City. Col. [John F.] Lay had been sent to Dripping Springs, with orders to report to me, and Colonel Bennett's command was detached. The enemy pressed upon my pickets during the night, which, together with other movements on their part, convinced me that an early advance was intended. About daylight the enemy's cavalry in large force moved up rapidly in good order toward Cave City, followed by infantry. Finding that they had passed our position we moved rapidly by a circuitous route to gain their front, having previously directed Colonel Lay to remain at his post until our arrival, in order that our combined forces might more effectually retard the enemy. Orders were also sent to the battalion at Merry Oaks to join me at the same place. On arriving there, however, I found Colonel Lay had been gone some time, and also heard that the detachment at Merry Oaks had been driven in by a large force of cavalry. After resisting the enemy's advance until late in the day we finally moved toward Glasgow to collect all detachments on the lower roads and protect some trains at that point. These trains we escorted to Munfordville, arriving at that point about 8 o'clock the next morning.

Our total loss in killed and wounded was 2 officers and 3 privates.

At night we moved down to Horse Cave, near Cave City, to picket the front and watch the enemy, who was concentrating his troops at that place. We were here joined by the First and Third Alabama Regiments, Colonel Lay having been detached. We continued picketing the front, frequently skirmishing heavily with the enemy, with some loss on both sides.

On the morning of the 20th the enemy advanced and deployed their lines in front of their advanced pickets. Our army being now moving from Munfordville, our front was kept unchanged and every effort made to prevent the enemy from learning our movements. Toward evening

Col. [John A.] Wharton arrived with his brigade, which was, however, kept in reserve. The enemy continued deploying their lines all day and in the morning commenced their advance. Our pickets held their ground so well that it was noon before my main body became engaged, which had fallen back to a point about 4 miles from Green River. Here the enemy's infantry advanced in line of battle upon the First and Third Alabama Regiments. After a heavy engagement the enemy, finding that they were simply opposed by cavalry, sent a brigade to turn our right flank. After a gallant resistance and a handsome charge by the First Alabama, in which Lieut. Col. [T. B.] Brown was killed, both regiments were compelled to retire slowly, but in good order, to prevent being entirely cut off, the enemy's dense lines of infantry being in full view and within range both in front and on the right flank. Our artillery, consisting of two guns, attached to Colonel Wharton's and my own brigade, had been placed upon the north side of the river and commenced good work as soon as the enemy came within its range. The First and Third Alabama Regiments retired slowly and finally were compelled to cross the river, which was done in good order. The lines were again formed on the north side of the river, and as the enemy came up we received them warmly with artillery and small-arms. The enemy, discovering that our army had left Munfordville, sent an infantry brigade to turn our right flank. We contested the crossing under a heavy fire of infantry and artillery until this brigade of the enemy had crossed the river about half a mile below the town and was advancing in line perpendicular to our lines. We then fell back about 300 yards and again formed our lines, which allowed the enemy to cross several brigades of infantry and a large force of cavalry, all of which promptly formed line of battle, engaging us as they came up. Their cavalry sounded the charge, but could not be moved toward us. After a short but severe fight, the sun having gone down, we slowly withdrew. The fighting on the north side of the river was done by the First Alabama, Third Georgia, and First Kentucky Regiments, all of which acted as well as could be expected with such disparity of numbers, the Third Georgia suffering most severely. Colonel Wharton's Texas regiment was at all times ready and maneuvered well, but circumstances did not call it into action.

About noon I sent orders to the various pickets beyond the scene of action directing them how to come in; they all joined us safely during the night. We were obliged to move on some 8 miles that night to procure forage and water. Early in the morning Colonel Wharton moved with his brigade some miles farther on to Red Mills to procure rations. The enemy's advance reaching me about noon, my brigade was moved rapidly to a favorable position to receive him. The artillery and most of my cavalry were secreted until the head of a column of not less than 1,500 cavalry had arrived within about 350 yards of our position, when we opened upon them with canister and shell, killing and wounding many men and horses. The enemy deployed as skirmishers and brought up their artillery, engaging us warmly until dark, when they went into camp. Colonel Wharton was notified of the advance when the action first commenced and moved promptly to my assistance. Finding, however, that he was not needed at that point he moved his command toward Hodgenville to watch the other roads leading north from Munfordville, and on which we learned the enemy were also advancing.

Having received written orders from General Hardee to be at Hodgenville by daylight Tuesday morning [23d] at furthest, we moved late that night in that direction, leaving a small picket to watch the enemy during the night. Picked men were also sent to watch General Buell's army as it passed up the pike toward Louisville. They easily counted the regiments, batteries, and wagons which passed, a report of which was sent to headquarters. I will here state that during the entire campaign reports in writing were made several times each day to the major-general commanding the left wing or to the general commanding the army of everything relating to the movements of the enemy which could be ascertained.

On Wednesday morning Colonel Wharton's brigade was ordered to Bardstown, while I remained at Hodgenville and New Haven watching the enemy on the roads from below and toward Elizabethtown.

On September 27 I received orders to move with 250 men toward Glasgow, but after marching 8 miles was ordered to return and proceed with my command to Boston. Orders were also sent to leave Col. [M. J.] Crawford's (Third Georgia) regiment [cavalry] at New Haven. I regret to state that a few days after a superior force of the enemy surprised and captured Colonel Crawford and 250 of his command at Boston.* We picketed and scouted well down toward Elizabethtown, frequently skirmishing with the enemy, until we were ordered to Bardstown, at which place we arrived about daylight on the morning of the 4th instant,† when I was ordered to follow and cover the rear of the left wing of the army, which was moving toward Glenville. All roads leading to the town were immediately picketed, and about noon we moved the remainder of the brigade on the road on which we were to march. Hearing firing in advance we moved rapidly in that direction, when I discovered that it emanated from a wood to our left and that a large force of the enemy had moved up between my position and the point where the firing took place. At this moment I received a message from General Johnson that his brigade—the infantry rear-guard of the left wing—was but a short distance in front. A large portion of my command was left to protect his rear, and I moved back with the remainder to reach the scene of the firing and relieve my pickets which had been left around Bardstown. On arriving at the town I found that Colonel Wharton had engaged the enemy but had passed on toward Springfield. We drew in our picket and remained near Bardstown until nearly dark, when I moved back to my command. The enemy in the mean time having placed a large force in and about the road, I was obliged to make a circuit with my little force to avoid capture. Having reached my brigade we moved on, in accordance with orders, to Glenville, and the next morning continued the march toward Mackville, before reaching which place I was ordered to Springfield, where we remained until the morning of October 6, at which time the enemy came up in strong force, reaching the town about 8 a. m. Our pickets having been driven in, we engaged them with artillery and small-arms, compelling them to advance very slowly, frequently deploying their infantry. We were obliged to fall back slowly when their infantry fired too heavily, but succeeded in so checking their progress that they only advanced about 4 miles from 8 a. m. until dark. They attempted several times to turn our flank, but were easily checked by our flankers. In this series of engagements the enemy suffered quite severely.

The next morning we ambushed the command at a position about 6 miles west of Perryville. The enemy came up in fine style to within about 200 yards, when they discovered our position. We then fired upon them with excellent effect, thoroughly stampeding their entire front. So effectual and unexpected was this stampede of so large a force of cavalry, artillery, and a portion of their infantry that our cavalry could not be placed in a position to charge them in time to accomplish all that could be desired. As it was we succeeded in capturing 1 officer and 8 men, together with about 50 stand of superior arms, and great numbers of blankets, saddle-bags, &c., which they had thrown away in their flight. In a few hours they returned in a force which finally compelled us to retire slowly before them, skirmishing with their advance during the entire day. Toward evening we succeeded in making a successful charge with a few men, driving in their advance and capturing several prisoners. In this charge we lost about 7 officers and men killed and wounded, including Captain Cathey and Lieutenant Clanton. Unfortunately, before we withdrew, our flank was so warmly attacked that most of the prisoners made their escape during the fight which ensued.

By keeping our lines continuously skirmishing until night we prevented the enemy from making any demonstration that day upon our infantry, which had deployed in line of battle to meet the enemy on the field of Perryville.

During the night I received orders to place my brigade on the left of our general line of battle for the engagement which was to take place the following day.

At daylight the skirmishing again commenced, and at about 8 o'clock my brigade was deployed as directed. Pickets and scouts were immediately thrown out on all the approaches to Perryville from the south and southwest as far as the Lebanon and Danville road and all precaution taken to prevent a flank movement of the enemy.

Seeing myself confronted by a large body of troops of all arms deployed in line of battle and gradually increasing their front my line was advanced to hold them in check sufficiently to prevent their farther advance.

About 10 a. m. my pickets on the Perryville and Lebanon road were pressed in by a large body of cavalry, which proved to be the First Kentucky and Seventh Pennsylvania Regiments, which were moving down the Lebanon and Perryville road with a large force, partly dismounted, deployed on each side. At this moment, receiving orders from General Polk to clear that road of the enemy, we charged the enemy, throwing their entire force of cavalry into confusion and putting it to flight.

We pursued them at full charge for 2 miles, capturing many prisoners and horses in single combat and driving the remaining under cover of their masses of infantry. The enemy also fled terror-stricken from a battery placed in advance of their general line and left it at our disposal. The charge, one of the most brilliant of the campaign, was made in column; detachments of the First and Third Alabama Cavalry with the gallant Cols. [W. W.] Allen and [James] Hagan being in advance. Colonel Hart, who had just come up with a body of about 400 cavalry, followed for a short distance, but owing to some mistake turned off the road, carrying all his own command, together with all in his rear, thus leaving the combat to the few brave men of the First and Third Alabama Regiments. With these few, who, after sending our prisoners to the rear, numbered only about 80 men, we were confronted by such forces that we were prevented making any farther advance. I therefore withdrew a short distance and again deployed our line, engaging the enemy with both cavalry and artillery until night, and prevented this large force from taking any other part in the contest of that day. Early in the day I sent a battalion under Major Adrian to re-enforce the picket on the Perryville and Mitchellsburg road, the enemy having pressed upon us at that point with apparent indication of an attempt to gain our rear. Major Adrian skirmished with them and held them at bay until we retired the following morning.

On the morning of the 9th I received orders to hold the enemy in check until our army had withdrawn from the field and then to follow on toward Danville, retarding the enemy as much as possible. In complying with this order we frequently engaged the enemy that day and the day following, besides keeping a force in observation of the road from Perryville to Harrodsburg.

On the evening of the 10th I learned from this force that the enemy were moving from the Perryville and Harrodsburg pike toward Danville, which information was promptly communicated to the general commanding.

On the morning of the 11th,* after a severe engagement, in which Colonel Wade's regiment participated, he having just arrived from Tennessee and reported to me, we were obliged to fall back behind Danville, where we remained until the evening of the 12th, when I received orders to move across Dick's River and guard the fords below Camp Dick Robinson.

On the morning of the 13th I received orders directing me to assume control of all our mounted forces as chief of cavalry and make the necessary dispositions to cover the movement our army was about to commence. I therefore recrossed Dick's River, and finding that the general advance of the enemy was toward Lancaster and Stanford, I left small forces, with all necessary orders to guard the several fords and the Bryantsville road, and with the bulk of my own and Wharton's brigades moved over to the roads leading from Danville to Lancaster and Stanford. My own brigade was placed on the former road and Colonel Wharton's on the latter. The enemy were pushing forward, but, by continually fighting them, they repeatedly deployed their lines for battle, and consequently progressed very slowly.

We arrived at Lancaster on the afternoon of the 15th [14?], and after a fight, in which we disabled a battery, prevented the enemy from approaching nearer than to within 2 or 3 miles of the town. Col. John H. Morgan and Colonel Ashby reported to me with their brigades, but they were not called into action.

Having received information from Colonel Wharton, then near Stanford, that he was warmly pressed, after ascertaining from a personal reconnaissance that the enemy in my front were not in large force, and that they had fallen back and gone into camp for the night, I started at about 10 p. m. to assist Colonel Wharton, leaving Colonels Morgan and Ashby to cover the road from Lancaster to Big Hill.

We arrived at Colonel Wharton's position early on the morning of the 16th [15?], and allowed him to move in toward the main army with his brigade, while with my own we engaged a large force of the enemy, falling back slowly through Crab Orchard. We engaged the enemy all day and reached Mount Vernon late that night.

* See October 10-22, 1862. Pursuit of Confederate forces from Perryville to London, Ky.

The next morning, together with Colonel Wharton, we commenced obstructing the road, continuously skirmishing with the enemy until the evening of October 22, we having then arrived at London, where the enemy ceased to pursue us.

At Wild Cat we were directed to hold our position for two days, which we had but little difficulty in accomplishing.

On the evening of the 19th I took a small portion of Colonel Frazer's infantry regiment, which was sent back to assist me, to feel the enemy, during which my brave young aide, Lieutenant Pointer, was severely wounded.

This was the only occasion where any infantry engaged the enemy after the battle of Perryville, although the enemy used infantry almost continually to engage our cavalry.

After guarding the roads at London and Barboursville until our infantry had reached Cumberland Gap I moved on to Tennessee with my brigade, Colonel Wharton having preceded me the previous day.

When our army first left Camp Dick Robinson I issued the most stringent orders to the several cavalry commanders that all stragglers from the infantry should be forced on to the main body. As far as I could observe this duty was most thoroughly performed. In my own brigade a company was kept at work gathering up the foot-sore and weary, whom the troopers placed on their horses and walked themselves by their side.

In this manner all stragglers on the roads we traveled were conveyed to their commands, no one being left behind to be taken by the enemy except those who willfully left the road for a great distance to avoid our guards.

In closing this report I cannot speak in too great praise of the gallantry of the officers and men of the First and Third Alabama Regiments, who were always ready to meet the enemy at any moment, performed all duties assigned them, and endured all hardships and privations without a murmur or complaint. The confidence I naturally placed in such noble officers and men caused me to call upon them perhaps too frequently for posts of danger and hardship, yet never did they intimate that their details were more frequent than other commands, but with the greatest cheerfulness right bravely performed their double task thus imposed simply because their commander placed in them unshaken and implicit trust and confidence. To the brave officers and men of these regiments and their gallant leaders, Colonels Hagan and Allen, I tender my warmest thanks.

Col. [J. W.] Grigsby's excellent Kentucky regiment was with me during several engagements and did most excellent and efficient service. Though just organized, the gallantry, skill, and intelligence of their commander, which seemed to characterize the officers and men of his regiment, made up in some measure for deficiency in instruction.

The First Kentucky Battalion, commanded by Major Caldwell; Eighth Confederate Regiment, under Col. [W. B.] Wade, and the First Confederate Regiment, under Lieut. Col. [C. S.] Robertson, were with me at times and did good service.

The gallant Colonel (now General) Wharton did good work with his brigade; but as his operations were for the most part of a separate character I leave it for him to do justice to the noble officers and men of his command.

I must also mention the gallantry and uniformly good conduct through the many fights of Capts. Oliver, [J. D.] Farish, and [W. W.] Lang, of the Third Alabama; Maj. [John S.] Prather and Capts. [T. W.] Golding and [B. B.] McCaa, of the Eighth Confederate, and Lieuts. [G. P.] Fuhrman and Burford and Adjutant Ledyard, of the First Alabama Cavalry.

I also tender my thanks to my adjutant, Capt. D. G. Reed, and my volunteer aides, Lieutenant-Colonel McGuirk and Lieutenant Pointer, all of whom conducted themselves with marked bravery.

Lieutenant Hanley, who commanded a section of artillery, was always gallant and skillful and efficient in performing all duties assigned him.

For the deeds of many other officers and men who deserve mention for gallantry and endurance I must refer to reports of subordinate commanders.

The gallant dead, who fell nearly every day of the campaign, including field and company officers of every grade except that of colonel, indelibly mark the road of the cavalry rear guard of our army.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOS. WHEELER,
Brigadier-General.

HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION,
In Camp, near McMinnville, Tenn., August 31, 1862.

MAJOR: Immediately after my return to camp yesterday from the mountain expedition, on which I had been absent two days, I heard that Forrest's command was crossing the railroad 3 miles west of my camp, going northward. I at once sent out three regiments of infantry and four pieces of artillery, under Colonel Fyffe, Twenty-sixth Ohio, to cross to the north side of Barren Fork, near to my camp, move out to the Murfreesborough road, take the road to that place, and try to cut Forrest off. By a very rapid forced march (part of it at the double-quick) of 9 miles Colonel Fyffe reached the junction of the cross-road by which Forrest was moving and the Murfreesborough road just as about one-half of the enemy had got onto the latter road. Colonel Fyffe deployed a part of his command, immediately ordered up the artillery, and opened a fire of shell and musketry. He divided the enemy, forced a portion back on the cross-road, and utterly routed and scattered him in all directions. The pursuit was continued for $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, till it was too dark to see.

Colonel Fyffe captured a number of horses, mules, shot-guns, sabers, revolvers, carbines, saddles, bridles, cartridge-boxes, &c. He captured General Forrest's light spring wagon, riding-horse, and the riding-horse and body servant of Captain Forrest, brother to the general.

The rebels fled in the utmost consternation and confusion. Forrest's forces numbered between 1,400 and 1,500.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

TH. J. WOOD,

Brigadier-General of Volunteers, Commanding.

Maj. GEORGE E. FLYNT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

P. S.—A cavalry scout, sent out by me early this morning, reports, from information received of citizens, that several of Forrest's command were killed and wounded.

TH. J. WOOD,

Brigadier-General of Volunteers, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION,

August 31, 1862.

MAJOR: My people captured last evening a very intelligent negro who belonged to a Texan Ranger who was killed in the attack on the stockade on the 29th. This negro gives a very intelligent account of General Forrest's movements for the last two weeks. He says Forrest left his train at Decatur, in Meigs County, on the Tennessee River, two weeks ago, since which time he has been roaming around, hunting for small parties and trains to capture, and subsisting on the country; that when he came down on the 29th he was on his way back to Decatur to his train, intending to cross the mountains by the way of Altamont; that after the repulse at the stockade he moved on toward the foot of the mountains and halted for the night. There he learned that our forces were at Altamont. He probably learned also that troops were moving to Hillsborough (Crittenden's), though the negro does not say so. But he says Forrest made a speech to his men yesterday, telling them they were surrounded and would be caught if they did not get out of the trap at once. Hence the rapid movement northward, across the railroad, yesterday afternoon. Doubtless Forrest will try to make his way around by Sparta or Rock Island, crossing, to get into the valley, and make his way down to Pikeville, Washington, &c., or from Pikeville directly to Decatur. Cannot you send a force promptly into the valley, beyond Spencer, to cut him off? I think it might be done. The negro says Forrest was repulsed in an attack on a train at Woodbury a few days since.

Respectfully, &c.,

TH. J. WOOD,

Brigadier-General Volunteers, Commanding.

Maj. GEORGE E. FLYNT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION, August 31, 1862.

MAJOR: The more information I obtain the more certain I am that an attempt ought to be made to cut up, capture, or at all events prevent Forrest from joining Bragg. I am still more certain that the object of Forrest's movement down this way was to cross the mountains and effect a junction with Bragg, and having been disappointed in this movement, he will attempt to effect the same purpose by the way of Sparta and down the Sequatchie Valley. The junction should by all means be prevented, as Forrest's command would be of the greatest advantage to Bragg in his advance. That the advance will be made sooner or later I am quite certain. The attempt will be made to sweep everything to Nashville, retake it, and then invade Kentucky. I have got hold of some information to-day on this point. I think General Thomas is mistaken in not believing Bragg to be on this side of the Tennessee River. I am satisfied the advance will be made by one of two roads—by the road by which I went out the other day, the Hills' Truce road to Dunlap, or up the valley and around by Sparta, or perhaps by both roads at once. The general, I think, ought to have both roads watched clear to the other side of the mountains.

I sent out a party of cavalry this morning beyond where my people encountered Forrest yesterday evening, which has just returned, with information that as late as 11 o'clock to-day Forrest, with the bulk of his command, was near to Short Mountain. I understand Short Mountain is near and a little to the right of the McMinnville and Lebanon road. Cannot the general send out a force there to rout him out? He probably halted there to collect his scattered forces.

Respectfully,

TH. J. WOOD,
Commanding.

Major FLYNT, Assistant-Adjutant-General.

HDQRS. DETACHMENTS 18TH OHIO AND 9TH MICH. REGTS.,
August 30, 1862.

Yesterday at 1 p. m. we were attacked in our position, 8 miles west, on the Manchester and McMinnville Railroad, by General Forrest's rebel cavalry, consisting of one regiment Texas Rangers, Colonel Wharton; one battalion Alabama Cavalry, Captain Bacot; one battalion Tennessee Cavalry, Major Smith, and one battalion Kentucky Cavalry. We repulsed the enemy, with a loss of 9 killed and 40 wounded, several mortally. Among the killed, Captain Houston; among the mortally wounded, Lieutenant Butler, who died this morning. Our loss, 9 wounded, 5 severely. The rout complete, the rebels throwing away arms and fleeing, leaving on the field their dead and several of their wounded. They set on fire a small trestle between us and Manchester, half a mile distant from us, which we put out, and have now repaired the damage. The enemy have gone in the direction of Sparta.

Captain, Commanding.

General HASCALL,
Commanding Fifteenth Brigade, McMinnville, Tenn.

SHORT MOUNTAIN CROSS-ROADS, TENN.,

August 30, 1862.

COLONEL: On Friday, August 29, the troops under my command, numbering 100 effective men, of Company A, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers; Company I, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, Capt. Charles C. Ross, and Company D, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, Lieutenant Wallace, had just completed the inclosure of a stockade at this place 30 by 40 feet square, of round timber, 12 feet high. The men were eating dinner at about 1 o'clock p. m. in a grove, distant from the stockade about 100 yards, and in which also we had the ammunition belonging to the command, except such as was in boxes, when the enemy, 1,500 strong, made his appearance, formed in line of battle along the skirt of woods extending from the railroad along the south side of the stockade at the distance of about 200 yards, and rapidly extended his line on east and west sides. My men ran rapidly to the stockade, and at the same time the enemy, with a terrific yell, fired a volley and rushed to cut us off from the stockade. The attacking force consisted of 900 dismounted cavalry, commanded by General Forrest, and led to the charge by him. My men kept up a sharp running fire on the way to the stockade, checking the impetuosity of the enemy, and all but some 10 of Company I and the men on picket got inside the fort before the enemy. The men cut off kept up a constant fire from the railroad and woods during the engagement and got in in safety. The race to the stockade was a desperate one. On getting within the stockade I at once sent three parties of 6 men each, one from each company, to bring in the ammunition. These squads were commanded by Sergeant [Edward] McLaren, Company A; Sergeant [James K.] Williams, Company I, and I regret that I do not know who from Ninth Michigan company. They ran to the thicket under a terrible fire from the enemy's skirmishers and succeeded in bringing in the ammunition.

The enemy now made an attack from three directions with great desperation, approaching within 50 feet of the stockade. I kept up a constant and well-directed fire upon him for ten minutes, when, finding it impossible to dislodge us or seriously injure our men and his own falling rapidly around, he made a rapid retreat to the woods in great confusion. His men ran in every direction before our fire, throwing down their arms, and immediately fell back out of range. Soon after an attempt was made to destroy the railroad above us. I went out with a party and drove them away.

I at once sent messengers to Manchester and McMinnville on foot through the enemy's lines with information. To do this dangerous duty I called for volunteers, and from those offering to go I sent Clinton L. Lee, private Company A, to McMinnville, and Henry F. Thayer, private Company D, Ninth Michigan, to Manchester. They both got safely through and gave information of our situation.

The enemy's forces consisted of Colonel Wharton's Texas Rangers; one battalion Alabama Cavalry, Captain Bacot's; one battalion Tennessee Cavalry, Major Smith, and one battalion Kentucky Cavalry, numbering, as I learn from Dr. Houston, surgeon Texas Cavalry, 1,500 strong. I have also the same information from Lieutenant Butler and other prisoners.

We buried 12 of the enemy left dead and dying on the field, and have 41 of his wounded in our hands and scattered among the houses of citizens in the vicinity. Among the dead are Capt. W. Y. Houston and Lieutenant Butler, Texas Rangers. Our loss is 9 wounded, to wit: Seven of Company I, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers; 1 of Company A, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, and 1 of Company D, Ninth Michigan Volunteers. Two are wounded dangerously and the others slightly. I send list of wounded.

Drs. Johnson and Mills, surgeons Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, arrived at midnight and at once proceeded to give all possible attention to the wounded. At daylight Drs. Stimmel and Sabine, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, arrived from McMinnville, and assisted in attentions to the wounded and suffering. To all the gentlemen my thanks are due for their promptness, industry, and skill in ministering to the wounded.

We captured 8 horses, 3 saddles, and 30 guns.

The conduct of all the officers and men of the command was such as to compel my admiration. They fought from the first with great coolness, bravery, and determination. The enemy outnumbered us as nine to one.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

H. R. MILLER,

Captain Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, Commanding.

Col. T. R. STANLEY, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers.

Report of Col. Edward P. Fyffe, Twenty-sixth Ohio Infantry, of skirmish at Little Pond.

HEADQUARTERS FIFTEENTH BRIGADE,
Near McMinnville, Tenn., August 31, 1862.

SIR: In pursuance to orders from Brigadier-General Wood to cut off General Forrest and his command, who was passing to the westward and within 2 miles of this camp, making his way northward, and upon five minutes' notice, after procuring a guide, I marched in a circuitous route through the woods to the Murfreesborough and McMinnville road, a distance of 6 miles from camp. I pushed forward in the direction of Murfreesborough in quick-time until I came to an open country, where at some distance across the fields I discovered the column of General Forrest, consisting entirely of cavalry.

The enemy having become aware of my presence at this time there commenced an exciting race between his command of cavalry and my column of infantry for the intersection of the two roads. I ordered my command forward at a double-quick, which they obeyed cheerfully, although they had marched several miles at quick-time without water. I discovered when about 400 or 500 yards distant from the junction of the roads that General Forrest had formed his command in line of battle to receive my attack. I immediately ordered Lieutenant Estep, commanding Eighth Indiana Battery, to take up a position on an elevated piece of ground in the field to the left of the road, with instructions to commence firing, and the advance guard (Companies A and F, Captains James and Peatman, of the Twenty-sixth Ohio), under Major Degenfeld, to deploy in front of the artillery on the low ground, advance, and commence firing. In the mean time Lieutenant-Colonel Young, commanding the Twenty-sixth Ohio Regiment, agreeably to instructions, formed his regiment in rear of the advance guard and followed it closely in line of battle. After firing a few rounds the enemy's lines gave way in the center. His right wing (the Texan Rangers and some Alabama troops) were forced to take the back track to our left, while General Forrest, with his left wing, scampered off in the direction of Murfreesborough. I ordered Lieutenant Jervis forward on the main road with one section of artillery to fire on General Forrest's detachment, and gave instructions to Lieutenant-Colonel Gorman, commanding Seventeenth Indiana, to support him with his regiment. I then ordered Lieutenant Voris, with the other section, supported by the Fifty-eighth Indiana, Colonel Buell commanding, to follow up and to fire on the Texan Rangers, leaving the Twenty-sixth Ohio to occupy the center.

In a very short time the enemy were entirely dispersed in every direction; so much so that it was with great difficulty I could determine on which road it would be most profitable to pursue him. I immediately concluded to follow him on the Murfreesborough road, but it had grown so dark that I was enabled to pursue him but about 2 miles, when I was forced to abandon the chase in consequence of the men and animals suffering for water. I returned to camp the same night, arriving about 11 o'clock.

The ground over which we fought presented every indication of the utmost confusion and consternation on the part of the enemy, the woods and roads being strewn with arms, wearing apparel, &c. Accompanying this I have the honor to present a list of the property that fell into our hands.

The actual loss of the enemy I had no means of ascertaining, but from the statements of citizens subsequently received and from his own admissions his loss must have been from 18 to 20 in killed and wounded.

It is with pleasure that I inform you that these fine regiments of your division never came into line in better order at their battalion drills than they did upon this occasion. The artillery, commanded by Lieutenant Estep, was well handled, quickly got into position, fired rapidly and with precision.

The command of that portion of the brigade that accompanied the expedition devolved upon me in consequence of the severe illness of Brigadier-General Hascall, who was at the time confined to his room.

It is proper to state that the Third Kentucky Regiment did not participate, in consequence of just having returned from a severe march of two days' duration, thus entirely incapacitating them for further immediate service.

I cannot speak too highly in praise of the members of the general staff. Capt. Ed. R. Kerstetter, assistant adjutant-general, and Lieuts. James R. Hume, Jules J. Montagnier, and Charles H. Bruce, aides-de-camp, were active in conveying my commands to every part of the field. I would respectfully commend them to your favorable notice.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. P. FYFFE,

Colonel Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, Commanding.

ON THE ROAD, August 31, 1862—11 a. m.

This armed body was commanded in person by General Forrest. He has passed north, via Sparta, to avoid our troops, and thus join Bragg on the other side of the mountains. He also expects to join Morgan soon, who will also join Bragg. Can they not be cut off somewhere northeast of McMinnville? He went toward Short Mountain from here, thence via Sparta. If we had deployed along this road last night it would have been better. We entirely cut off 500 Texas Rangers, who fell back into the woods, and after we left they went on north.

General WOOD.

P. S.—I start immediately. The wagons captured at Murfreesborough are at Pikeville, and very little force there—two pieces of artillery and a little cavalry.

Reports of Maj. Gen. Horatio G. Wright, U. S. Army, commanding Department of the Ohio, with instructions to Maj. Gen. William Nelson.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
Cincinnati, Ohio, August 31, 1862.

Nelson has been badly beaten, I fear, in an encounter with the enemy near Richmond, Ky., his force being, as he says, hopelessly broken and scattered. He is in Lexington, wounded, and I leave for that place in a couple of hours, to see what can be done. He gives no particulars. My orders were to make the Kentucky River the line of defense, and his orders in pursuance seem to have been disregarded. At any rate his force has been routed.

H. G. WRIGHT,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK, Washington, D. C.

LEXINGTON, KY., August 31, 1862.

I find matters here in a very bad condition. The force engaged in the late battle is scattered, there being only about 800 of them here, with what was not engaged in the fight. I am not strong enough to resist the rebel forces, and shall be forced to fall back if they approach. The battle was fought in direct disobedience to my orders and those of General Nelson. General Manson, who was in immediate command until General Nelson came up, and who brought on the battle, has not been heard of. He is probably a prisoner. Have directed troops still coming in to rendezvous at Covington and Louisville until further orders and those in advance to fall back on these points on approach of a superior force. This until I can better understand matters.

H. G. WRIGHT,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
Louisville, Ky., September 2, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that I left Lexington last evening about 5 o'clock, arriving here about 4.30 a. m. to-day. On reaching Lexington I found that the force engaged in the battle in front of Richmond was utterly broken up, and that after all the exertions that could be made to collect the stragglers only some 800 or 900 could be found. The remainder of the force were killed, captured, or scattered over the country. The only force then at Lexington and its vicinity not engaged in the fight were six regiments of infantry, two of cavalry, all new except the Ninth Tennessee [Pennsylvania] Cavalry, and much demoralized by the reverse that had been sustained. Under these circumstances it would have been madness to attempt the defense of Lexington or the Kentucky River with the forces there or with any re-enforcements that could have been brought up in time, and I therefore reluctantly gave orders for the evacuation of the place on the advance of the enemy in force, falling back on Covington or Louisville, as might be proper.

There were two general officers left with the command, neither of which desired the position of commander of the forces, and I therefore at their request appointed Capt. C. C. Gilbert, First Infantry, U. S. Army, a major-general, subject to the approval of the President, and Capt. W. R. Terrill, Fifth Artillery, U. S. Army, a brigadier-general, subject to a like approval, assigning the former to the command of the Army of Kentucky during the absence of Major-General Nelson, wounded in the battle. A copy of the order is herewith inclosed.*

I believe in making these appointments I have acted for the best interest of the service.

General Gilbert is favorably known throughout the regular service, and in this section of the country commands the confidence of officers and citizens, and I trust for the good of the service the appointment may meet the approval of the authorities. General Terrill is also favorably known to the service, has served gallantly through the war, and is, I am sure, entitled to some such mark of recognition of his services, zeal, and intelligence.

If the force at Lexington is brought off safely it will be due mainly to the good management of those officers.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

INSTRUCTIONS TO MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM NELSON, U. S. ARMY.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 24, 1862.

If enemy is in force get your troops together, and do not risk a general battle at Richmond unless you are sure of success. Better fall back to a more defensible position, say the Kentucky River, than to risk much. If the enemy's force is cavalry he may have designs against [Green Clay] Smith, who should be ready to fall back and join you. Do not let him be overwhelmed. It is the enemy's game to fall upon our detachments. Your lowest estimate of enemy's strength probably nearest the truth; keep me advised.

H. G. WRIGHT,
Major-General, Commanding.

Major-General NELSON, Commanding at Lexington, Ky.

P. S.—To be sent forward by telegraph if General N. has left.

Report of Maj. Gen. William Nelson, U. S. Army, commanding Army of Kentucky.

HEADQUARTERS, Lexington, Ky., August 31, 1862.

GENERAL: I have to report that on yesterday morning at 2.30 o'clock I, much to my surprise, received a dispatch from General Manson, stating that the enemy was in force in his front and that he anticipated an engagement. I immediately sent couriers, with orders for him not to fight the enemy, but to retreat by way of the Lancaster road. I had ordered General Dumont to proceed from Lebanon to Danville, where he would find further orders. Also Col. Charles Anderson, with a brigade of three infantry regiments, to proceed in the same direction, it being my intention to mass the troops, knowing that the enemy would not cross the Kentucky River while 16,000 men were on their flank. My anxiety was such that I started myself to see that the troops at Richmond moved in the proper direction and in order. Upon my arrival at Lancaster, at 9.30 a. m., I heard the artillery. I procured fresh horses and took the Richmond road, but was compelled to take by-paths because of the enemy's cavalry on it and being accompanied only by a single member of my staff. I arrived on the field, 3 miles south of Richmond, at 2 p. m., and found the command in a disorganized retreat or rather a rout. With great exertion I rallied about 2,200 men, moved them to a strong position, where I was confident I could hold them in check until night, and then resume the retreat. The enemy attacked in front and on both flanks simultaneously with vigor. Our troops stood about three rounds, when, struck by a panic, they fled in utter disorder. I was left with my staff almost alone. The enemy's cavalry was now in our rear, and the panic at such height that it was a sheer impossibility to do anything. What the motive of General Manson was in bringing on an action under the circumstances, and marching 5 miles to do so, I will leave him to explain to you.

* Not found.

W. NELSON,
Major-General.

Report of Brig. Gen. James S. Jackson, U. S. Army, Chief of Cavalry, including operations August 28-30.

HDQRS. FIRST DIVISION, ARMY OF KENTUCKY.

GENERAL : On Monday, August 25, you gave me the following verbal order :

You will proceed to Nicholasville and take command of the two battalions of Jacob's Ninth Kentucky Cavalry, and go thence to Hickman's Bridge, and take command of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Williams. You will then take position on the flank of the enemy and observe his movements. You will be very cautious. Colonel Jacob's regiment is just recruited, and you must not risk an engagement unless the chances are in your favor. You will from time to time send me such information as may be obtained.

In obedience to these instructions I proceeded to Crab Orchard, throwing out my advance to the Big Hill and Mount Vernon, also keeping a close watch on the road from Somerset to London and Barboursville. I ascertained distinctly at 9 p. m. on Thursday, August 28, the actual force of the enemy, and dispatched the same to you at Richmond by a reliable courier. Knowing the force of the enemy, as I did, you may be satisfied that I was astounded at receiving from you the following dispatch, dated Saturday, August 30, at 1.30 p. m. :

They are fighting at Richmond. Proceed there at once.

With my entire command of two regiments of cavalry, Colonel Williams' Ninth Pennsylvania, and Colonel Jacob's Ninth Kentucky, I proceeded at once in the direction of Richmond. Reports of disaster to our forces reached me when within 14 miles. When I arrived within 6 miles of Richmond I became satisfied that you were falling back, if not routed. I determined at once to pass around the town and fall in with your command on the road to Lexington. At 4.30 a. m. the next day I halted near the Lexington and Richmond road, on the farm of Maj. Gen. C. M. Clay, and undertook at once to ascertain the whereabouts of your command. At 7.30 a. m. I observed from an elevation a force of the enemy's cavalry, artillery, and infantry passing to Clay's Ferry, in the direction of Lexington. It was also reported that a column was advancing toward Lexington on the Tait's Creek road. My command lying at this time between the two roads, I crossed the Kentucky River at the mouth of Jack's Creek, with the view of passing around to the front of the enemy on the Clay's Ferry road, leading from Lexington to Richmond. I there fell in with a force of infantry, under the command of Col. Dan. McCook, of the Fifty-second Ohio, and fell back slowly and in order with him to Lexington, and there reported to Major-General Wright.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. S. JACKSON,

Brigadier-General Volunteers, Chief of Cavalry.

Major-General NELSON, Commanding Army of Kentucky.

No. 5.

Report of Brig. Gen. Mahlon D. Manson, U. S. Army, commanding First Brigade.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., September 10, 1862.

SIR : I have the honor to transmit the following report of the part taken by the troops under my command in the battles fought near Richmond, Ky., on the 29th and 30th days of August, 1862.

On Friday, the 29th of August, a courier arrived at my headquarters, some 2 miles south of Richmond, at 11 o'clock a. m., bearing a communication from Lieutenant-Colonel Munday, commanding a small detachment of cavalry in the neighborhood of Kingston, 5 or 6 miles south of me. Colonel Munday informed me in this communication that he believed the enemy were advancing in considerable force. I caused two copies of Colonel Munday's letter to me to be made out, one of which I sent to Lancaster and the other to Lexington directed to you, not having been informed at which place you might be found. I also sent a written message to Colonel Munday, directing him to hold the enemy in check and ascertain if possible his strength and position; also to learn if the enemy had left the main road and taken either to the right or left from the turnpike road near the foot of Big Hill with any of his forces. I ordered the men to stand to arms in the First Brigade and be ready to move at a moment's warning. I also sent forward four additional companies to strengthen the picket which I already had in that direction, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Wolfe, of the Sixteenth Indiana.

At 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day a messenger arrived and informed me that the cavalry, under command of Colonel Metcalfe and Lieutenant-Colonel Munday, and the infantry picket, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Wolfe, were retreating as fast as possible to the camp, and that the enemy, to the number of 4,000 or 5,000, was pressing hard upon them. The only question for me now to determine was whether I should allow the enemy to attack me in my camp or whether I should advance and meet him. It did not take me a moment to decide which course to pursue, as all the hills $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of me completely commanded my camp, and I did not think it my duty to allow the enemy to obtain possession of them without a struggle. I therefore ordered forward the First Brigade, consisting of the Sixteenth, Fifty-fifth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventy-first Indiana Regiments, and the artillery under command of Lieutenant Lanphere. When I had advanced three-quarters of a mile I discovered a heavy column of the enemy's cavalry half a mile east of the road. I immediately ordered Lieutenant Lanphere to get a section of his artillery in position and open upon the enemy, which he did with admirable effect, scattering them in every direction.

I then moved forward a mile and took possession of a high ridge, formed line of battle upon the right and left of the road, with artillery protecting each flank and commanding the open country and turnpike road as far south as Rogersville. The enemy in a few minutes made his appearance in considerable numbers, of cavalry, infantry, and artillery. I opened fire upon him with my artillery, and after a sharp skirmish of an hour's duration succeeded in driving him in some confusion from the field, capturing some prisoners, horses, and one cannon.

I advanced again to Rogersville, distant about 1 mile, where I had the men bivouac, with orders to sleep on their arms, and sent forward Colonel Metcalfe with his cavalry to pursue the enemy and ascertain if possible what his strength was. Colonel Metcalfe returned about 11 o'clock p. m. and stated that he had passed down the road in the direction of Big Hill 6 miles, and had there encountered some of the enemy's cavalry pickets, who, after a slight skirmish retired and fell back some distance. Colonel Metcalfe here had 2 men killed and 2 wounded. At the same time I sent out the cavalry to scout the road. I also sent an order to General Cruft to place a strong picket on the Lancaster pike and on the road that comes into Richmond on the east side, and to hold his brigade in readiness to move at a moment's notice.

On the morning of the 30th, at 4 o'clock, I caused the men to stand to arms, directing that there be details from each company to make coffee and fill the canteens with fresh water. At 6 o'clock I ascertained that the enemy was advancing upon me, and sent an order to General Cruft to join me with all the forces under his command as quickly as possible; whereupon I gave orders for a forward movement, taking the advance myself with the Fifty-fifth Indiana. I met the enemy's advance half a mile beyond Rogersville and drove them back, took possession of some woods and high ground upon the left of the road, and formed line of battle, the Fifty-fifth on the left of the road behind a fence, the Sixty-ninth Indiana on the right of the road, artillery on the left of the Fifty-fifth on high ground, the Seventy-first Indiana 300 yards in rear as a support for the battery and as a reserve. I ordered skirmishers to be thrown in front, which was done, those of the Fifty-fifth Indiana opening the battle in the most gallant style. In a few minutes, the Sixteenth Indiana coming up, I ordered it to take position upon the left of the Fifty-fifth in the woods, which they did, gallantly maintaining their ground against a very heavy force of the enemy, for more than an hour, when an attempt was made to turn their flank. I ordered the Seventy-first Regiment to go forward to their support, which in moving to the point indicated was exposed to a heavy fire from the enemy. I regret to state that Major Conklin, of the Seventy-first Indiana, was killed while thus moving to the support of the Sixteenth and bravely cheering on his men, and that very shortly afterward Lieutenant-Colonel Topping fell from his horse, mortally wounded, while encouraging the men of his command. The rebels seemed determined to turn my left flank, and I was compelled to transfer seven companies of the Sixty-ninth Regiment from the right to the left, where, together with the Seventy-first, they faced the enemy and fought bravely.

In the mean time General Cruft arrived on the field with two sections of artillery and the Ninety-fifth Ohio Regiment in advance. I directed him to place this regiment on the ground that had been occupied by the Sixty-ninth to support the three companies of skirmishers now warmly engaged, and to charge upon a battery that the enemy was then endeavoring to plant upon an eminence only a short distance to the front and right. In attempting to take this position they were exposed to a severe and raking fire, which threw them into some confusion, and the enemy pressed forward with a heavy force and drove all the troops upon the right before them. At the same time we were entirely outflanked upon the left, and the enemy, having gained the cover of a large corn field and the woods, made a descent upon the left wing, which gave way and retreated in great disorder. Up to this time I had maintained my first position for three hours and forty minutes, during all of which time the artillery, under command of Lieutenant Lanphere, had kept up a constant fire, except for a very short time, when the ammunition had become exhausted and before they had received a supply. The Fifty-fifth Indiana, Colonel Mahan, the Sixteenth Indiana, Colonel Lucas, the Sixty-ninth Indiana, Lieutenant-Colonel Korff, and the Seventy-first Indiana, Lieutenant-Colonel Topping, occupied prominent and exposed positions from the commencement of the engagement, and contended against the enemy with a determination and bravery worthy of older soldiers. The three remaining regiments of General Cruft's brigade arrived just at the time when our troops were on full retreat and the rout had become general, the Eighteenth Kentucky being in advance, under command of Colonel Warner. This regiment was immediately deployed into line and made a desperate effort to check the advancing enemy, and contended with him single-handed and alone for twenty minutes, when, after a severe loss, they were compelled to give way before overwhelming numbers. The Twelfth and Sixty-sixth Indiana Regiments not having arrived in time to take part in the first battle retired in good order, and were formed in line of battle on a high position near Rogersville, about a mile in the rear of the first battle-field. Taking these two regiments as a nucleus I rallied the remainder of the division, but saw at once that it would not do to fight upon that ground. I deployed the cavalry of Colonels Metcalfe and Munday upon the high ground in front of the infantry, placed one piece of artillery in the road, directing the fire toward the enemy, who were forming line of battle near Rogers' house. I then gave orders to the infantry to face by the rear rank and move to the rear in line of battle. They moved in this manner about three-quarters of a mile, halted, and about-faced. I had now arrived on the ground which I had occupied in the skirmish with the enemy the evening before, and I here ordered General Cruft to move off with his brigade to the right and take position on elevated ground, putting two regiments in the woods on the extreme right and two behind the fence fronting a field of corn and to throw skirmishers forward into the corn field and woods. The first brigade I formed behind fences on the left of the road. The artillery was placed on the right and left, on the same ground occupied the previous afternoon.

I now signaled the cavalry and artillery, which had been left on the ridge in front and which until now had held the enemy in check, and they retired rapidly and took their proper positions in the new line. The enemy now began advancing in great force through the open fields in line of battle, and while they were thus advancing a courier rode upon the field and delivered to me your written order, dated at Lexington, August 30, directing me to retire by the Lancaster road if the enemy should advance in force. It was then 12.30 o'clock p. m., and in less than five minutes from the time I received your order the battle raged with great fierceness along my whole line. The enemy's right soon gave way under the fire from the artillery upon our left, and his whole attention was then turned to our right, upon which a vigorous assault was made by infantry advancing through the woods and open fields. They were met in the most gallant manner by General Cruft's brigade. The Twelfth Indiana and Eighteenth Kentucky Regiments, being placed in the woods, contended against fearful odds and repulsed the rebels several different times. At this point the gallant Colonel Warner, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, was dangerously wounded. The Sixty-sixth Indiana and Ninety-fifth Ohio Regiments held their positions and drove the enemy back a short distance. The enemy soon rallied and again attacked our right wing, which, after a terrific engagement, which lasted from its commencement over one hour, was compelled to fall back and retreated in confusion. I was then forced to order the left wing to fall back, which they did in tolerably good order, the enemy crowding close upon them.

On arriving at my camp I made another effort to rally and reform the troops, and had only partially succeeded when I heard that you were upon the field. I at once reported to you for orders. You informed me that we would make a stand near the town and cemetery. I directed the troops already formed in my camp to move to the place specified. On arriving upon the ground, under your direction the men were formed in line of battle about 2,500 strong, and after contending with an unequal and overpowering force of the enemy for about thirty minutes our whole line was broken and repulsed and the men retreated in the greatest confusion. I regret to say that in this battle Colonel Link, of the Twelfth Indiana, was dangerously wounded, and Colonel McMillen, of the Ninety-fifth Ohio, was shot in the hand.

After passing through Richmond, by your permission I organized a rear guard of the scattered men of most all regiments that had been in the several battles, and took command myself, for the purpose of covering our rear on the retreat. The rear guard behaved well, keeping back the enemy's advance until we had retreated 2 miles on the turnpike road to Lexington, when the scattered troops in advance came to a halt. I left the rear guard in charge of Major Morrison, of the Sixty-sixth Indiana, and pressed forward myself to ascertain the cause of the halt. On arriving in front I found a small squad of the rebel cavalry formed in the road. I attempted to form an advance guard, but owing to the fact that the troops had been defeated in three engagements they were so perfectly demoralized that I found it impossible to rally more than 100 men. This small guard cleared the road in a few moments and continued steadily to advance, driving the rebels from three different stand-points. After passing a little over 4 miles from Richmond we discovered the enemy in heavy force concealed in a corn field on the left side of the road. In attempting to drive them my little band was completely cut to pieces, having 17 killed and 25 wounded. Lieutenant-Colonel Wolfe fell at this point while cheering forward the men. Lieutenant Osborn, my aide-de-camp, was severely wounded. Lieutenant Kercheval, quartermaster Seventy-first Indiana Volunteers, received a severe wound in the left arm, which rendered amputation necessary. The enemy killed and crippled a large number of horses here, which entirely blocked up the road.

It being now about 7 o'clock in the evening, and having no men to make any further resistance with, I attempted to make my escape, accompanied by Colonel Lucas, Captain Baird, and several other officers. We rode through the enemy's lines and proceeded in a westerly direction for half a mile, when we came upon a squadron of the enemy's cavalry, who commanded us to halt, and at the same time fired upon us. My horse was killed and fell upon me, injuring me severely in the breast, and a short time afterward I was arrested by the enemy's cavalry and made a prisoner.

I cannot say with certainty the extent of our loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, not having received any reports from the officers who commanded on the field, except Colonel Mahan, of the Fifty-fifth Indiana. I do not think, after an examination of the field, that our loss will exceed 200 in killed, 700 wounded, and 2,000 prisoners.* I understand the enemy took quite a number of the men of my command prisoners after they had escaped as far as Lexington. The enemy informed me that they had only captured 24 of our wagons and teams, nine pieces of artillery, and a small amount of camp equipage.

I deem it proper here to state that the troops which I found at Richmond when I arrived there three days before the battle had only been in the service from ten to twenty-five days. Some of the regiments never had had a battalion drill and knew not what a line of battle was.

* See revised statement, p. 909.

They were undisciplined, inexperienced, and had never been taught in the manual of arms. The artillery which I had was composed of men of different regiments, some of infantry, and a few artillerymen who had been separated from their commands at the Cumberland Gap. They had been sent from Lexington without caissons or a proper supply of ammunition, being quite deficient in fuses and friction primers. The ammunition of some of the pieces was entirely spent in the first engagement of the morning and the ammunition of all had been quite exhausted at the close of the last battle in the evening.

Taking into consideration the rawness of our troops, there has been no battle during the war where more bravery was displayed by officers and men, with a few exceptions, than there was in the four battles near Richmond. I have neglected to state in the proper place that I was joined in the second engagement by a portion of the Third Kentucky Infantry, who had passed from General Morgan's command at the Cumberland Gap with some Government horses. These men dismounted, hitched their horses, and did excellent service. I do not know the names of any of the accomplished officers who commanded this detachment, or I should gladly give them a place in this report.

I cannot close my report without referring specially to the gallant acts of some of the officers which came directly under my own observation. Capt. R. C. Kise, my assistant adjutant-general; Captain Biddle, U. S. Army; Lieutenant Osborne, Fifty-fifth Indiana; Colonel Metcalfe; Mr. William Goodloe, of Lexington, Ky.; Mr. Bennett, of Madison County, and one or two other citizens, whose names I do not remember, who composed my staff on the day of the battles, are entitled to great credit for the services which they rendered me, and for the prompt manner in which they discharged their duty, regardless of personal danger. I am under particular obligations to Captain Biddle for valuable suggestions in relation to the posting and ranging of the artillery.

I am greatly indebted to the gallant Lieut. Wickliffe Cooper, Dr. Irwin, Captains Baldwin, Stacy, and Kendrick, of your staff—some of whom had traveled 25 miles after hearing the cannonading in the morning—for valuable aid given me during the second and third engagements.

Colonels Lucas, Link, Mahan, Korff, Landram, Munday, Oden, McMillen; Majors Kempton, Orr, and Morris; Captain Baird; Lieutenant Lanphere, and Sergeant Brown, of the battery, greatly distinguished themselves during the action, together with other officers whose names I have not got.

The enemy say they had about 12,000 infantry, 4,000 cavalry, and fifteen pieces of artillery, who were all veteran troops, most of them having been in the army since the commencement of the war. Their loss in killed was about 250 and in wounded probably not over 500. The Union troops did not exceed 6,500, and of these there was not engaged at any one time over 3,500. It is to be regretted that we had not some drilled and disciplined soldiers to meet the enemy in the battles near Richmond. I am satisfied the result might and would have been different.

In conclusion allow me to express a wish that the wound which you received in the last action near Richmond may speedily heal and that you may soon be able to take the field again.

I herewith transmit the report of Colonel Mahan, of the Fifty-fifth

Indiana, and as soon as reports are received from the other regiments of my command I will forward them to you.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

MAHLON D. MANSON,
Brigadier-General, Commanding at Richmond.

Maj. Gen. WILLIAM NELSON, Commanding Army of Kentucky.

Report of Lieut. Col. John R. Mahan, Fifty-fifth Indiana Infantry.

CAMP MORTON, Indianapolis, September 10, 1862.

I have the honor to submit to you a report of the part taken by the Fifty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers in the late engagement at Rogersville and Richmond, Ky. On the 29th instant, at about 1 o'clock p. m., in pursuance of your order, a part of the regiment, consisting of Companies B, C, D, E, and G, were formed in line of battle on our camp ground about 2 miles south of Richmond, and was moved down the road in the direction of Rogersville at a point about 1½ miles from our camp, being followed immediately by four pieces of artillery, under command of Lieutenant Lanphere. At this point, the enemy having been discovered in considerable force on the left in the valley, two pieces of artillery were placed on the left of the road and opened an effective fire on the enemy, who had ingeniously concealed himself in the woods. The Fifty-fifth Regiment, in pursuance of your order, here remained in position in the rear of the battery until the woods had been thoroughly shelled in that direction, when they moved forward to a point one-half mile farther toward Rogersville, and formed again upon the right of the road at a point designated and wisely selected by you. Here the artillery was placed again in front of the Fifty-fifth Regiment, the Seventy-first Indiana Regiment, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Topping, being now upon the left of the Fifty-fifth, and the Sixty-ninth being upon the left of the Seventy-first and across the road in line of battle, with two pieces of artillery.

The enemy appearing in our front and upon our left at this point in large numbers, the artillery upon the right and left again opened upon them, bearing upon the road in the direction of Rogersville and the valley and woods upon our left. The enemy here opened a lively fire upon us, directed toward our battery and the Fifty-fifth Regiment upon the right, and for a short time we had the promise of a lively engagement, but the enemy was soon discovered to be falling back. At your suggestion I here deployed one company of my command, Company E, Capt. [Charles] Emery, and sent them down the road toward Rogersville as skirmishers. They found the enemy in front retreating through Rogersville, and pursued so closely that they captured and brought back to us one piece of the enemy's artillery, which had been used, with but little effect, upon us but a short time previous. The enemy was now found to be retreating in dismay, and the column, the Fifty-fifth being in front, upon your order moved 1 mile farther south to Rogersville, where they slept upon their arms.

At about 6 o'clock in the morning of the 30th I formed the Fifty-fifth Regiment again, and, as you directed, moved in front of the column, being followed by the artillery to a point about one-half mile south of Rogersville, when the enemy were discovered upon the right of the road and in front, having previously killed a part of our pickets and driven the remainder in. I here, in accordance with your direction, formed my front company—Company C, Capt. [Abner E.] Purcell—into sections and moved them a short distance down the road as an advance guard, when the first section fired upon a squad of cavalry upon our right. I then formed my command upon the left of the road and caused them to lay down under cover of a hill, and deployed Company B, Capt. [Carter L.] Vigus, upon the extreme left as skirmishers. This company had been out but a few minutes until they found the enemy in heavy force upon the left and threatening a flank movement, which you discovered, and placed the Sixteenth Indiana, under Colonel Lucas, upon our left. I caused the Fifty-fifth Regiment to fall back to the fence a few paces in our rear and to form a line there and to support the battery which you had caused to be placed there. At this point the Fifty-fifth Regiment became engaged, as did also the Sixteenth, upon our left. The enemy opened their artillery upon us with a fierce and constant firing, their second ball killing two corporals in Company G, Capt. [David H.] Hamilton's company. My command remained here for about two hours and a half under a heavy fire and returned it like old soldiers until the enemy had turned our left flank and the Sixteenth Indiana was compelled to give way. The Fifty-fifth Regiment became somewhat confused in the retreat, having been divided previously for skirmishers, but they rallied again in good order and formed at the place designated by you, about 1 mile north of Rogersville. Having fired their 40 rounds, some little time was spent in procuring a new supply of ammunition; but in due time I placed the five companies upon the extreme left and held our position until almost entirely surrounded by the enemy's cavalry, when I again moved them back to a point on the left of our camp 2 miles south of Richmond, where we again formed and were ready for the contest, when I was ordered to fall back to a point just south of Richmond, in the suburbs of the town. In this movement I experienced some embarrassment from the confusion which had reached my own command to some extent. The field officers and many of the company officers of the Seventy-first Regiment having been killed or disabled left that regiment without a commander and unavoidably confused. But I found the men all willing to fight, and with pleasure saw many of them fall in with other regiments and do good service. At this last stand the Fifty-fifth Regiment stood and held their position until they had been entirely surrounded by the enemy's cavalry and the force upon our right gave way, when I moved the Fifty-fifth Regiment on the east of the town of Richmond and forced our way through the line of the enemy, killing many of them, and passed over the Kentucky River that night, skirmishing with the enemy at intervals, who were to be found in every field in the country. Having learned that no stand would be made at the river I moved the regiment on to Lexington, where, in accordance with the order of General Nelson, we turned our arms over to another regiment, our term of service having expired.

I am under obligations to my company officers for the valuable aid they rendered me in commanding our little command. Adj. [Frank A.] Rose also rendered me efficient aid until the artillery firing commenced on the 30th, when his horse fell with him and disabled him so much that he had to be carried from the field, and is now among the wounded at the hospital. It pains me to record the death of Lieut. [William L.] Thompson, of Company E. He fell about 11 o'clock on the 30th. In the midst of danger he acted nobly and fell with his face toward the foe, having fired upon them after he had received his mortal wound. No better blood ever stained a battle-field. It would afford me pleasure to allude to the many acts of gallantry and courage of my officers and men. They did their duty and did it well. I congratulate you upon your success in disposing of the various regiments upon the field and your final success in the narrow escape through the heavy fire of the enemy, and trust that you may soon recover from the wounds received on that memorable day. I append a list of killed and wounded of my regiment as near as can now be ascertained.*

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN R. MAHAN,

Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding Fifty-fifth Regiment.

Brigadier-General MANSON.

Report of Brig. Gen. Charles Cruft, U. S. Army, commanding Second Brigade.

HDQRS. SECOND BRIGADE GENERAL NELSON'S COMMAND,
In the Field, near Louisville, Ky., September 5, 1862.

CAPTAIN: The following report of the operations of the Second Brigade of General Nelson's command in the battles near Richmond, Ky., on the 29th and 30th ultimo, is herewith submitted:

The brigade consisted of four regiments and a battalion of volunteer infantry and a volunteer battery, as follows, to wit: The Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, Col. W. A. Warner; Ninety-fifth Ohio Volunteers, Colonel McMillen; Twelfth Indiana Volunteers, Colonel Link; Sixty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, Major Morrison; battalion of Third Tennessee Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles; Andrews' Michigan battery, Lieutenant Hale. The effective strength of the brigade on the morning of the 30th ultimo was 3,085.

On the afternoon of Tuesday, the 26th ultimo, I was assigned to the command of the brigade. It was bivouacked a short distance from the town of Richmond, in a line of battle, which extended from the Irving turnpike, across the State road leading to Cumberland Gap, to the edge of the woods west of the cemetery. The men were all fresh recruits, except the Eighteenth Kentucky, which had seen no field service, very little drill, and was now, for the first time since its formation, collected as a regiment. The men knew nothing of the duties or habits of soldiers. Most of them had been less than a fortnight away from their homes. They could but indifferently execute some of the simplest movements in the manual of arms, but knew nothing whatever of company or battalion drill. Both officers and men were earnest and brave, but wholly inexperienced and untrained. There were no regular camps; neither had the men any of the ordinary camp equipage or conveniences. They were lying exposed to the hot sun by day and heavy dews by night, without the means of instruction or improvement in any way. One regiment had no field officers yet appointed, and, save the exception above noticed, all were but a mere collection of citizens, hastily assembled, armed, and thrown together without the least knowledge of military rules or discipline. The battery, though some time recruited, had never received its guns, horses, or appointments until within the week preceding the battle. It was a sad spectacle to a soldier to look at these raw levies and contemplate their fate in a trial at arms with experienced troops.

Such was the material of the command at the time the brigade was constituted. The same is true of the First Brigade, commanded by Brigadier-General Manson. All that experience could suggest, everything that incessant labor could accomplish, was done by me during the three days preceding the battle to put the regiments and battery into working shape. Not a moment was unnecessarily lost from drills and instruction. Manifest improvement was becoming daily visible. Yet, owing to the almost entire ignorance of the officers, this was necessarily slow. There was but a single staff officer of any experience with me. No subalterns were found in the whole command of sufficient military knowledge to assist upon the general staff.

Upon assuming command the town and bivouacks were at once thoroughly picketed. Cavalry patrols and scouting parties were kept constantly on the roads leading south and southeasterly for a distance of 12 miles out. Every exertion was used to guard against surprise and to procure intelligence from the front. Colonel Metcalfe had met with a repulse at Big Hill a few days previously. It was known that the enemy held this position some 15 miles to the front, but it seemed to be impossible to ascertain his force. Numerous plans were resorted to in order to ascertain this, but all were unavailing.

On Friday, the 29th, it was reported that the enemy had descended from the hill, but nothing could be learned accurately in regard to his approach toward our lines or whether such was his purpose. Duties elsewhere had called Major-General Nelson from Richmond, and the command fell to Brigadier-General Manson.

General Manson's line was 2 miles to the front and parallel to that of the Second Brigade. He had a half battery of artillery belonging to my command on one of his flanks and another half battery upon the opposite one, and was earnestly and laboriously endeavoring to instruct his officers and men and watching matters to the front.

About 4 o'clock on Friday afternoon the discharge of cannon was heard to the front in the direction of General Manson's lines. This continued for some minutes; no intelligence reached me, however, as to the cause. A messenger was sent forward forthwith. The brigade was put under arms, in readiness to march on command. A Rodman gun, from the artillery under command of Lieutenant Andrews, was sent forward on the Irving road, with five companies of the Eighteenth Kentucky Regiment, under Major Bracht, to support it, and every disposition made to move forward rapidly when ordered. The piece upon the Irving road was heard to fire four times, when everything became quiet. The messenger returned from the front with the intelligence that General Manson had advanced some 3 miles to a ridge near the village of Rogersville, had encountered the enemy, driven him off, captured one piece of artillery, and was able to hold his position. The officers in charge of my detachment on the Irving road reported having seen a small force of rebel cavalry attempting to flank General Manson's left, which he had dispersed by his fire. Nothing further was heard from General Manson, but the command was kept under arms till 10 p. m. The men then retired and were aroused again and placed in line of battle at 3 o'clock on Saturday morning. Still nothing was heard from General Manson directly. My command breakfasted half regiment at a time and were placed in line again.

About 7.15 a. m. on Saturday a heavy cannonade was heard to the front. It continued for some minutes, and was evidently being actively replied to. Occasional musketry was also heard. After waiting a sufficient time for a dispatch to reach me I sent forward for orders. The cannonading now increased, and it became evident that a general engagement was imminent. I waited no longer, but wheeled the artillery and infantry into the road and took up march for the front. After proceeding 4 miles I encountered my messenger, who informed me that he had been unable to communicate with General Manson, though the fight was progressing rapidly on both sides with artillery and would doubtless soon become general. The column, already wearied with heat and thirst, was pressed rapidly up. Near Rogersville, a mile to the rear of the scene of the first action, a messenger from General Manson reached me, urging immediate re-enforcements. The artillery was sent forward on a trot and the infantry hurried up.

The locality of the first battle was a piece of broken woodland on the left of the State road, near a small church, about 1 mile beyond Rogersville and 5 miles from my encampment. As our re-enforcements approached the place we met the artillery wagons driving back to Richmond for ammunition, the supply in the boxes having been already exhausted. My artillery was immediately placed and the fire renewed. The re-enforcing regiments were soon in position, the Ninety-fifth Ohio on the right, Eighteenth Kentucky on the left, while the Sixty-sixth and Twelfth Indiana were held in the rear in reserve. In a few moments after these dispositions were made the enemy's cannonading ceased, and an advance of his infantry was made, showing not only a superior front to ours but very large numbers at each flank. His approach was manfully resisted. Our raw troops went to work in earnest, and for some forty minutes the rattle of musketry was terrible. It was apparent, however, to any experienced eye, that the conflict was too unequal to be of long duration. The enemy's skirmishers were at first driven off and the advance of his main body for a time checked. It was, however, impossible, with the troops composing our lines, to stand against the impetuosity of his charge. The center gave way, then the right flank. The left made still a show of resistance, and the Eighteenth Kentucky, Colonel Warner, was brought up to its aid. This regiment made here a gallant fight, and by its brave stand broke the force of the enemy's attack and prevented the retreat at this time from becoming a rout. The men and officers of most of the regiments, however, fled in confusion to the rear through the fields. A few companies were brought off in tolerable order, but the panic was well-nigh universal. This was 10.30 a. m. At this juncture the whole thing was fast becoming shameful. No appeals availed at first to stop officers or men. The men, however, began to rally. I had the Twelfth and Sixty-sixth Indiana formed on the left of the road across the fields about 1 mile in the rear of the battle-field and in front of the retreating mass, and placed a line of cavalry still to their front. Here the greater portion of the retreating regiments were eventually rallied. A line of battle was established extending across the State road, and all the regiments marched in tolerable order back for a distance of 2 miles through the fields.

Upon conferring with General Manson it was determined to make another fight. It had now reached 1 p. m. My brigade was ordered to take position on the right of the road and occupy a ridge there. It was soon formed in line, the Ninety-fifth Ohio on the left next the road, the Sixty-sixth Indiana to their right, and the Eighteenth Kentucky in cover of the wood, with the Twelfth Indiana on the extreme right. The artillery was placed upon the high ground near the road. Skirmishers were thrown out well to the front. I endeavored in vain to urge some of the cavalry standing to my rear to explore the woodland to my right. The reply, however, returned by my aide-de-camp from their commanding officer was that they were a pack of cowards and would not go.

The First Brigade was formed to my rear several hundred yards, inside a corn field on the left of the road, with its artillery in front. The enemy approached first through a corn field in front of my left wing and opened a severe fire. My line was advanced up the fence and a sharp conflict ensued, in which the Ninety-fifth Ohio and Sixty-sixth Indiana took part. The behavior of these regiments here was excellent, and they succeeded in driving the enemy out of the field and holding their position. The attack now commenced on the right in the woodland. The Eighteenth Kentucky and Twelfth Indiana held their ground for some time in a sturdy manner, but, yielding to overpowering numbers, broke and fell back in confusion. At this time I attempted to change the front of my left wing to oppose the enemy that was crossing the meadow-land on the left of the road. The attempt to maneuver, however, was a failure, and the men broke and fled down the road. The entire First Brigade had gone previously, without having opened fire during the engagement. The flying masses drifted up the road and through the fields in the direction of Richmond. General Manson and myself rode forward, endeavoring to stay the flight and panic in every possible way. Our respective staff officers and some of the field officers of the various commands nobly assisted in the hopeless task.

The general ordered a third rally to be made at the ground formerly occupied by his camp. Here we were striving to collect the scattered soldiers when Major-General Nelson reached the field. He ordered another halt and reformation of line, and chose for the place that formerly occupied by the Second Brigade. Here such of the men as could be rallied were collected and formed in line of battle, the left resting on the State road near the toll-gate, occupying the cemetery and stretching off through the woods on the right. The entire number of men in the last fight in both brigades did not exceed 2,500. My brigade was formed on the left, occupying the cemetery and adjoining corn field and skirt of the woods. The enemy came upon us as soon as the line was formed. His skirmishers were held back for a short while by ours. The attack soon became general and was stoutly resisted for a few moments, when the whole line broke in wild confusion and a general stampede ensued. Both officers and men became reckless of all restraint or command, and rushed pell-mell to the rear, amidst a mingled mass of horses, wagons, artillery, &c., in an utter rout. Every effort possible was made to rally the men behind the artillery, trusting, with the few shots left in the ammunition-chests of the howitzers, to make our way to the rear. Officers, or men wearing shoulder-straps, deliberately refused, to render any assistance or respond to any order.

Before the last battle the enemy had flanked our line and passed large bodies of cavalry to our rear. These fell upon the helpless and demoralized mass of fugitives, and either slew or captured them, without much show of resistance. It now became a matter of individual safety, and the mass scattered, each one taking such course as he was able. At times during the battles of the day every regiment in my command exhibited great courage and endurance. Heavy and continued volleys were given, and the enemy was often severely handled. His loss seemed to have exceeded ours, but the perfect discipline of his troops enabled him to break our front, while his superior numbers made it easy to flank our lines in masses that were irresistible. His force at all times engaged must have exceeded ours three times in numbers. He seemed to have in each attack a superior number to our front, with as many on each flank. The account of the whole battle may be summed up in a few words. It was an attack by at least 15,000 well disciplined troops, under experienced officers, upon 6,250 citizens, ignorant of war, without officers of experience. The wonder really is that the latter fought so well for a whole day, could be twice rallied after being panic-stricken, and that any escaped slaughter or capture.

Before closing the report of this disastrous fight it is just to say that there were many instances of great personal valor exhibited by individual officers and men which came under my observation. Colonel Warner, Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, and Major Bracht, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, exhibited proper courage and daring. The former, I regret to say, is reported mortally wounded, and the latter two had their horses shot under them. Colonel Link, of the Twelfth Indiana, was badly wounded in the fearless discharge of his duties. Colonel McMillen, of the Ninety-fifth Ohio, was cool and brave during the whole day, and was wounded in the last fight. Major Morrison and Capt. John F. Baird managed the Sixty-sixth Indiana in a creditable manner and exhibited soldierly qualities upon the field. They were both captured during the retreat. Lieutenants Hale and Andrews, of the Michigan battery, acted gallantly throughout the day, using their pieces effectively, and, with their gunners, standing by them in every extremity. They brought them safely away from all the engagements, but lost them in the retreat. Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles, of the Third Tennessee, was left in rear of the town during the engagements, and his command took no part in them. It was, however, engaged with the enemy's cavalry during the retreat and is reported to have behaved well. Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles was captured by the enemy. Copies of the reports of the regimental commanders and commanding officer of Andrews' battery are herewith appended, marked respectively A, B, C, D, E, and F. In these reports many instances of individual bravery are noted and commended to the consideration of the major-general commanding.

The detailed report of Surg. Joseph Fithian, acting brigade surgeon, is herewith submitted. The report exhibits the following summary of the casualties of the brigade, to wit:

Regiment.	Killed.			Wounded.			Aggregate.
	Officers.	Men.	Total.	Officers.	Men.	Total.
12th Indiana Volunteers.....		7	* 7	3	31	34	41
95th Ohio Volunteers.....		10	10	5	33	38	48
66th Indiana Volunteers.....	3	21	24	5	63	68	92
18th Kentucky Volunteers.....	4	28	32	6	101	107	139
Andrews' battery.....		2	2		9	9	11
Total.....	7	68	75	19	237	256	*331

* But see revised statement, p. 909.

It is due to Surgeon Fithian to say that he was unremitting in the discharge of his duties on the field during the engagements, and that he shrank from no personal danger or exposure in ministering to the wounded and dying. He further reports good conduct on the part of all the regimental surgeons of the brigade.

It is impossible to state the number of prisoners captured by the enemy with accuracy. It is presumed, however, from concurrent reports that have been received at my headquarters that nearly half the command were taken prisoners and subsequently paroled. The remaining troops of both brigades were reorganized by me, under orders from Major-General Wright, at Lexington, and marched to this encampment.

In concluding this report it affords me pleasure to make honorable mention of the officers who acted upon my brigade staff, and to express my obligations to the gentlemen from civil life who volunteered their services and exposed their lives in the thickest of the battles. Capt. Wickliffe Cooper, of General Nelson's staff, my acting assistant adjutant-general, bore himself gallantly throughout the engagements and rendered efficient service at all parts of the field. Lieutenant Reeder, of the Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, detailed as aide-de-camp, evinced a high degree of courage and coolness. Acting brigade quartermaster, Lieut. J. T. Clark, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, obeyed orders—staid with his teams and stores, got his trains safely away, and thereby saved a large amount of Government property from the enemy. Messrs. Green Clay, of Madison County; Hartwell Boswell, L. P. Shaw, and Wharton M. Moore, of Lexington, and William Holloway and John Miller, of Richmond, volunteered their services as aides-de-camp, and acted throughout the day in that capacity upon my staff. Their bearing on the field was gallant in the extreme and coolness under fire admirable. They were constantly exposed to the enemy's bullets, but escaped unhurt, except Mr. Miller, who was mortally wounded in the second engagement and has since died—a martyr to his high-toned patriotism. Captains Kendrick, Stacy, Baldwin, and Horton, of Major-General Nelson's staff, joined my staff before the second engagement and conducted themselves handsomely on the field, rendering marked service in rallying and assuring the men.

With assurances of regard to Major-General Nelson, and the hope that he will soon recover from his wounds and be again able to take the field, I am, captain, yours, respectfully, &c.,

CHARLES CRUFT,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Second Brigade.

CAMP GILBERT, Louisville, Ky., September 9, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following report of the casualties which occurred in and the part taken by Andrews' Michigan battery in the action at Richmond, Ky., August 30, 1862:

Enlisted men, killed, 2; wounded, 9; missing, 4.*

* But see revised statement, p. 909.

Of the conduct of the officers and men under my command I cannot speak too highly. They were prompt in obedience to my orders regardless of personal safety, and in no instance leaving their post until all support was withdrawn. Lieutenant Andrews displayed great energy and precision in all his movements. Lieutenant Paddock also displayed great coolness and presence of mind at all times. Each piece, with the exception of one commanded by Lieutenant Andrews, was successfully withdrawn from the field. Three of the horses upon the one left on the field were shot down, when it was found necessary to abandon it. The battery commenced the retreat in good order. After proceeding to a point about 2 miles this side of Richmond, being unsupported and without ammunition, was attacked and captured, together with all camp equipage, company books, officers' baggage, &c., by the enemy, with the exception of about 25 horses and some harness, the amount of which I am unable to state definitely, which by your order was turned over to General Terrill.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

L. F. HALE,

Senior First Lieutenant, Commanding Battery.

Report of Capt. John F. Baird, Sixty-sixth Indiana Infantry.

The Second Brigade, commanded by Brigadier-General Cruft, was ordered to the support of Brigadier-General Manson's brigade that was engaging the enemy in the morning. General Cruft's brigade commenced moving Saturday morning at 11 o'clock; advanced about 3 miles, the Sixty-sixth forming in line of battle to the left of the pike. While General Manson's brigade was falling back in some disorder a large number from different regiments under General Manson was rallied by our gallant general and his aides. About 100 of this number was formed on the left wing of the Sixty-sixth. The Sixty-sixth remained in line of battle on a commanding ridge, with cavalry in front, till ordered by General Cruft to march in line of battle to a position about 1 mile to the rear. The Sixty-sixth then halted and formed in line of battle on the left, supporting one brass piece of the Michigan battery in an open field, with a corn field in front and timber on the right. The Sixty-sixth opened fire on the enemy in the corn field till they exhausted their ammunition, driving the enemy from the field with great slaughter to the timber on the right. The Sixty-sixth then made a charge for a short distance in the field. General Cruft in the mean time ordered the field piece to be fired promptly with canister and grape, which thinned their ranks, causing the enemy to halt, which gave the Sixty-sixth time to fall back by a left-flank movement to the left in direction of the pike and toward Richmond. We followed the pike some 3 miles. The Sixty-sixth then formed in line of battle in the grave-yard near Richmond. Captain Rodman and Captain Jordan were thrown to the front as skirmishers, lying down. They remained in that position till the enemy came on the Sixty-sixth parade ground, within 60 yards. They then opened fire, the regiment firing immediately after, killing about 100. The Sixty-sixth then fell back to Richmond. I was then ordered by General Cruft to rally the men in the streets, which was done. The Sixty-sixth retired in order through the streets, firing as they went. The Sixty-sixth then followed the pike toward Lexington for 3 miles, the enemy shelling us in the rear. We soon discovered the enemy's cavalry directly in our front and on our right and left, supported by a heavy body of infantry. They commenced firing on us from every direction, men and horses falling. We soon discovered that we were bagged and completely surrounded and our retreat cut off. We were ordered to lay down our arms and that we would not be hurt. Then our brave Sixty-sixth surrendered, and not till then. During the engagement in the grave-yard General Cruft's horse received a ball in the jaw. The general dismounted when the enemy's bullets were falling thick around him and examined the wound with that coolness that belongs to none but the brave. The general then mounted his gallant steed and called on the Sixty-sixth to remember Indiana. All praise is due to General Cruft and his aides, who distinguished themselves nobly. They were galloping in every direction on the field, delivering orders from the general. Major Morrison conducted himself nobly and was not excited. He is a brave officer. He was at all times a mark for the enemy. His horse was shot in the last engagement. After his horse fell he was taken prisoner and paroled.

The officers and men of the Sixty-sixth are brave men; they never flinched or shrank from duty. You could hear their voices above the roar of artillery and the volley of musketry shouting, "Remember Indiana." But, alas, the gallant Sixth-sixth was forced to surrender to an overwhelming force.

JOHN F. BAIRD,
Captain, Commanding at Richmond.

Report of Capt. Jasper N. Rodman, Sixty-sixth Indiana Infantry.

CAMP NEAR LOUISVILLE, KY., September 7, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I beg leave to submit the following report of the part taken by the Sixty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers in the recent engagements before Richmond, Ky., on the 30th and 31st [29th and 30th] ultimo:

On the morning of the 30th ultimo (Saturday) the regiment commanded by Major Morrison was ordered under arms at 3 o'clock to be ready to march to the scene of action and at 8 o'clock took up their line of march. Arriving at Rogersville we met our forces on the retreat. After forming the line of battle they rallied, the Twelfth Indiana being upon our right. After remaining there a short time we were ordered to fall back about a mile, which was done in order. A new line of battle was formed on the right of the road, and we remained there until the enemy made their appearance on the right and front. The Sixty-sixth then advanced to the fence of a corn field through which the enemy were advancing and opened fire, and after firing about 20 rounds forced the enemy to retire, which they did, and concentrated their forces upon the right. The fighting there was very severe, and the Twelfth Indiana being forced back left our right exposed, and the enemy, seizing the opportunity, outflanked us in that direction. The Ninety-fifth Ohio had given way on our left some time before, and in the attempt to change front to the left we were exposed to a galling cross-fire from both wings of the enemy. Being thus almost entirely surrounded, the command was given to fall back to the main road, which was done in as good order as possible, and the retreat was continued for 2 miles, when a new line of battle was formed, and after awaiting the approach of the enemy for some time we were ordered to fall back to Richmond.

The Sixty-sixth was then formed in the cemetery and the woods on the right and waited for the attack of the enemy, which was made on the whole line and both flanks. We held our position until the whole right had given way, and we were again outflanked and obliged to retreat, the Sixty-sixth being detailed to bring up the rear. After passing about half-way through the town of Richmond we halted, and three companies formed in line across the street and opened fire on the enemy. The entire column was then in full retreat toward Lexington, the Sixty-sixth still bringing up the rear and covering the retreat. After marching about a mile the enemy made their appearance on our front between our advance and Lexington. The wildest confusion then prevailed, and each one tried to save himself. It is thought that there Major Morrison was taken prisoner. It is impossible to make any further report at this time, the whole force being scattered in all directions. During the night many escaped to Lexington, some 316 of the Sixty-sixth being among the number.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

J. N. RODMAN,
Captain Company B.

Report of Maj. Frederick G. Bracht, Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry.

The following statement of the action of the Eighteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, U. S. Army, in the engagement of Friday and Saturday, near Richmond, Ky., is respectfully submitted:

On Friday evening, when the roar of artillery in the direction of Rogersville announced that the contest had commenced, the Eighteenth was promptly drawn up in line, and two companies detached and sent out, with a couple of field pieces, on the Irving road, from which excursion only one of the companies returned, the other remaining on picket duty till after the battle.

At 3 o'clock in the morning of Saturday our camp was quietly awakened, and fell into line more promptly and in better spirits than I have ever before observed, manifesting as laudable a desire to meet the invading foe in deadly conflict as ever inspired a veteran regiment, and when the roar of artillery announced that the conflict had again commenced the countenances of all were lit up with an enthusiasm which promised well for their action on the field. When the order to march was received they stepped off with as light a tread as ever inspired the true soldier, and when we approached the field and the rattle of musketry told of the close proximity of the combatants, a new zeal and an increased enthusiasm were constantly growing on every countenance.

When we came in sight of the struggling combatants we were informed that the left wing of our army was retiring under a terrible fire from the right of the enemy, and we were ordered into an open field at double-quick to sustain them. We crossed a ravine, and then came forward by companies into line, the right of our regiment resting in the head of a hollow, yet in plain view of the foe, and the left extending off into a high ridge in front of a wood and near a field of corn on our left. During the time of forming our line a terrible fire was poured into us from the foe in front, screened and concealed by a fence and thick brush. Before we were yet formed considerable numbers of each company had bit the dust and many more were groaning with ghastly wounds; and yet, notwithstanding all the discouragement which such a state of affairs was destined to produce, our men stood boldly up and poured a steady fire into the fence and wood from which the deadly missiles were falling around us, while scarce one single visible foe was seen before us; and to make our position more terrible and untenable a severe cross-fire was opened upon us from the corn field on our left and from a still hidden foe. Seeing it was suicide to stand the men were ordered to fall upon the ground, which they promptly did, and continued (a la Zouave) from that position to pour into the fields from which the balls were raining so thick upon us a prompt and steady fire. Numbers had already fallen in every company in the regiment. Several company officers had become victims. Captain Mullins, Company A, was wounded in the leg and taken back; Captain Lewis, Company H, killed; Captain Culbertson, Company K, mortally wounded; Lieutenant Washburn, Company F, killed. The horses of Colonel Warner, Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, and my own had been shot under us. The line of our troops which we were ordered up to support had fallen far back in our rear. Destruction seemed to await us, and yet every officer and man of the regiment stood up to his post, but it could not be supposed that men under their first fire could long be held to their position under such an array of terrible discouragements.

The right wing commenced falling back, the center and the left soon followed, nor could any effort of officers prevent a confused and precipitate retreat from a position which under all the circumstances we could not long have maintained without utter annihilation. In this retreat Lieutenant-Colonel Landram, while engaged in an effort to rally the men, received a painful wound in the face, and was sent by the surgeon to Richmond in an ambulance, where he was subsequently taken prisoner. Colonel Warner and myself mounted fresh horses and succeeded, with the assistance of Lieutenant Robbins, acting adjutant, and company officers, in collecting together about 300 of our men for the second conflict, in which we took position on the right, between the Twelfth Indiana on our right and the Ninety-fifth Ohio on our left, Company B, under command of Captain Johnson, having been sent out as skirmishers. During the first part of this engagement we stood silent spectators of a hard-contested combat on our left. Finally, however, by a flank movement, the enemy in overwhelming numbers passed around a corn field and made a precipitate rush upon our line in front, while they outflanked us in the woods and subjected the right of our line to another severe cross-fire, by which means they quickly turned our right, threw it in confusion, and produced another unavoidable retreat, in which Colonel Warner received a mortal wound through his chest, and Lieutenant Dunlap, commanding Company I, was shot in the head, producing instant death.

About this time Major-General Nelson appeared on the field and made an effort to force another stand. Lieutenant Robbins and Captain Fisk had taken Colonel Warner off the field, whence he was sent in an ambulance to Richmond. Lieutenant Robbins, of whose meritorious conduct on the battle-field I cannot speak in too high praise, being disabled by a fall from his horse, was also conveyed to Richmond.

Our forces were by this time badly scattered and confused. The different officers, however, who were yet fit for service, were unceasing in their efforts to collect and bring into the final contest at Richmond as many of our forces as possible, but it very soon became manifest to myself, as well as to many others, that no good result could be expected from a force three times beaten, fatigued, and prostrated from want of water. The whole force was soon stampeded, and I took what I could collect of our own regiment, with many stragglers from others, and struck off for Boonesborough, where we crossed the Kentucky River at 2 o'clock at night, and I finally succeeded, after a most fatiguing march, in bringing into Lexington about 300 men. The Eighteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers report now 236 enlisted men, under two captains—A. G. Wileman, Company D, and W. H. Littlejoin, Company F; six first lieutenants—J. W. Robbins, Company A, acting adjutant; J. D. Chrisman, Company B; W. C. Reeder, Company C; D. Boys, Company G; J. J. Hall, Company H; J. B. Heltemes, Company K; and two second lieutenants—A. B. Clark, Company C, and J. H. Johns, Company D.

Report of Col. William L. McMillen, Ninety-fifth Ohio Infantry.

HDQRS. NINETY-FIFTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEERS,
Camp Chase, Ohio, September 20, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by the Ninety-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers in the battles before Richmond, Ky., on Saturday, August 30, 1862:

About 3 p. m. on Friday, August 29, I received an order from Brigadier-General Cruft, commanding the Second Brigade of the Army of Kentucky, directing me to form my regiment quietly in line of battle and to wait further orders. The regiment remained in line until about dark, at which time, the skirmishing in front having ceased, supper was prepared and the men dismissed, one-half at a time, to eat it. During the night the regiment lay on their arms, and at 3 o'clock on Saturday morning again formed in line of battle. At daylight arms were stacked and breakfast prepared. As soon as possible thereafter the line was again formed, and at 7 o'clock we received marching orders. Taking the advance of the brigade, we were marched rapidly (a portion of the distance on the double-quick) 7 miles to the front to a point between Rogersville and Kingston, where General Manson's brigade had already engaged the enemy. Without being permitted to halt for rest or the men to close up we were marched at once upon the field, and required to form our line of battle under a heavy artillery fire from the enemy and in advance of our own guns. This movement was being exceuted with alacrity by the men, but before it could be completed we were ordered by General Manson to move across the road and charge a battery which the enemy was planting some 400 yards to our front. I moved at once with that portion of the regiment which had come up, forming on the right of the road, and advancing rapidly at a charge-bayonet on the battery indicated. While we were thus engaged the enemy advanced his right and left wings, outflanking and driving our forces before him. Seeing that it would be reckless and useless to continue our assault upon the battery I ordered the regiment to halt and fall back, which they did for a time in good order, losing, however, in addition to our killed and wounded, 160 men and a large number of officers captured at this point. In forming for this charge Captains Allis and Tate, Lieutenants Bull, Chittenden, Tate, and Potts, as well as other company officers, deserve great credit for the coolness and courage they displayed.

We continued falling back for about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, where we found our cavalry drawn up in line, and where a halt was ordered and the regiment reformed. Notwithstanding my men were very much exhausted and suffering for want of water, which was difficult to obtain, they again formed with spirit and promptness. Taking our place in line, the whole army was ordered to fall back and take up a position on two commanding hills some 2 miles this side of Rogersville, where the second engagement, lasting about one hour, occurred. Here the Ninety-fifth and the other regiments forming General Cruft's brigade fought with a gallantry and determination unsurpassed by raw troops, holding the enemy in check and at one time driving him some distance, but were finally overpowered, outflanked, and compelled to fall back. The retreat from this point very soon degenerated into a complete rout, and no effort was made to rally the men until in sight of the town of Richmond. There we succeeded in collecting about 300 of the Ninety-fifth, including Captain Taylor's company, which had been on picket duty during the former engagements and was relieved by order of General Nelson, who had recently arrived upon the field. We were posted at the edge of a corn field to the right and in sight of our old camping ground, with the Sixty-sixth Indiana on our left and the Twelfth Indiana on our right. We there awaited some time the advance of the enemy, who came up each time with fresh brigades and increased confidence and engaged us in front at short range until we were again outflanked and compelled to abandon the field. The last engagement was the bloodiest of the day, our men fighting with a desperation worthy of a better result. Our loss here was sad and severe—14 killed and 52 wounded. Here Major Brumback and Captain Thomas received severe wounds, which still detain them at Richmond. Captain Darety and Lieutenant Peters were painfully wounded also during this engagement.

Too much cannot be said in praise of the endurance, spirit, and gallantry exhibited by the officers and men composing my regiment upon that unfortunate day. Only one week in the field, and during all that time bivouacked in line of battle in the face of the enemy, with heavy picket and other duties, consequent upon our advanced position, to perform, but little time or opportunity had been given to organize or drill the regiment. Laboring under difficulties and disadvantages which few if any regiments from Ohio have ever experienced, the men went into the engagements with an eagerness which only novices in war ever exhibit, and maintained themselves with a gallantry which would have done honor to veterans.

Where all did so well it may seem unnecessary and unjust to designate any by name, but I cannot close without calling your attention to the gallant conduct and valuable assistance rendered me that day by Maj. Jefferson Brumback and Capt. J. M. Stuart, Company A, who after the first engagement acted as one of my field officers. Among the officers who were in the several engagements and who displayed great personal courage I desire to mention Captains Thomas, Darety, and Wylie, Lieutenants Peters and Yeomans. Lieut. A. G. Tuther, adjutant, although captured early in the day, displayed great gallantry and rendered valuable assistance during the time he was engaged. Captain Taylor's company at the commencement of the last engagement was deployed as skirmishers, and he deserves great credit for the gallant and skillful manner in which he handled his men.

I am, general, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. L. McMILLEN,

Colonel Ninety-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Brig. Gen. L. THOMAS.

Report of Lieut. Thomas P. Jones, Ninety-fifth Ohio Infantry.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1862.

DEAR SIR: I submit to you a report of the Ninety-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the engagement near Richmond, Ky., on August 30, 1862:

The total strength of the regiment on the morning of the battle was 975. Colonel McMillen, commanding, with lieutenant-colonel, major, and 26 company officers, and 835 privates and non-commissioned officers, moved to the battle-field at 7 a. m., and went into the battle. Sixty were left on guard duty, 65 were left at Lexington, and 15 were in the hospital. I gathered on the road and around Lexington 168 of the privates and 3 commissioned officers that were in the battle. With these and the 65 privates left at Lexington to guard camp I moved in the column to the camp near Louisville. The total number now in camp is 4 commissioned officers and 233 privates and non-commissioned officers. Of those of the regiment who have not reported at camp near Louisville, 100 escaped to Ohio, 550 were taken prisoners and paroled, and the remainder killed, wounded, and missing.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. P. JONES,

First Lieut., Comdg. Ninety-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

IN CAMP NEAR LOUISVILLE, KY.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of officers and men of my command:

Its original strength, when I first came to Richmond, Ky., was 250 men, with the proper company officers. One hundred of these men were taken to escort a battery to London. They were ordered to remain at London, which they did, until Colonel Houk, with his command, was ordered from Barboursville to London, and they ordered to join me at Richmond, which they did the day before the fight at Big Hill, when the whole command were scattered, some captured, and others went to Cumberland Gap, and about 100 men came back to Richmond. Again in the battle of Richmond were my men scattered, and I now have but 75 men, 3 captains, and 2 lieutenants.

I am, general, your most obedient servant,

BILL CROSS,

Major, Comdg. Detachment Third Regt. East Tenn. Vols.

The following just received from General Smith, dated Richmond, Ky.:

We had three fights on the 30th near this place; enemy completely routed; General Nelson wounded in the thigh; General Miller killed; 3,000 prisoners captured, including General Manson and staff, together with all their artillery, small-arms, wagons, &c.; our loss small.

Reports of Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith, C. S. Army, commanding Army of Kentucky, including operations August 30–September 16, and congratulatory orders.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
Richmond, Ky., August 30, 1862.

SIR: It is my great pleasure to announce to you that God has thrice blessed our arms to-day. After a forced march, almost day and night, for three days, over a mountainous wilderness, destitute alike of food and water, I found the enemy drawn up in force to oppose us at a point 8 miles from this place. With less than half my force I attacked and carried a very strong position at Mount Zion Church after a hard fight of two hours; again a still better position at White's farm in a half hour, and finally in this town, just before sunset, our indomitable troops deliberately walked (they were too tired to run) up to a magnificent position, manned by 10,000 of the enemy (many of them perfectly fresh), and carried it in fifteen minutes. It is for me now to give you the exact results of these glorious battles:

Our loss is comparatively small; that of the enemy many hundred killed and wounded and several thousand prisoners. We have captured artillery, small-arms, and wagons. Indeed, everything indicates the almost entire annihilation of this force of the enemy. In the first two battles they were commanded by General Manson; in the last by General Nelson. Re-enforcements must be sent up to me at once. We have large numbers of adherents here, who, if we can show an ability to maintain ourselves, will flock to our standard.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. KIRBY SMITH,

Major-General, Commanding.

General S. COOPER, A. and I. G., C. S. Army, Richmond, Va.

P. S.—

AUGUST 31.

GENERAL: I have only time to add that the commander of the enemy (General Nelson) was wounded in the thigh; its second in command (General Manson, and staff) a prisoner in this place, and General Miller killed; all their artillery taken; some 3,500 prisoners and their whole force dispersed in every direction. The cavalry continues to bring in prisoners.

Respectfully, and in haste,

E. KIRBY SMITH,

Major-General.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF KENTUCKY,

Lexington, Ky., September 3, 1862.

GENERAL: On the 30th ultimo our forces met and repulsed the enemy in three separate engagements. General Cleburne's division, which was in advance, came upon the enemy's advance about 6 miles from Richmond early in the day and drove it from the field before the remainder of my column was brought into action. Falling back about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles and receiving re-enforcements the enemy again made a stand and were again driven from the field in confusion. My cavalry having been sent to the enemy's rear I could not pursue rapidly, and he formed his line of battle in the outskirts of Richmond, his force having swelled to the number of 10,000 men, General Nelson commanding. Within an hour after our column was deployed for the attack the enemy were utterly routed and retreated in terrible confusion. The cavalry came in upon their flank and scattered them in all directions, capturing all their artillery and train. Not a regiment escaped in order.

The enemy's loss during the day is about 1,400 killed and wounded and 4,000 prisoners. Our loss is about 500 killed and wounded. General Miller was killed, General Nelson wounded, and General Manson taken prisoner. The remnant of the Federal force in Kentucky is making its way, utterly demoralized and scattered, to the Ohio.

General Marshall is in communication with me. Our column is moving upon Cincinnati. The country is rising in arms, and all that is needed to accomplish the objects of the campaign is to have our left in communication with your right. If I am supported and can be supplied with arms 25,000 Kentucky troops in a few days would be added to my command. Breckinridge and Buckner should be here.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. KIRBY SMITH,

Major-General.

General BRAXTON BRAGG, Commanding Army of the West.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
Lexington, Ky., September 6, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that after giving my men one day's rest at Richmond, a rest which I deemed absolutely essential, I pushed on toward this place on the 1st instant, and entered it with a portion of my infantry on the 2d. The cavalry I sent forward in pursuit of the enemy, who had retreated by the Frankfort road. It would be impossible for me to exaggerate the enthusiasm of the people here on the entry of our troops. They evidently regarded us as their deliverers from oppression and have continued in every way to prove to us that the heart of Kentucky is with the South in this struggle. They are rapidly rallying to our flag, and my especial object in writing this letter is to urge upon the Confederate Government to support the people of this State in the present movement by rapidly throwing to our aid men and arms. If Bragg occupies Buell we can have nothing to oppose us but raw levies, and by the blessing of God will always dispose of them as we did on the memorable August 30.

I am still unable to give you a detailed report of the combats of that day. The killed and wounded of the enemy exceed 1,000; the prisoners amount to between 5,000 and 6,000; the loss—besides some twenty pieces of artillery, including that taken here and at Frankfort—9,000 small-arms and large quantities of supplies. Their scattered forces are represented by every one as being totally demoralized. They escaped by mounting their infantry behind their cavalry and upon the wagons.

Our cavalry, under Colonel Scott, pursued the enemy to within 12 miles of Louisville, when the jaded condition of their horses forced them to abandon the pursuit. The remnants of the enemy's force are in Louisville and Covington. I have sent a small force to Frankfort to take possession of the arsenal and public property there. I am pushing some forces in the direction of Cincinnati in order to give the people of Kentucky time to organize. General Heth, with the advance, is at Cynthiana, with orders to threaten Covington. At both Louisville and Cincinnati the troops are said to be collecting in large numbers. At the former place there are said to be fully 30,000. Although the people about here are rapidly enrolling their names, yet without some immediate aid from the Government we can hardly hope to resist successfully the hosts that are preparing to meet us.

Hoping that this matter will receive the prompt attention its importance demands, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. KIRBY SMITH,
Major-General, Commanding.

General S. COOPER, A. and I. G. C. S. Army, Richmond, Va.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
Lexington, Ky., September 16, 1862.

GENERAL: In my short letter of the 30th ultimo I gave you the results of my actions of that day, of which I have the honor now to make a more detailed report.

Before leaving Barbourville for this part of Kentucky I wrote to you, fully explaining the reasons that prompted me to take that step. Until my advance descended the Big Hill it met with no opposition from the enemy. Here, on the morning of the 29th, the enemy was discovered to be in force in our front, and a bold reconnoissance by the cavalry, under Colonel Scott, in the afternoon, indicated a determination to give us battle. Although Churchill's division did not get up until late in the afternoon, and then in apparently an exhausted state, I determined to march to Richmond the next day, even at the cost of a battle with the whole force of the enemy. The leading division, under General Cleburne, was moved early the next morning, and after advancing 2 or 3 miles they found the enemy drawn up in line of battle in a fine position near Mount Zion Church, about 6 miles from Richmond. Without waiting for Churchill's division Cleburne at once commenced the action, and when I arrived on the field at 7.30 o'clock the fire of artillery was brisk on both sides. As my force was almost too small to storm the position in front without a disastrous loss I sent General Churchill with one of his brigades to turn the enemy's right. While this move was being executed a bold and well-conducted attempt on the part of the enemy to turn Cleburne's right was admirably foiled by the firmness of Col. Preston Smith's brigade, who repulsed the enemy with great slaughter. It was about this time, and while he was riding from his left to his right, that General Cleburne was badly wounded in the face, and thus at a critical moment I was deprived of the services of one of the most gallant, zealous, and intelligent officers of my whole army. The command of this division then devolved upon Col. Preston Smith.

In the mean time General Churchill had been completely successful in his movement upon the enemy's right flank, where by a bold charge his men completed a victory already partially gained by the gallantry of our troops on the right. In this action our loss was quite heavy on the right, but in comparison with that of the enemy was small.

It being reported that the enemy had taken up a new position on White's farm, 2 miles in front, I ordered Churchill with one brigade to again turn his right, intending to bring up Preston Smith on the other flank; but a desperate attempt on the part of the enemy to crush Churchill caused the action to commence before the arrival of Smith's division, and so this gallant brigade (Colonel McCray's) of Texans and Arkansians had to fight the battle alone. Although the odds opposed to them were fearful, yet by reserving their own fire under the deafening roar of the enemy's guns, and by a well-timed and dashing charge upon the advancing line they completely routed and put to flight the hosts of the enemy just as the cheers of Smith's division announced their arrival in the field. The loss of the enemy here was very great, including one piece of artillery; ours almost nothing.

Scott's cavalry having been sent around to our left by another road to get in the rear of Richmond, I felt during the whole day much need of cavalry to follow up our different successes. It was then that in this second repulse of the enemy I ordered Captain Nelson, commanding a company of Partisan Rangers, to charge the retreating masses of the enemy. This was promptly and admirably obeyed, the result being the capture of numerous prisoners. In passing a deserted camp of the enemy I found from some of the wounded that General Nelson with reinforcements had arrived after the second battle. A march of 2 miles brought us within sight of the town, in front of which and on a commanding ridge, with both flanks resting upon woods, Nelson had determined to make a final stand. For the third time Churchill with a brigade (McNair's) was sent off to the left, when a deafening roar of musketry soon announced the raging of a furious combat. In the meanwhile Preston Smith, bringing up his division at a double-quick, formed with wonderful precision and rapidity in front of the enemy's center and left. Almost without waiting for the commands of the officers this division coolly advanced under the murderous fire of a force twice their number and drove them from the field in the greatest confusion and with immense slaughter.

Owing to the open character of the country our loss in the last fight was quite heavy, including some valuable regimental officers. The exhausted condition of my men, together with the closing in of night, prevented the pursuit of the enemy more than a mile beyond Richmond, but the timely arrival of Colonel Scott with his cavalry upon their two lines of retreat enabled him to greatly increase the fruits of the hard labors of the day by capturing large numbers of prisoners, including General Manson and staff, as also eight pieces of artillery and a number of wagons, &c. While my whole force was not more than 5,000 that of the enemy was more than 10,000. In the last engagement we took prisoners from thirteen regiments.

Our loss, killed and wounded, is about 400; that of the enemy over 1,000, and his prisoners about 5,000. The immediate fruits of the victory were nine pieces of artillery, some 10,000 small-arms, and large quantities of supplies. These latter were greatly increased by our capture of this place and Frankfort, the whole number of cannon taken being about twenty.

I regret that I am unable to forward with this the reports of all the different commands of the forces engaged. Those inclosed (General Churchill's and Colonel Scott's) will show you how much cause the Confederacy has to be proud of her sons. I almost fear to particularize lest I do not full justice to all; but I cannot close without expressing my admiration at the promptness and intelligence with which Generals Churchill and Cleburne and Col. Preston Smith executed the orders given them.

My thanks are due to the following members of my staff, who were with me on the field, for their active assistance to me during the day, viz: Cols. [John] Pegram and [W. R.] Boggs, Lient. Col. [G. W.] Brent; Majs. J. A. Brown, [H. McD.] McElrath, and Thomas; Capt. [John G.] Meem, [jr.]; Lieuts. [E.] Cunningham and Pratt; and Cpts. Walworth and Hammond, and Mr. Freret, volunteer aides. Too much praise cannot be given to the medical director, Surg. S. A. Smith, and to his assistants, for their untiring devotion in the arduous labors that devolved upon them.

As regards the intrepid behavior of the true patriots (the men in ranks) I can only say that as long as the destinies of the South remain in such hands we need never fear Northern subjugation. But even more than their noble courage before the enemy are we called upon to admire that higher courage which enabled them to undergo without murmur the fatigues and privations of one of the most difficult marches of this war. For several days and parts of the nights, through a country almost entirely without water, over stony roads, with their almost bare feet, and with green corn and beef without salt as their only food, did these gallant men trudge along, inspired only with the desire of being led against the invaders of their homes and the oppressors of their liberties.

I refer you to the reports of the division and brigade commanders, only a part of which I am now able to forward, for notices of special cases of good behavior.

I remain, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. KIRBY SMITH,

Major-General.

CONGRATULATORY ORDERS.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
 } Richmond, Ky., August 30, 1862.
 No. 10. } (Received at Richmond, Va., Sept. 6, 1862.)

The major-general commanding returns his heartfelt thanks to the troops of this command (officers and men) for their exceeding gallantry in the several actions of this day, their patient and unmurmuring endurance of fatigue during two days' and nights' forced marches, and fighting three battles in twelve hours. The country shall know of your sufferings on the march, as well as the bold, pressing charges of this day.

To-morrow being Sunday, the general desires that the troops shall assemble and, under their several chaplains, shall return thanks to Almighty God, to whose mercy and goodness these victories are due.

By command of Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith:

JNO. PEGRAM,
Chief of Staff.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 2, } Sparta, Tenn., September 5, 1862.
 No. 128.

I. The signal triumph of our arms in Virginia over the combined forces of McClellan and Pope had hardly been announced to the whole of this command before we are again called upon to rejoice and give thanks to God for a victory as brilliant and complete achieved in our own campaign by the troops under Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith at Richmond, Ky., on the 30th ultimo. The enemy, under Major-General Nelson, was completely routed, with the commander wounded, one general killed, and one captured, with 3,000 other prisoners. Not the least important of the fruits secured was the whole of the enemy's artillery, small-arms, and transportation.

II. Comrades, our campaign opens most auspiciously and promises complete success. Your general is happy and proud to witness the tone and conduct of his army. Contented and cheerful under privations and strictly regardful of the rights of citizens, you have achieved a victory over yourselves which insures success against every foe. The enemy is in full retreat, with consternation and demoralization devastating his ranks. To secure the full fruits of this condition we must press on vigorously and unceasingly. You will be called on to make greater sacrifices still, to suffer other, perhaps greater, privations, but your generals will share them and a grateful people will reward you. Alabamians, your State is redeemed. An arrogant foe no longer treads her soil. Tennesseans, the restoration of your capital and State government is almost accomplished without firing a gun. You return to your invaded homes conquerors and heroes. Kentuckians, the first great blow has been struck for your freedom. The manacles will soon fall from your limbs, when we know you will arise and strike for your freedom, your women, and your altars. Soldiers from the Gulf, South Carolina, Georgia, and Arkansas, we share the happiness of our more fortunate brothers, and will press on with them, rejoicing in the hope that a brighter future is in store for the fruitful fields, happy homes, and fair daughters of our own sunny South.

*Reports of Col. John S. Scott, First Louisiana Cavalry, commanding Cavalry Brigade, including operations from August 13–September 11.

HDQRS. KIRBY SMITH'S BRIG., August 17, 1862.

COLONEL: I reached London at 8 o'clock this morning, after a ride of 160 miles in seventy hours. I failed to surprise the telegraph office at Somerset and found the force at this place in position to fight me when I arrived. We soon cleared the town, took 75 prisoners, killed and wounded about 50. Lost 1 lieutenant and a private killed; 3 or 4 wounded. Captured 40 or 50 wagons, 175 mules, camp and garrison equipage, some ammunition, about 50 guns, very small commissary stores. My men have been skirmishing to-day between this and Barboursville.

Bearer is instructed to tell you my whereabouts to-night. Kentuckians not fight us much this trip. There is quite a large camp at Dick Robinson. Do have Starnes sent to me, for I must go to the blue-grass region for forage.

Yours, respectfully, &c.,

J. S. SCOTT,
Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS KIRBY SMITH'S BRIGADE,
Lebanon, Ky., September 11, 1862.

The evening of August 13 I left Kingston, Tenn., with the First Louisiana Cavalry, Lieut. Col. [James O.] Nixon commanding; First Georgia Cavalry, Col. [J. J.] Morrison, and the Buckner Guards, Captain Garnett, numbering in the aggregate 896, and passing through Montgomery and Jamestown, Tenn., Monticello and Somerset, Ky. reached London on the 17th. During the night of the 16th, when 25 miles from London, I learned that five companies of the Third* Tennessee Volunteers, U. S. Army, were stationed there. I selected 500 men from the command and made a forced march, reaching the town about 7 o'clock the next morning, when I attacked the place, and after a brief resistance by the enemy I captured it, killing 13, wounding 17, and taking 111 prisoners. My loss was 1 officer and 1 private killed; none wounded. I took a large number of wagons laden with quartermaster's and commissary stores, and a number of horses and mules, and several hundred stand of arms, all of which I have forwarded to you.

After leaving London I employed my command gathering mules, horses, and wagons that had been left along the road by the affrighted Federals from London to Mount Vernon and Richmond.

The evening of the 22d, learning that a train was coming (intended for the Gap), guarded by infantry and cavalry, I moved my command to meet them. My advance came upon them at Big Hill, 17 miles from Richmond, when the fight commenced, and resulted as stated in my former report.†

After driving in their pickets within 2 miles of Richmond the morning of the 24th and gathering up all the trains, horses, and mules, I fell back slowly to the junction of the Wild Cat and Richmond roads, which I reached the evening of the 25th.

On the 27th the Third Tennessee Cavalry, Col. [J. W.] Starnes, was added to my command, and I moved on in the direction of Richmond.

On the 29th I made a reconnaissance of the enemy with my whole command, and finding them in position about 3 miles from Richmond I fell back 4 miles to the infantry and reported to General Cleburne, who was in command of the advance division.

On the morning of the 30th, in obedience to your orders, I passed around to the west of Richmond and took possession of the roads leading to Lexington. The majority of my forces were posted on the Lexington road and one company on the Lancaster road; the remainder between the two roads. About 4 o'clock stragglers from the battlefield commenced passing into my lines and gradually increased in numbers until 6 o'clock, when the main body of the enemy, apparently about 5,000 strong, with nine pieces of artillery, came upon us. My forces, being well ambuscaded, poured a destructive fire into their ranks, killing about 60 and wounding a large number—the firing commenced in obedience to my orders on the extreme left, extending to the right, which was nearest Richmond—after which almost the entire force immediately surrendered. Owing to the smallness of my force (about 850) I was unable to still guard the roads and remove all the prisoners to the rear, and consequently a large number escaped, wandering through the corn fields and woodlands, it being now too dark to distinguish them when a few paces distant. I am unable to state positively the number of prisoners taken by my command, owing to the fact that they were captured principally after dark, and during the same night were turned over to General Preston Smith, in obedience to your orders, but am confident they could not fall short of 3,500. I captured also nine pieces of artillery, a large number of small-arms, and wagons loaded with army supplies. Among the prisoners captured was Brigadier-General Manson and a number of field and staff officers.

On the morning of the 31st I moved to the Kentucky River and drove the rear guard of the enemy from the opposite bank.

September 1 I moved on and encamped near Lexington, and on the 2d moved around Lexington and encamped near Georgetown; on the 3d we moved on to Frankfort and hoisted the battle flag of the First Louisiana Cavalry (in default of a Confederate flag) on the capitol of the State, while the rear guard of the enemy (now about 8,000 strong) were quiet spectators from the opposite hills. The same evening I detailed all my command with horses in condition to travel (450 in number) to pursue the enemy and harass his rear.

The next morning, September 4, about sunrise they came upon the enemy near Shelbyville, and drove them into and through the town and then crossed over the railroad and destroyed the bridges in obedience to your orders, and returned to camp near Frankfort. The 6th and 7th remained in camp near Frankfort.

The evening of the 8th left Frankfort and reached this place at 9 o'clock this morning.

My loss since leaving Kingston is 1 officer and 6 privates killed, 21 wounded, and 9 taken prisoners.

Since reaching London I have captured near 4,000 prisoners (including those turned over to General Smith and those paroled by me), about 375 wagons, mostly laden with provisions and army stores, near 1,500 mules, and a large number of horses. It has been impossible to keep an account of the wagons, &c., captured by my command, owing to the rapidity of my movement.

I cannot close this report without bearing testimony to the soldierly conduct of my command; they have endured unusual privations and fatigues without murmur.

I cannot compliment the commanders of the regiments composing this brigade too highly for the assistance rendered me.

I would mention that the first 106 miles of our march, over a rough and barren country, was made in forty-two hours, having been delayed one day on account of getting my horses shod.

The statement of the property captured at Frankfort was handed in at your headquarters by me in person on Saturday last.

My forces have been materially reduced by the numerous details which I found it necessary to make in order to remove wagons and stock to the rear, and I shall use my utmost endeavors to concentrate my command at as early a day as possible.

Hoping that the results achieved by the Kirby Smith Brigade may prove satisfactory to you, general, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. S. SCOTT,
Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

Report of Brig. Gen. Thomas J. Churchill, C. S. Army, commanding Third Division.

HDQRS. THIRD DIVISION, ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
Cynthiana, Ky., September 8, 1862.

I have the honor to report that on the morning of the 30th ultimo, according to instructions, I moved my division, composed of the First and Second Brigades, commanded by Colonels McCray and McNair respectively up the road in the direction of Richmond. When I arrived in the neighborhood of Kingston I heard the artillery open on our right, showing that General Cleburne had met the enemy. It was now about 8 a. m. It was at this time that you arrived on the field and ordered me to hold one of my brigades in reserve while with the other I was to make a flank movement on the enemy's right. In accordance with these instructions I left Colonel McNair with his brigade as a reserve force, and proceeded with Colonel McCray's brigade (composed of Arkansas and Texas troops) to execute the movement on the enemy's flank, and by proceeding cautiously through a corn field and a ravine had almost perfected the move when the enemy, pressed by our forces on our right, commenced to give way, but after falling back some distance they formed in a skirt of timber, when my forces fired and charged upon them. Then for the first time discovering my position they commenced a precipitate retreat, but not before we had killed a great many and taken a large number of prisoners. I was again ordered to move up on the left with the same brigade, while General Cleburne was to move on the right. After proceeding some 2 miles in the direction of Richmond I found the entire force of the enemy, numbering 8,000 or 10,000, in a strong position on the left of the road, concealed by a corn field and a skirt of timber. I then sent word to General Cleburne to move up, that I was ready to engage the enemy. I then placed one section of Capt. [John T.] Humphreys' battery [Arkansas], under command of Lieutenant ———, on my right, within 200 yards of the enemy, to more effectually rake his lines. Before General Cleburne's division came up the fight had commenced in earnest. The fire of the enemy's artillery and musketry was most terrific, while we replied only with artillery. I then ordered my command to lie down, protected by a fence and ditch, and for full five minutes we did not fire a gun in response to their terrible fire. The enemy were at this time advancing in heavy force, and when they had arrived within less than 50 yards of my lines the order was given to rise, fire, and charge, which order was promptly and gallantly obeyed. The enemy could not withstand the desperate courage of my men, but still for a while they contested every inch of ground as they were driven from it, until finally, finding it impossible to check this gallant charge, they gave way in every direction. The victory was complete. The field was covered with the dead and wounded of the enemy, and some (though comparatively few) of the gallant sons of Arkansas and Texas fell martyrs to the cause of liberty. Here we captured a large number of prisoners, guns, and equipments of all kinds. In this charge one splendid rifle cannon was taken. This was perhaps the most severely-contested fight of the day.

Finding this brigade now worn down by incessant fighting, I ordered up Colonel McNair to follow in pursuit of the fleeing enemy. After pursuing them some 2 miles we found them again drawn up in line near the outskirts of Richmond, having collected their whole force for a last and final struggle. Here I took position on the right of the enemy's line. Soon my skirmishers engaged those of the enemy, which was soon followed by a general engagement of my forces. I was driving back the enemy's right wing when I heard firing on my right, showing that General Cleburne had engaged the enemy on their left. The engagement then became general along the entire line. For a time the contest was sharp and the rattle of musketry almost deafening, but again and for the third and last time the enemy fled in great confusion through the streets of Richmond as night closed upon our victorious arms.

I captured in this engagement a large amount of ordnance and ordnance stores, together with 400 or 500 prisoners.

I cannot speak too highly of the gallantry and coolness displayed by Colonels McNair and McCray throughout the entire day, and I have to thank them for the promptness and skill with which they executed all orders.

Of the two batteries in my division the one commanded by Capt. [James P.] Douglas [Texas] was ordered the evening previous to report to General Cleburne for orders. The other, commanded by Captain Humphreys, was with my division the whole day, and it gives me great pleasure to say that his pieces were handled with surprising skill and ability and did great execution in the ranks of the enemy.

My loss during the entire day in killed, wounded, and missing was 225.

Before closing I must particularly mention for their daring, bravery, and gallant bearing on the battle-field the following members of my staff: Capt. B. S. Johnson, adjutant-general; Capt. B. F. Blackburn, inspector-general; Capt. John Rennick, volunteer aide; Captain [Elcon] Jones, Signal Corps, and Lieut. J. M. Rose, ordnance officer. These officers were ever seen bearing orders through the thickest of the fight and at times in the front of battle, cheering on my men to victory.

My division surgeon, Dr. C. H. Smith, in addition to his professional services upon the field to the wounded, rendered me many valuable services.

The officers and men of my entire division always met the enemy with unflinching gallantry and were the proud victors of every battle-field; and for the privations, hardships, and almost unequalled marches, all of which they have borne without a murmur, they deserve the thanks of their country.

I have the honor to be, general, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

T. J. CHURCHILL,

Brigadier-General, Comdg. Third Div., Army of Kentucky.

Maj. Gen. E. KIRBY SMITH.

No. 19.

Report of Col. T. H. McCray, Thirty-first Arkansas Infantry, commanding First Brigade.

CAMP NEAR CYNTHIANA, KY., Sept. 6, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that the troops of this brigade, consisting of the Tenth Texas Regiment, dismounted cavalry, commanded by Col. C. R. Earp; the Eleventh Texas Regiment, dismounted cavalry, commanded by Col. J. C. Burks; the Fourteenth Texas Regiment, dismounted cavalry, commanded by Col. M. D. Ector; the Fifteenth [Thirty-second?] Texas Regiment, dismounted cavalry, commanded by Lieut. Col. James Weaver, and McCray's Arkansas regiment of sharpshooters, commanded by Maj. J. W. Clark, were twice engaged with the enemy on the 30th ultimo before Richmond, Ky., after a forced march of 13 miles.

At about 9 a. m. I was ordered to march my brigade, left in front, to a skirt of woods about 1 mile to the left of the turnpike road leading to Richmond, for the purpose of flanking the enemy, who was already briskly engaged with Brigadier-General Cleburne's division. At the place designated the brigade was moved in line of battle directly on the right wing of the enemy's line, which was immediately turned, and they fled in confusion, leaving on the field a large number of killed, wounded, and prisoners. The enemy retreated about 2 miles and again formed line of battle, covered by a skirt of woods and a field of very heavy corn. I was ordered to attack him with my brigade, numbering at that time not exceeding 1,500 effective men. The line of battle was immediately formed and marched directly in front of the enemy's lines, who numbered not less than 6,000 infantry, supported by a full battery of six pieces and one regiment of cavalry. When within about 400 yards of the enemy he opened his battery upon us, which was rapidly followed with volleys of musketry; but my gallant troops pressed steadily forward under a galling fire of bombs, rifle-shot, and Minie balls to a fence not exceeding 200 yards of his lines, where, finding the air literally filled with bomb-shells and Minie balls, I ordered the troops to lie down under cover of the fence to prevent the little command from being crushed out by overwhelming numbers. I remained in this position for fully twenty minutes, during all of which time the most incessant firing of cannon and musketry I have ever heard was kept up by the enemy, without being replied to except by one section of Captain Humphreys' Arkansas battery, commanded by Lieutenant ———, who did very efficient service. The two pieces of artillery were posted on my extreme right. The enemy, misconstruing my silence and thinking he could crush me before re-enforcements could arrive, ordered a charge, and on came his solid columns. I immediately ordered my command to lie still and not fire a gun until ordered to do so, and when his lines had advanced to within less than 50 yards the order fire was given and promptly responded to by the entire command. The effect was terrific. The advancing columns of the enemy faltered and staggered from one end of his lines to the other. My command was ordered to load rapidly, mount the fence, and charge, which were admirably and gallantly executed. The enemy soon commenced falling back, but obstinately contested every inch of ground, taking shelter and firing at us from behind trees, some haystacks, corn-pens, and a fence that happened to be on the line of his retreat, for about half a mile, where, being so closely pursued and pressed, they fled in all directions, leaving on the field 500 in killed, wounded, and prisoners, 1 piece of rifled cannon, 600 Minie rifles, 300,000 Enfield rifled cartridges, wagons, teams, ambulances, &c.

It is impossible for me to speak in terms of too high praise of the gallantry and intrepid valor of the officers and privates of this command. Each one, it seemed, tried to excel his comrade in deeds of daring. I will mention a few names of the officers who were under my immediate observation: Cols. M. D. Ector and J. C. Burks, Lieut. Col. James Weaver, and Majs. R. Redwine and J. W. Clark particularly distinguished themselves, being in the front of battle and cheering on their men during the entire engagement, and my staff officers, Captain Kilgore, assistant adjutant-general; Captain Ford, brigade quartermaster; Dr. Graham, brigade surgeon; Captain Spencer, brigade commissary; Captain Fitzpatrick, inspector-general, and Lieutenant Lane, aide-de-camp, were each at their proper post and rendered me very efficient service. Captains Kilgore, Spencer, and Fitzpatrick, and Lieutenant Lane were on the field, and I will add on every part of the field, and unflinchingly did their duty in all respects. Captain Ford was in command of the train, and Dr. Graham was at the hospital rendering his surgical aid to the dying and the wounded soldiers. Lieutenant Nichols, assistant provost-marshal, acted with great gallantry and justly merits praise.

In this connection it would be an act of injustice in me not to mention the names of Captains Johnson and Rennick, of your staff. I have never seen cooler and more determined bravery displayed by any one. They were a great part of the time in front of my skirmishers inspiring my men to press forward.

I must also return my most grateful thanks to Dr. Smith, division surgeon, for his efficient surgical aid to the wounded on the field.

The loss in killed, wounded, and missing is 149, as follows: Killed, 20; wounded, 120, and missing, 9.

The battery belonging to this brigade, commanded by Captain Douglas, was with General Cleburne's division. Inclosed herewith I send you the captain's report* of the engagement, as also the reports of the different regimental commanders of this brigade..

All of which is respectfully referred.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report the following loss and casualties† in the Second Brigade, Third Division, Army of Kentucky, in the action near Richmond on August 30.

In regard to the part my brigade took in the late battle near Richmond, Ky., I will only say that both officers and men did their whole duty. I will not particularize, lest I do some one injustice, but will leave you and the country to judge of us.

HDQRS. 2D BRIG., 4TH DIV., ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
Richmond, Ky., September 1, 1862.

GENERAL: On the morning of the 29th ultimo I was ordered by you to advance on the Richmond road to a point where the road emerged from a gap in the hills about 5 miles from the foot of Big Hill, and to act as advance guard of the army.

About 5 p. m. I heard cannonading in my front, and learned that Colonel Scott's cavalry were being driven in and they had already lost one of the mountain howitzers. Subsequently the cannonading ceased, and Colonel Scott, coming into camp, informed me he was encamped in the road in my front; that our whole front was well picketed; that the enemy were not advancing. Still feeling uneasy about our situation, with an unknown force of the enemy in our front, I determined, as a matter of precaution, to form line of battle facing the supposed direction of the enemy. This was not accomplished until some time after dark. I then warned commanders of regiments at the first alarm to bring their regiments to their prescribed positions on this line, and then dismissed them, retaining, however, my battery and company of sharpshooters on the line. I had scarcely dismissed them, however, before firing and yelling was heard in our front, and almost simultaneously a multitude of stragglers, consisting of part of Colonel Scott's cavalry brigade, sick men, baggage wagons, servants leading horses, came flying in in the utmost consternation, closely pursued by the whole of Colonel Metcalfe's command of United States cavalry, who were firing on them and yelling as though they were all excited with liquor. I reformed my line rapidly, leaving the road clear. When within 25 steps two companies of the Forty-eighth Tennessee fired on the enemy's advance and checked it. The enemy then dismounted one regiment of cavalry and again advanced. It was very dark and they could not see my line of battle, but they kept up a continuous fire on our camp-fires, which were blazing brightly 300 yards in our rear. A few sharpshooters were now pushed forward, the enemy showing great reluctance to advance, and in spite of curses and threats, which we could plainly hear, the whole force of the enemy precipitately retreated.

In this affair we had but one man wounded. The enemy had several dangerously wounded. We captured 30 prisoners, 100 stand of arms, and several horses. The enemy retreated in such haste they cut the reins of their horses, which, as before stated, they had hitched for the purpose of advancing on foot, fearing it would take too much time to unhitch them. My men slept in line of battle without any supper, and at daylight again advanced in search of the enemy.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

P. R. CLEBURNE,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Second Brigade.

HDQRS. DEPT. OF E. TENN., Knoxville, Tenn., Nov. 16, 1862.

Respectfully forwarded. Owing to movement from Kentucky this communication, being mislaid, could not be sooner forwarded.

E. KIRBY SMITH,

Lieutenant-General.

RICHMOND, KY., September 1, 1862.

GENERAL: On the night of the 29th ultimo I was informed by Colonel Boggs, of your staff, that you desired me to move forward with my division and the two batteries attached at daylight and attack the enemy, supposed to be immediately in my front. At daylight I commenced the movement. The Second Brigade and the battery of Captain Douglas (commanded by Col. B. J. Hill) was in front. The First Brigade, under Acting Brig. Gen. Preston Smith, with the battery of Captain Martin, followed at the distance of a quarter of a mile. I sent the Buckner Guards (a company of Scott's cavalry) in front to find the enemy. Half a mile north of the village of Kingston the cavalry encountered the advance guard of the enemy and soon after discovered their line of battle about 500 or 600 yards in rear of their advance guard. Going forward to reconnoiter I could distinctly see their first line facing us at right angles to the Richmond road, with one regiment to the right of the road, the others in the timber to the left. They had a battery masked near the Richmond road. I immediately placed Colonel Hill's brigade in line behind the crest of a low hill which ran parallel to and about 500 yards from the enemy's line. I placed Douglas' battery on the crest near my center. I ordered Smith's brigade to be formed in line within supporting distance; he accordingly formed his brigade in line behind the crest of a second hill in my rear. While making these dispositions the enemy, showing only one regiment, kept up a ridiculous fire on us from a little mountain howitzer which they had captured the day before from Colonel Scott.

I now ordered the battery of Captain Douglas to open on what appeared to be a squad of cavalry on the Richmond road. In a moment this squad disappeared, unmasking a battery, which opened a rapid fire. I sent out skirmishers along our front and toward our right flank, and extended my line to the left across the Richmond turnpike with a strong company of skirmishers. This company held the regiment of the enemy's infantry on the same side of the road in check during the whole of the first fight and effectually protected my left flank. Finding a good position for a second battery I sent orders to acting Brig. Gen. Preston Smith to send Martin's battery to the front. I placed it on the hill near the right of my brigade and opened on the enemy. At this juncture I received an order from you, directing me to avoid a general battle until General Churchill's division could get up. I now directed the artillery to fire very slowly and not waste a round. The battle continued a mere fight of artillery and skirmishers for over two hours, when the enemy commenced moving toward my right flank, driving back my skirmishers on that flank. I ordered a regiment of Smith's brigade (the One hundred and fifty-fourth Tennessee) to be sent forward, and placed it in line on the right of my brigade. A close fire soon commenced on the right, and became so heavy I found it necessary to sustain the right with a further re-enforcement. I detached Col. [L. E.] Polk, commanding the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Arkansas Regiments, to the support of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Tennessee. A very heavy musketry fight ensued, and learning that the enemy were still concentrating against my right, and believing that General Churchill must now be within supporting distance, I ordered Acting Brig. Gen. Preston Smith to immediately move forward the remaining three regiments of his brigade, to place them on the right of the line already engaged, and if his line overlapped that of the enemy to lap around their left flank. At this time it was evident that the enemy had staked everything on driving back or turning our right flank and that they had weakened their center to effect this object. I therefore determined the moment I could hear Smith's musketry on the enemy's left flank to move Hill's brigade rapidly on the center. With this view I galloped to the right to satisfy myself that Smith's brigade was getting into position. I found them moving into the position rapidly and in admirable order. I then moved back to give my personal attention to the advance of Hill's brigade, including the two batteries. Before I got far, however, I was addressed by Colonel Polk, who was being carried wounded to the rear. I stopped an instant to reply and while doing so received a very painful wound in the mouth, which in a few minutes deprived me of the powers of speech and rendered my further presence on the field worse than useless. I sent aides to inform General Preston Smith of my mishap and to direct him to take command of the division; also to inform Colonel Hill and yourself of the situation of affairs.

Including the batteries, I had less than 3,000 men in my division. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

P. R. CLEBURNE,

Brig. Gen., Comdg. Fourth Division, Army of Kentucky.

Maj. Gen. E. KIRBY SMITH, Commanding Army of Kentucky.

No. 22.

Report of Col. Preston Smith, Provisional Army of the Confederate States, and Acting Brigadier-General, commanding First Brigade, Fourth Division.

HDQRS. FOURTH DIVISION, ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
September 16, 1862.

COLONEL: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by my command in the series of battles before the town of Richmond, Ky., on the 30th ultimo:

Early on that morning (4 a. m.) this division, Brigadier-General Cleburne commanding, was moved forward in line of battle from the place of bivouac, 5 miles south of Rogersville, and in the direction of that place, the Second Brigade, Colonel Hill commanding, being in advance, the First Brigade about 500 yards in the rear thereof.

At 7.30 a. m., the Second Brigade having passed the town of Rogersville and the First emerging therefrom, the enemy, some half a mile north of the town, opened fire upon us with his field battery. The division was speedily thrown in position for action, having been changed from line of battle to moving by the flank a short distance south of the town. The battery of the Second Brigade was soon in position and replied to the fire of the enemy, which was continued for more than an hour, skirmishing being kept up the while between the advanced forces of the two armies. About this time I received an order from Brigadier-General Cleburne to send my battery forward and to the right of the position occupied by the battery of the Second Brigade, which was done, and the guns were soon heard from this position. I also received an order from Brigadier-General Cleburne to send a regiment forward and to the right of the line of the Second Brigade, to be posted in woods and near a corn field on the right of this line. The front line being thus so extended by an additional regiment and the battery, I found it necessary to change the position of my brigade in order that I might be in more easy supporting distance. My line was therefore advanced to the front and to the right of my old position, the increasing fire from the right indicating that the regiment sent forward by me was already engaging the enemy. This regiment (the One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior Tennessee Regiment) was in fact already engaged when this new position was taken.

Very soon after this it was reported to me that the enemy was moving forward with the apparent design of flanking the front line on its right. I therefore moved forward my command and to the right until the front line was unmasked, at which time I was advised that the enemy with three regiments had certainly succeeded in entering the woods and corn fields on the right of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior Tennessee Regiment and would soon be in the rear of this regiment, now considerably advanced. Having assured myself of this, I caused a change of front forward on the left regiment to be executed, thus throwing the two right regiments entirely in the rear of the enemy, from which position my brigade advanced on him, taking him by surprise, and after a few well-directed volleys compelling him to abandon his cover and flee in great confusion toward his reserve. At this time the One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior Tennessee Regiment advanced and formed on the left of the line, and, the enemy having rallied, the whole brigade was again soon engaged, but under their steady advance and galling fire from Minie and Enfield rifles the enemy soon broke and fled for his rear, leaving the ground strewn thickly with his killed and wounded.

Some 500 prisoners were taken at and near this place by my command and turned over to Lieutenant Seay, detailed for the purpose of taking charge of the prisoners by the major-general commanding. The troops, being almost exhausted from previous hard marching, loss of sleep, and scanty fare, were compelled to desist from the pursuit and rest, during which their cartridge-boxes were replenished with ammunition preparatory to again advancing on the enemy.

At this time I was advised that Brigadier-General Cleburne had been wounded and had retired from the field. I therefore assumed command of the division, and the major-general commanding having arrived, by his direction I moved the division forward on the right-hand side of the road toward Richmond, Brigadier-General Churchill's division having been previously advanced on the left of the road and engaging the enemy soon after my division was put in motion.

This engagement was spirited, the enemy contesting the ground stubbornly with their force on the left of the road and shelling my command as we advanced toward him through the open fields; but being very hotly pressed by Brigadier-General Churchill's command he again fled, and by his superior speed secured to himself another ground on which to rally. The troops under my command were by this time almost famished for water, having only had about one canteen of muddy water to the man during the entire day. A scant supply of water having been obtained by the troops, we again pressed on and soon came in sight of him, posted in the south edge of the town of Richmond and in the country near that place. In this position he attacked the Third Division on the left of the road and the Second Brigade of the Fourth Division on the right of the road—the Twelfth and Forty-seventh Tennessee Regiments held as a reserve and the One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior and Thirteenth Tennessee Regiments on the right of the Second Brigade—whence after a stubborn resistance for half an hour he was driven, his ranks so thinned, broken, and scattered that it was again impossible for him to rally, and seeking safety in flight, the town with his stores, &c., were abandoned to us, and after an ineffectual pursuit 3 miles beyond the town we went into camp after twelve hours' hard fighting and marching.

A list of the prisoners taken by this command is already in your office.

It is with deep sorrow that I mention the fall of Col. Ed. Fitzgerald, of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior Tennessee Regiment, who fell early in the morning at the head of his regiment. As a man he was kind and gentle in his bearing, as a soldier he was equal to the discharge of his duty, as an officer diligent in executing the orders of his superiors, and as a leader in battle was ever to be found in the foremost ranks.

I would also mention Lieut. Col. [J. A.] Butler, of the Second Tennessee Regiment, who fell while leading his regiment in the last charge before Richmond. His life was given to the country while driving the vandal hordes from Southern soil and from the sacred precincts of the last resting place of the dead, which their commander had not scrupled to profane with his iniquitous clan. He sleeps there with the gallant dead of his command around him.

The gallant conduct of Col. B. J. Hill is worthy of conspicuous mention. Two horses were shot under him and three bullets struck his person. In spite of this he led his brigade without an apparent intermission, each casualty to him being so speedily succeeded by a quick remedy as to cause his appearance in the lead of his command to appear without interruption in the various contests through which he so valiantly passed.

Col. A. J. Vaughan, jr., who commanded the Second Brigade after I assumed command of the division, repeated the exhibition of judgment and coolness which he had displayed in leading his regiment in the first engagement of the day.

I cannot close this report without bearing testimony to the gallant conduct of the officers and privates of the command generally, and to say that I refrain from particularizing because of the great length to which this report would be extended.

I feel it due to a gallant foreigner to call your attention to his bearing throughout these several bloody conflicts—Lieut. Col. [C. J.] Polignac. Though not born on our soil, a stranger to nearly the entire command, not prompted by the many incentives which impel us to battle for our rights, but led on to see the right prevail and the sordid meanness of our foe punished, he has freely exposed himself to all the dangers of warfare, leading the gallant little band of which he was temporarily in command through the thickest of the fight and cheering them on to victory. He deserves the thanks of this country.

I here take great pleasure in speaking of the material service rendered me during the several engagements by Capt. M. W. Cluskey, assistant adjutant-general; Capt. J. H. Edmondson, brigade inspector; Maj. A. M. Looney, volunteer aide-de-camp, and Mr. F. B. Rodgers, my aide-de-camp, who in his personal encouragement of the troops when in the most desperate moments of the first engagement attracted my attention as well as that of his brother members of my staff and won the admiration of the entire command; to Lieutenants Hanly, Mayo, and Jetton, of Brigadier-General Cleburne's staff, who reported to me for duty after their general was wounded.

Herewith inclosed I submit the reports of Colonels Hill and Vaughan,* commanding the brigades of this division, to which reference is made as to the bearing of the officers and men of the several commands; also, marked A and B, the lists* of the killed and wounded of the brigades.

I have the honor, colonel, to be, your obedient servant,
PRESTON SMITH,

Acting Brigadier-General, Commanding.

No. 23.

Report of Col. Benjamin J. Hill, Thirty-fifth Tennessee Infantry, commanding Second Brigade.

CAMP NEAR FLORENCE, KY., September 15, 1862.

The Second Brigade, of which I am in command, having been placed in the advance on August 29 for the attack on the enemy's forces before Richmond, Ky., I beg leave to submit the following report of its action:

Halting in line of battle on either side of the Richmond and Big Hill turnpike, in the afternoon of Friday, August 29, some 10 miles south of the former place, we awaited the result of the movement of the cavalry, under Colonel Scott, of Louisiana, which had been sent forward to ascertain the force and position of the enemy.

About 5 o'clock quick and heavy artillery discovered to us a skirmish some 5 miles in our front going on between the cavalry and Federals, and a few minutes after dark Colonel Scott's forces came into our lines on a brisk trot, reporting an advance of both infantry and cavalry troops from the Lincolnites. The brigade was then moved up some 50 yards in line of battle upon a range of small hills which commanded the pike and fields on both sides for more than half a mile. The battery under Captain Douglas was thrown into position on an eminence to the left of the road, supported by the sharpshooters, the Second and Forty-eighth Tennessee Regiments. The regimental skirmishers were placed 200 yards in front of their respective commands. Almost instantly with the completion of these preparations a regiment of Federal cavalry, commanded by the notorious Metcalfe, came thundering down the road, crying "Charge, and shoot down the rebels." They were allowed to approach sufficiently near to ascertain by the sound on the road something of their exact whereabouts, when the skirmishers of the Forty-eighth Tennessee, whose right rested near the pike and who were commanded by Capt. [O. T.] Plummer, of Company A, were ordered to fire, throwing the cavalry into utter confusion, causing a pell-mell retreat. One of the enemy was here killed, several wounded, and three captured. Thirty breech-loading Sharps cavalry carbines were picked up by my men and the place strewn with blankets and accouterments.

The brigade here lay upon its arms until early light Saturday morning, the 30th, when the order was given to advance in line of battle, which was done for a distance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The cavalry scouts here reported the position of the enemy in large force three-quarters of a mile north of the little village of Kingston. The brigade was marched in column along the road a half mile beyond the latter place and formed into line of battle on the right of the pike at 7 o'clock. The enemy then commenced a heavy artillery fire upon our line and also on the village, from which direction the other brigade of this division, then under command of yourself, and the division of General Churchill were approaching. Our artillery was here ordered to advance to a nearer position, and our line of battle followed immediately on under a rapid fire from the field pieces of the enemy. The guns of our battery were thrown into position upon an uncovered field about 600 yards from the enemy's line of battle, which was formed some 50 yards in rear of their batteries. Our line of battle rested its center immediately in the rear of our battery in the following order: The Second Tennessee, under Lieutenant-Colonel Butler, on the left and toward the pike; the Fifteenth and Thirteenth Arkansas (temporarily consolidated), under command of Colonel Polk and Lieut. Col. [A. R.] Brown, on the right; the Forty-eighth Tennessee, under Colonel Nixon, and the Fifth Tennessee, under Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, in the center. An artillery duel, continuing an hour and a quarter, now commenced, which resulted in a loss to our side of 7 wounded of the Forty-eighth Tennessee, 2 killed and 1 wounded of the Second Tennessee. The dead and wounded of the enemy by grape, canister, and shell, which their ground afterwards exhibited, showed that our artillery had been worked with great skill.

In pursuance of an order from General Cleburne I here detailed a company from the Second Tennessee, under command of Capt. J. J. Newsom, as sharpshooters, to occupy a position near the barn, situated upon a hill to the left of the pike, for the purpose of picking off the horses and gunners from the enemy's battery. A similar detail was also made from the Fifteenth Arkansas, under Capt. [O. S.] Palmer and [G.] Dixon, to occupy a position upon the right of our line in a skirt of woods and ascertain the extreme left of the enemy's line. This company was under the eye of General Cleburne, who was preparing for a flank movement upon the enemy with Colonel Vaughan's brigade, then under your personal command and which you had formed in line of battle upon the right of my brigade. Sharp work soon took place between the enemy and the companies of Captain Newsom on the left and Captains Palmer and Dixon on the right. The position of my brigade remained unchanged until the forward movement was commanded to the entire division. The enemy commenced a confused retreat; their scattered forces extended from the right of the road through the corn fields on the left for half a mile. In this charge the Forty-eighth Tennessee, under Col. [G. H.] Nixon, captured 165 prisoners, including several commissioned officers of high rank. Our success, I am sorry here to say, in the capture of a greater number of prisoners was interfered with in the detachment of two of my regiments by a staff officer of another division, who, it seems, was ordered to have a section of battery supported, and mistaking his own line of battle, thus unfortunately detached two regiments of my own people. The error was remedied as soon as possible, but unfortunately not early enough to carry out what my brigade would otherwise have accomplished.

The loss of the brigade in this engagement was small in the number ber of killed. Captain Douglas and Lieut. [Benjamin] Hardin, of the battery, were slightly wounded; Colonel Polk, Fifteenth Arkansas, badly wounded in the head, and Capt. J. J. Newsom, company of sharpshooters, Second Tennessee, seriously, if not mortally.

The brigade was ordered to rest for one hour about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in advance of the scene of the first action in a woodland to the right of the road near a building called Zion's Church, after which it was again formed in line of battle. This was near the hour of 1 o'clock—the sun beating down with oppressive heat and the canteens of my men scarce of water. The enemy had rallied and again thrown their batteries into position, when we advanced through the open fields under a hot fire of shell, which, however, proved fruitless upon our unbroken line. In this stand the enemy had thrown his heavy line of infantry in the skirt of woods on the left of the road, which were soon engaged by a brigade of General Churchill's troops and after a short engagement began to waver. The order then reached us to move across to that portion of the field in double-quick, which we did for over half a mile, but their hordes gave way before our gallant companions in arms ere we had time to give them a volley.

Another halt was given along the line about 3 o'clock at a point some 2 miles south of Richmond and the scattered men gathered to their proper commands. When rested for the space of an hour the line was again formed, and Captain Yancey, of the Second Tennessee Regiment, was placed in command of all the skirmishers of the brigade, which again resumed its position to the right of the road, marching steadily forward toward the town without an indication of a stand from the Federals until we came in half a mile of its spires. Our skirmishers were then thrown some 400 yards in advance to feel the enemy's strongest positions, and the repeated shots along our entire front soon told of their whereabouts and showed them to number a large force. The men under Captain Yancey maintained their advanced ground firmly and were driving back the enemy's sharpshooters when our line advanced at a quick-pace, opening a warm fire, and discovering the enemy densely massed along the fences, in the corn fields, and behind the hay-stacks bordering a turn of the pike into the environs of Richmond. Here the loss was slight to several regiments of the brigade, but the men moved on most gallantly, although grape and canister were plowing the earth all around them in every direction. When we reached the pike the order was given to charge across an uninclosed field lying between the road and the cemetery, the enemy being posted behind the fence and tombstones and in the corn fields and woods stretching off to the left. As we cleared a rise in the ground the deadliest fire was poured into us that occurred during the entire day, and although the bullets hailed our brave troops did not falter, but with volley after volley and shout after shout routed them from their stronghold and pursued them through the streets of Richmond, and when night closed in we were, as we started in the morning, still in the advance line.

In this last engagement our loss in killed and wounded was severe:

	Killed.	Wounded.
15th Arkansas.....	2	15
13th Arkansas.....	3	19
5th Tennessee.....	2	12
48th Tennessee.....	5	54
2d Tennessee.....	15	94
Total.....	27	194

The gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Butler, of the Second Tennessee, was here killed, and Colonel Nixon, of the Forty-eighth Tennessee, received a severe contusion from a canister-shot while bravely leading his regiment.

The killed and wounded of the enemy at this point outnumbered our loss very seriously. We captured squad after squad of prisoners continuously through and past the town.

The Second Brigade, when formed into line on the morning of the 30th, showed the following strength: Fifteenth and Thirteenth Arkansas, 390; Fifth Tennessee, 295; Forty-eighth Tennessee, 312; Second Tennessee, 300.

In concluding this report I must speak in the highest terms of the gallant conduct of the officers and men of my command. They stood unflinchingly before the galling fire of a superior force, and no troops battling for the defense of our noblest cause could have acquitted themselves more nobly. While I make no invidious distinction between the actions of officers and men under my command, I feel it obligatory to mention the gallantry of Lieutenant-Colonel Polignac, who, in the last fight before Richmond, seized the colors of the Fifth Tennessee, bearing them triumphantly through the thickest of the fight and encouraged the men to withstand a terrible fire.

My thanks are due Capt. James F. Lanford, assistant adjutant-general, for the assistance rendered me on the field by his unwavering coolness and courage.

Respectfully,

BENJ. J. HILL,

Col., Comdg. Second Brig., Fourth Div., Army of Kentucky.

Brig. Gen. PRESTON SMITH,

Commanding Fourth Division, Army of Kentucky.

P. S.—The conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel Murray, who commanded the sharpshooters on Friday night and assisted at the guns of the battery on Saturday, was highly creditable to him as a brave and gallant officer.

I herewith append a list of the killed and wounded of the brigade during the series of fights on Saturday.*

AUGUST 31, 1862.—Skirmish at Stevenson, Ala.

Report of Maj. Gen. Samuel Jones, C. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS CONFEDERATE STATES FORCES,
Chattanooga, Tenn., September 1, 1862.

COLONEL: When I ordered the Twenty-fifth Tennessee Regiment, which was stationed near Shell Mound, to come to this place to proceed to Sparta, agreeably to instructions conveyed to me in your letter of the 30th instant [ultimo], I was not aware that it formed a part of the force sent to attack the enemy at Stevenson. I received last night a telegram from Lieutenant-Colonel Maury, dated at Stevenson, informing me that after a few hours' fighting the enemy was driven from Stevenson and the place occupied by our troops, the Twenty-fifth Tennessee being a part of them. I have directed Brigadier-General Maxey to keep that regiment only so long as it may be necessary to enable him to secure all property that may have been captured, and then to comply with the order sending it to Sparta.

* See p. 936.

It is estimated that the enemy's force at Stevenson was 1,000 infantry (probably one regiment), a squadron of cavalry, and five pieces of artillery; our force was about 900; and the enemy was strongly entrenched. No detailed report of the affair has yet been received.

I regret the delay in sending forward the Twenty-fifth Tennessee as directed by the general. It will only be a delay of a day, or perhaps two, however, as I expect the regiment up to-night or to-morrow.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAM. JONES,
Major-General.

Report of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, U. S. Army.

CUMBERLAND GAP, TENN., August 31,
Via Louisville, Ky., September 14, 1862.

At noon on the 29th I sent 60 picked infantry, under Captain Myers and Lieutenant Rogers, First Tennessee, by a circuitous route through the mountains to Rogers' Gap, with instructions to harass the enemy, and, if possible, intercept dispatches. This morning at daylight Captain Meyers surprised Captain Rhodes' company of rebel cavalry on the southern side of Rogers' Gap. He killed 6, wounded 6 or 8, and captured 19, among whom is Captain Rhodes, a renegade Ohioan; also 30 horses and equipments, including carbines, &c. Captain Myers and party reached Cumberland Gap at 6 o'clock p. m. to-day. This brave little band performed a march of 60 miles, over a route almost impracticable, in fifty hours, and surprised and captured one of the enemy's outposts, and returned to this place without the loss of a single man. A portion of the enemy were absent on a scout; of those present one lieutenant escaped, and he only clothed in his shirt. This morning I sent Lieut. Col. [Joel W.] Ridgell, with 275 men, to join Garrard, Third Kentucky, en route to General Wallace. The forces of the enemy under General Smith, about 25,000 strong, have gone forward from Cumberland Ford and Barbourville toward Lexington. The condition of his army is desperate; his whole force is doomed. Sixty of his men will be in to-morrow morning to surrender. Those who have arrived represent that a considerable portion of the conscripts are for the Union. Were it not for the immense importance of this stronghold I would advance with two brigades by rapid marches to gain Smith's rear; but were we to lose the Gap it would cost a sea of blood to retake it. Colonel Garrard has fought and whipped the enemy near McKee to-day. I established a battery on Poor Valley Ridge, 1 mile south of the Gap, and shelled the enemy's camp, indicated by their fires, at several points. We could see the rebels scatter. The Knoxville Register of the 27th instant declares that we have but three days' rations. The telegram of the general-in-chief has been received. He need not feel anxious in regard to this post. Officers and soldiers are in fine spirits and prepared for any sacrifice which duty may require.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1862.—Skirmish near Nashville, Tenn.

Report of Col. William B. Stokes, First Middle Tennessee Cavalry.

HDQRS. FIRST MIDDLE TENNESSEE CAVALRY,
Camp Campbell, September 2, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that after leaving Colonel Miller, on the Dickinson pike, in obedience to verbal orders I proceeded with two companies of my regiment, accompanied by a regiment of infantry, to Center Meeting-House, where I left the pike, taking a pathway to the left. This I followed to Mr. Driver's, where I met with Colonel Miller. I was then instructed to move on a pathway to the rear of Mr. Driver's, which was supposed would lead to the camp of the enemy. After following this road for 2 miles I met with a farmer, who said he knew and would lead me to where the enemy was, which he did, after traveling 2 miles farther.

I immediately attacked him with my advance guard, capturing 8 prisoners, among them Capt. Robert Bennett, and wounding his brother, Col. James Bennett, putting the remainder to flight. Here I left the infantry and pursued the enemy 4 miles farther, taking 18 more prisoners, killing 4, wounding 6. I captured 26 horses and a great many shot-guns and rifles, which I ordered to be destroyed, as I could not carry them. The way was strewn with clothing, arms, &c., showing it was a complete rout. I then gave over the pursuit and returned to where I left the infantry, and not finding them I moved to the White's Creek pike. Here I learned that Colonel Stoughton, with the train, was 2 miles above. We here rested an hour, when I decided to return to the city, arriving at 3 p. m.

Of the officers and men of my command I cannot speak in terms strong enough to show my satisfaction for the good conduct and the alacrity with which they obeyed orders.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. STOKES,

Colonel, Commanding First Tennessee Cavalry.

ASSISTANT-ADJUTANT GENERAL, Seventh Brigade.

SEPTEMBER 5-10, 1862.—Expedition from Fort Donelson to Clarksville, Tenn., and skirmishes (6th) at New Providence and (7th) at Riggin's Hill.

Report of Col. William W. Lowe, Fifth Iowa Cavalry.

HEADQUARTERS, Fort Donelson, September 10, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have just returned from an expedition to Clarksville, and have to report as follows:

On the morning of the 5th instant I started from this post with parts of the Eleventh Illinois, Thirteenth Wisconsin, Seventy-first Ohio Infantry, part of the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, one section of Flood's battery, and one section of Stenbeck's battery, numbering in all about 1,030 men. During the day and night I marched to a point called Blue Springs, about 16 miles from Clarksville. About midnight I received a dispatch from the general telling me I need not attempt to take Clarksville at present. I immediately replied that I was now already on the way, and within 16 miles of Clarksville. "Shall I return?" stating also, "Awaiting your reply, I shall menace them."

Acting in accordance with this assertion, and because the point where I had stopped was not well supplied with water, I moved on slowly during the morning of the 6th to a good position, within 10 miles of the town, receiving from time to time during the day positive information that the enemy, about 1,100 strong, were in good position 3 miles from the town, and had determined to give us battle.

During the afternoon a small reconnoitering party, under Lieutenant Moreing, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, came in sight of their pickets, and immediately gave chase, running them more than a mile, when they were fired upon by some 50 or more rebels in ambush. Though within 15 yards of the road, with their guns at a rest, not a man was injured by the volley, and but 1 horse was killed and 3 wounded. I immediately ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Patrick, of the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, to move forward with four companies of cavalry, three companies of infantry, and one piece of artillery, with a view to driving in their pickets and creating the belief that we were advancing upon them. Early in the morning of the 7th (having received the necessary permission) I moved on in the direction of the town, driving their pickets before us for more than two hours. About 10.30 a. m. we came in view of the enemy's position and immediately opened upon them a fire of shell and canister, and in thirty-five minutes they were completely routed, both sections of artillery being well served and doing fine execution. Finding that the enemy were rapidly retreating, I immediately formed line (the right commanded by Colonel Ransom and Major Hart, the left by Lieutenant-Colonel Chapman, followed immediately by the sections of artillery and the detachment of cavalry), and pushed on rapidly in pursuit. They fled so rapidly, however, that they could not be overhauled by infantry, and I immediately pushed forward some companies, under Lieutenant-Colonel Patrick, to prevent them from tearing up the Red River Bridge, the only practicable approach to the town. He caught them in the very act, charged them, drove them from the bridge, and held his position until I succeeded in planting two pieces of artillery on a bluff commanding the town. The enemy fled precipitately through the place and scattered in all directions.

Their loss, according to the report of their commander, Colonel Woodward, was 17 killed and from 40 to 50 wounded. Some of their dead were buried on the field and others taken to Providence and Clarksville.

We captured about 40 horses and a considerable quantity of arms and accouterments. I occupied the town during the night and the greater part of the next day, requiring the citizens to furnish rations for my command. While there I burned about 1,000 bales of hay, destroyed some 250 boxes of commissary stores, captured 3 Government wagons and several prisoners. By pressing teams into the service I was enabled to bring away nearly 200 boxes of commissary stores. I also brought with me several Union families, who were afraid to remain in the place.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. W. LOWE,

Colonel Fifth Iowa Cavalry, Commanding.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1862.—Surrender of outpost at Shepherdsville, Ky.

Report of Capt. Stephen R. Tinker, Fifty-fourth Indiana Infantry.

LOUISVILLE, September 8, 1862.

DEAR SIR: I would respectfully make the following report, viz:

On yesterday, 7th instant, my command, stationed at Shepherdsville, Ky., to guard the bridge at Salt River, had to surrender to a superior force, under the command of Colonel Hutcheson, of the so-called Confederate Army. Said forces consisted of cavalry and at least three pieces of artillery. The first that we saw of them one of the captains came through our guards with a flag of truce, demanding an immediate and unconditional surrender, saying at the same time that we would all be paroled, which conditions I at once rejected. He (the captain) then told us that they had plenty of artillery, and unless we surrendered that he should commence firing, and that soon. I did not believe they had any cannon, but kept up a parley until my first lieutenant sent his son—a youth, who was visiting his father in camp, and dressed in citizen's clothes—to spy out whether or not they had any cannon. On his return he reported three field pieces and a number of my men made the same assertion, and that there must have been not less than 500 of the enemy. At this moment, the flag of truce being delayed so long, which was near three-quarters of an hour, the rebels opened fire by throwing a shell, which exploded near our stockade and wounded 1 of my men. They fired a number of rounds, when I thought, after consultation, it best to surrender on the following terms: That the commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers should retain all their private property and side-arms, the privates all their clothing, blankets, &c. All the balance they either destroyed or carried away, and accomplished their design in partially destroying the bridge over Salt River.

I am satisfied had the enemy no artillery we could have held the position until we could have been re-enforced, although they outnumbered us more than three to one, we having the advantage of our stockade.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

S. R. TINKER,

Captain Company C, Fifty-fourth Regiment Indiana Vols.

Captain McDOWELL.

*Report of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Maysville, Ky., September 18, 1862.

MAJOR: The inclosed dispatches were received this evening from General Morgan, inclosed in a horse-collar. I forward them forthwith.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. WILSON,

Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding.

Major MCLEAN, Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Inclosure No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Cumberland Gap, September 11, 1862.

GENERAL: I have already had the honor of reporting to you the success of expeditions against Baptist and Rogers' Gaps since our investment by the enemy, and I now report that on yesterday Rogers' Gap was blockaded by Lieut. Col. [M. L.] Phillips at the head of 200 picked men from the First and Second Tennessee Volunteers, and that Big Creek Gap was blockaded by Colonel Cooper at the head of 400 picked men taken from Spears' brigade. Colonel Cooper likewise attacked a body of McAfee's Kentucky cavalry on their march through Big Creek Gap to join General Smith, and Colonel McAfee and 95 officers and soldiers were made prisoners, while 10 or 12 of the enemy were left dead upon the field; among them was one of the aides-de-camp of Major-General Smith and 2 captains. Colonel Cooper also brings in 98 horses and equipments.

I ordered the expeditions so that both Gaps should be blockaded at the same time and that each party should cover the other's flank.

It is a remarkable fact that in these affairs we did not lose a single man, while the enemy had upward of 30 killed, a considerable number wounded, and lost 230 prisoners. These were complete surprises.

Inclosed I send you the general order of Major-General Bragg to his army. You will observe that he crossed the Tennessee River on the 24th ultimo.

* See also Morgan's report of evacuation of Cumberland Gap, etc., September 17–October 3, 1862; and McCown to Cooper, Part II, p. 814.

My aide de-camp, Lieutenant Medary, will give you much information which I do not desire to commit to paper, and I will be happy to receive your instructions through him. Whatever may be your orders, if within the power of men they shall be executed.

Since we have been surrounded I have had at the same time 4,000 men detached on various expeditions, all of which have been successful.

Stevenson is still in my immediate front and I daily send him paroled prisoners, and our pickets have frequent skirmishes.

A few days since I sent Lieut. R. Montgomery, of my staff, with an escort of 5 cavalry to Barboursville to take possession of that place. He captured and paroled 100 prisoners, among whom was a captain; they were generally convalescents. He also captured a supply of hospital stores.

I am, general, with high respect, your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. MORGAN,

Brigadier-General Volunteers, Commanding.

Major-General WRIGHT, U. S. A., Cincinnati, Ohio.

P. S.—I will thank you, general, to send me a list of the officers and soldiers of the Third Kentucky (Garrard's), Third East Tennessee (Houk's), and First Battalion Kentucky Cavalry (Munday's), captured and paroled by the enemy. I have no other means of ascertaining their names, and have now an opportunity of effecting the exchange of many of them.

GENERAL ORDERS, }
 No. 124. }

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT No. 2,
Chattanooga, Tenn., August 25, 1862.

The troops of this command will be in readiness to move at an hour's notice. Ample time for the preparation having been allowed and everything necessary having been promptly supplied, the general trusts the movement will be made with that alacrity and regularity which can alone inspire confidence.

The enemy is before us, devastating our fair country, imprisoning our old and venerated men, even the ministers of God, insulting our women, and desecrating our altars. It is our proud lot to be assigned the duty of punishing and driving these deluded men, led by desperate adventurers and goaded on by Abolition demagogues and demons. Let us but deserve success and an offended Deity will certainly secure it. Should we be opposed, we must fight at any odds and conquer at any sacrifice. Should the foe retire, we must follow him rapidly to his own territory and make him taste the bitters of invasion.

Soldiers! The enemy are before you and your banners are free. It is for you to decide whether our brothers and sisters of Tennessee and Kentucky shall remain bondmen and bondwomen of the Abolition tyrant or be restored to the freedom inherited from our fathers.

By command of General Bragg:

GEO. G. GARNER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

P. S.—General Bragg crossed the Tennessee with his army on the 24th of August.

[Addenda.]

Humphrey Marshall marching from Pound Gap by way of Mount Sterling to join Kirby Smith. His force estimated at from 8,000 to 15,000. About 300 rebel troops at Mount Sterling and 100 at Winchester. Kirby Smith's forces, which were at Lexington and Frankfort, have moved on toward Cynthiana and Covington. Rumored that a portion of his forces are moving toward Louisville. Colonel De Courey, of General Morgan's command, is at Manchester with his brigade, and is collecting supplies for the army at Cumberland Gap. General Morgan's entire force numbers about 7,000 effective men. He has thirty pieces of cannon, with a moderate supply of ammunition for them; has plenty of ammunition for small-arms. Provisions will hold out eighty days yet.

General Bragg crossed the Tennessee River on the 25th of August. General Stevenson has from 10,000 to 15,000 men immediately in front of Cumberland Gap. Kirby Smith's forces altogether in Kentucky number from 30,000 to 40,000. Recruits for the rebel army are being raised very rapidly in Kentucky.

No. 1.

Report of Col. John T. Wilder, Seventeenth Indiana Infantry.

CAVE CITY, KY., September 18, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on September 8, 1862, according to a special order from General Boyle, I assumed command of the forces at Munfordville, Ky. I immediately set to work building fortifications for defense of the railroad bridge over Green River.

On Sunday, September 9, I was informed that the railroad bridge at Salt River was burned by the rebels. Our supplies being sufficient for one day only I immediately began collecting flour and bacon in the country about us and got some bread from Bowling Green, and managed to get rations for fifteen days. At the same time I ordered all the Home Guard companies and recruits for the Thirty-third Kentucky, who had no arms, to scatter out over the country and act in the capacity of scouts. They served me admirably in this respect, giving notice of Bragg's approach when over 50 miles distant, and notifying me of his numbers, pieces of artillery, direction taken, &c., in every movement made by him on his advance from Cumberland River.

On Saturday, September 13, Colonel Scott, with a brigade of cavalry and a battery of five mountain howitzers, came down the north side of the river from Greensburg, and at 8 p. m. demanded an unconditional surrender of the place. I peremptorily refused, and at 3 o'clock the next morning he commenced an attack by firing on our pickets. They contested the ground so stubbornly that he was compelled to bring up his artillery to drive them in, which he accomplished at daybreak, after losing his guide and a lieutenant-colonel killed.

At daylight a furious attack was made on the pickets on the south side of the river by a large force of infantry. I immediately sent Company K, Seventy-fourth Indiana, out to a belt of woods about a quarter of a mile in advance, to act as a reserve, for the pickets to rally on. They held their ground until nearly surrounded, and only fell back when peremptorily ordered to do so by Major Cubberly, of the Eighty-ninth Indiana, who had charge of the pickets and skirmishers on the south side of the river. Our advanced line fought them stubbornly for an hour, and only came in when ordered to do so by me, as I did not wish to lose the advantage of our works. At 5.30 the fighting became general along the whole line, the enemy having advanced to within 200 yards of our works in large numbers.

At 6.30 a. m. the enemy advanced in line of battle upon our west, or main work, and seeing their intention to storm our position I ordered the men to fix bayonets, when the rebels came forward with a cheer, supposing our cessation of fire was a sign of retreat. When they came within about 30 yards I directed the men to fire, which was repeated by Col. [Charles D.] Murray and the officers along the line, and a very avalanche of death swept through the ranks, causing them to first stagger and then run in disorder to the wood in the rear, having left all of their field officers on the ground either killed or badly wounded. The regiments that made this charge were the Seventh and Tenth Mississippi and Seventh Alabama. Immediately after this repulse a similar one was made on the redoubt by the Ninth and Twenty-ninth Mississippi and a battalion of sharpshooters. They were literally murdered by a terrible fire from the gallant defenders of the work.

Maj. [Augustus H.] Abbott sprang upon the parapet, with his hat in one hand and a drawn saber in the other, urging his men to stand to the work, until he was shot dead under the flag he so nobly defended. A braver man never fell. The flag had 146 bullet-holes through it and the staff was struck eleven times.

Lieutenant Mason, of the Thirteenth Indiana Battery, commanding the artillery, in the mean time was riddling them with grape and canister, when they broke in all directions, fleeing as from a belching volcano, many dropping as they fled. At this juncture I sent Colonel Emerson, of the Sixty-seventh Indiana, with one more company, to reinforce the redoubt and to take command. The enemy soon rallied, however, and seemed to be more cautious in their movements, keeping up a constant fire from the best cover they could obtain until 9.30 a. m., making several weak efforts to charge us again, but they had learned a dear lesson and profited by it.

At 9.30 they sent in a flag of truce, demanding again that I should surrender. I again refused, when they asked the privilege of removing their dead and wounded. I gave them leave to do so. The following is the correspondence that passed between the two parties:

Col. J. T. WILDER, Commanding U. S. Forces at Green River:

You have made a gallant defense of your position, and to avoid further bloodshed I demand an unconditional surrender of your forces. I have six regiments of infantry, one battalion of infantry sharpshooters, and have just been re-enforced by a brigade of cavalry, under Colonel Scott, with two battalions of artillery. I have two regiments on the north side of the river, and you can't escape. The railroad track is torn up in your rear and you can't receive re-enforcements. General Bragg's army is but a short distance in the rear.*

JAMES R. CHALMERS,
Brig. Gen., Comdg. First Brig., Right Wing Army of the Mississippi.

To this demand and these arguments Colonel Wilder returned the following answer:

Brig. Gen. JAMES R. CHALMERS,

Commanding First Brigade, Right Wing, Army of the Mississippi:

Your note demanding the unconditional surrender of my forces has been received. Thank you for your compliments. If you wish to avoid further bloodshed keep out of the range of my guns. As to re-enforcements, they are now entering my works. I think I can defend my position against your entire force; at least I shall try to do so.*

J. T. WILDER,
Colonel Seventeenth Indiana Volunteers, Comdg. U. S. Forces at Green River.

At 9 a. m. I was re-enforced by six companies of the Fiftieth Indiana, under Colonel Dunham, who had come up on the railroad from Louisville and were thrown off the track 6 miles back. At daylight they pushed through by a circuitous route, missing Scott's cavalry on the north side of the river, and getting into the works without any loss except 1 man slightly wounded.

After the night closed, Colonel Dunham, being the ranking officer, assumed command, and will no doubt make a report of the events occurring on Monday and Tuesday following Sunday's fight. My whole force consisted of the Sixty-seventh and Eighty-ninth Indiana Regiments, one company of the Eighteenth Regulars, 204 recruits of the Seventeenth Indiana, two companies Seventy-fourth Indiana, one company of cavalry, Louisville Provost Guard, Lieutenant Watson commanding; one 12-pounder heavy gun, one 12-pounder Napoleon, one 12-pounder howitzer, and one 3-inch rifled gun, under Lieutenant Mason, Thirteenth Indiana Battery; 60 men Thirty-third Kentucky, Captain Wilson. The whole force amounting to 2,122 men for duty.

If I were to give a list of those who did their whole duty it would simply be a muster roll of all who were there. No man flinched or held back a particle. I must, however, mention W. A. Bullitt, adjutant Third Kentucky, who conveyed orders for me through the hottest of the fire with as much coolness as if on review, and Capt. Frank White, Fifteenth Indiana, who superintended the earthworks, and whenever a point was exposed to a raking fire from the enemy's batteries immediately threw up traverses to protect the men.

Our entire loss was 37 killed and wounded.† The enemy admit a loss of 714 killed and wounded on Sunday alone. I cannot give as complete a report as I could wish, not having yet received a report from the different commands engaged.

On Tuesday evening at 7 p. m. I was again placed in command. By this time General Polk had crossed the river 10 miles above with the right wing of Bragg's army, and coming down on the north side took up a position on the river hills commanding our works, the left wing, under Hardee, having taken position on the hills on the south side. Bragg had sent a summons to surrender, and a consultation had been held late Tuesday evening with commanders of regiments, in which it was the unanimous expression that unless enabled by re-enforcements to hold the north side of the river we could make no successful resistance. All, however, decided to resist unless full evidence should be given of the overwhelming force of the enemy, and having been informed that General Buell's army had not left Bowling Green at 2 p. m. the day before, and having been notified by you that we could get no help from Louisville, our ammunition for small-arms being very limited, and our men worn out by constant work and fighting for four days and nights, and being satisfied that further resistance was no less than willful murder of the brave men who had so long contested with overwhelming numbers, I determined, after counting forty-five cannon in positions commanding our open field works, and surrounded by over 25,000 men, with no possible chance of assistance from any quarter, although promised such by you from Bowling Green, to surrender the entire force, which I did on Wednesday morning at 2 a. m., marching out of the works at 6 a. m. with all the honors of war, drums beating and colors flying, we being allowed by the terms of surrender our side-arms and all private property and four days' rations. Officers and men were immediately paroled and are about to start for the Ohio River.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. T. WILDER,

Col., Seventeenth Ind. Vols., Comdg. U. S. Forces at Green River.

Brig. Gen. JAMES R. CHALMERS,

Commanding Confederate States Forces:

GENERAL: Your note is to hand. If you will agree, in case hostilities are resumed, not to fire from or on any building in either Munfordville or Woodsonville, as it is probable a number of them may be needed for our wounded as well as yours [sic]. Our sick are at a house near the river bank in Woodsonville. Thank you for your kind wishes and allow me to reciprocate.

Col. J. T. WILDER, Commanding:

COLONEL: Your proposition to permit any wounded that I may have at the depot near here to remain undisturbed has been received through Major Morgan. Permit me to thank you cordially for the proposal, and I will avail myself of it, as the roads are very rough. Hoping that when we cross swords again I may be able to render you a similar service, I remain, very respectfully,

JAMES R. CHALMERS,
Brigadier-General.

FORT CRAIG, KY., September 14, 1862.

Brig. Gen. JAMES R. CHALMERS,
Commanding Confederate States Forces :

GENERAL: Your acceptance of my propositions is received. One of my sergeants went outside of my works to relieve a wounded comrade after your flag of truce came in; some of your men engaged in removing your wounded took him prisoner. I expect you to return him.

Respectfully, yours,

J. T. WILDER,
Colonel, Commanding.

No. 2.

Report of Col. Cyrus L. Dunham, Fiftieth Indiana Infantry.

LOUISVILLE, KY., September 30, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to an order from Major-General Gilbert, I, on the 13th instant, at 11 p. m., left the depot of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad with six companies of the Fiftieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers and one company (K) of the Seventy-eighth Indiana (attached to the Fiftieth, for duty), in all 446 strong, rank and file, for Green River, near Munfordville, to re-enforce Colonel Wilder in the defense of that point. The train ran very slowly until some distance below Elizabethtown, when I went forward and earnestly urged the engineer to greater speed, assuring him that it was all-important for us to reach Green River before daylight. He did increase the speed as far as safety would permit. Just below Bacon Creek, about 7 miles from Green River, the train stopped for wood. I immediately passed along the cars, aroused the men, and bade them stand by their arms in readiness for any emergency, as we were approaching dangerous ground. I took position on the engine, and the train moved cautiously forward. We had proceeded about a mile when we ran upon a portion of the track which had been undermined by the enemy, and slid to one side in such a manner as not to make the injury apparent to the engineer or myself. The train was thrown off, and several of the cars completely wrecked; yet, strange to say, not a man or a horse was seriously injured. The men seemed inspired with even greater confidence, as if feeling themselves under the especial protection of an overruling Providence. They were immediately formed in line of battle, an instantaneous attack being expected. The woods, which skirted the sides of the road were promptly reconnoitered. No enemy appearing, the regiment was put in rapid march for Munfordville, presuming that the road had been destroyed to prevent re-enforcements from reaching that place. We had not proceeded far before cannonading was heard in that direction. It had now become daylight, and the men deposited their knapsacks and blankets in a thicket by the road-side and moved on rapidly. We soon met crowds of frightened and fleeing citizens, from whom no satisfactory information could be got of the situation of affairs at or of the forces investing our works. When within 3 or 4 miles of the place we were met by an intelligent citizen of my acquaintance, who informed me that a cavalry force of the enemy, at least 2,000 strong, and a battery of artillery were posted some distance this side of the river and covering the road approaching our works, which were upon the south bank; that guns were also so planted upon both banks of the river as to cover the bridges, and that he deemed it impossible for us to pass them and get in. But, nothing daunted, our little force made a detour to the right, and, by keeping under the cover of the woods and corn fields and down ravines, eluded the enemy, and reached the river just below the bridges and opposite our works. Here a momentary halt was made, under the cover of the woods, to close up the column and give the men a little rest. They then plunged into and forded the river at the double-quick between the two bridges, the first notice the enemy having of our approach being the hearty cheers of our beleaguered troops in the works. Fortunately for us the guns of the enemy upon the northern bank bearing upon the crossing had just before, by a well-directed fire from our own, under Lieutenant Mason, been silenced, and from those upon the southern side he had only time to throw a shell or two at our rear as it disappeared under cover of the bank, resulting only in slightly wounding one man. His cavalry came dashing down upon us in an attempt to cut us off, but only in time to be as hastily driven back by our little band, who promptly turned and fired upon them.

We found the engagement still progressing. By General Gilbert's written order the command was to go according to seniority, and I being the senior officer, Colonel Wilder promptly tendered me the command, but I as promptly refused to assume it, feeling that to do so during the progress of the engagement would be ungenerous in me and unjust to him, but I placed myself and my forces under his command. He has reported the proceedings of that day.

On Monday, the 15th, I assumed command. The enemy had under cover of the night withdrawn from before us, the infantry and artillery to Cave City and the cavalry up the river. Work upon the intrenchments was at once resumed and pushed forward with vigor that day, the night following, and in fact throughout all the affair of Tuesday. Wagons were sent to the wrecked train for the provisions upon it, and steps successfully taken, by the aid of Mr. William Gibson, a patriotic Union citizen of Munfordville, of whom I cannot speak in too high praise, to bring in the ammunition which had been upon it, but which the loyal men of the neighborhood had carried to the wood and concealed. Efforts were also made to repair the telegraph line. Messengers were sent to different points northward to communicate to the headquarters in this city our situation, inform them that we expected a renewal of the attack by a largely increased force, and ask reinforcements. Messengers, with a like object, I was informed, had been sent by Colonel Wilder to Bowling Green. I regarded the place as of great importance to the Government and made every effort to save it. Monday night re-enforcements, under command of Colonel Owen, Sixtieth Indiana, were received from Lebanon Junction, consisting of a part of the Sixtieth Indiana, 420 men, including one company (I) of the Twenty-eighth Kentucky, Lieutenant Conaway, which had been attached to it for duty; a part of the Sixty-eighth Indiana, Colonel King, 570 men, and six pieces of the First Ohio Artillery, 150 men, Captain Konkle in command.

On Tuesday, the 16th instant, at about 9.30 a. m., the advance of the enemy attacked our pickets on the south side of our works and from the direction of Cave City. His advance was sternly resisted by Companies A, B, and H, Fiftieth Indiana, and part of Company K, Seventy-eighth Indiana, under Maj. [Samuel T.] Wells, who, as well as the officers and men under him, in this little skirmish displayed great coolness and courage. They held the enemy's advancing columns at bay for over an hour and were only pressed back by overwhelming numbers. The object evidently was to avoid the field work on our left, known as Fort Craig, from which he had been so fatally repulsed on Sunday, and, under cover of the woods to approach and carry by storm the breast-works on our right; but the promptness and energy with which he was met seemed to deter him from the attempt. Before 11 a. m. the engagement had become general along our south line, the heavy pressure being upon the west or right. The men were cool and eager for the expected assault. The fire was rapid and continuous on the part of the enemy, who kept himself closely under cover of the woods. Between 2 and 3 o'clock it slackened, and by 3 o'clock it had almost ceased, and, supposing the enemy had withdrawn from the wood which fronted our entire south line, and being anxious to occupy the farther edge of it, that I might be advised of and check a renewed attack, Company A, Fiftieth Indiana, Captain Burrell, was thrown out as skirmishers, to feel through it. They soon became hotly engaged with the enemy, who attempted to turn their left flank. I immediately ordered Captain Carothers' company (G, same regiment) to his support. The order was promptly obeyed, and the company gallantly deployed, under a galling fire. This was a brilliant little affair. In it Lieutenant Burton, of Company G, fell, severely wounded, nobly doing his duty. Finding that the enemy still occupied the woods in force, our men were withdrawn, under a fire from the works. I should also mention that Company A, Sixtieth Indiana, was thrown out as skirmishers upon the left early in the engagement, and there remained for some time, doing excellent service, with the loss of 1 man wounded. By 4.30 p. m. the firing on both sides had nearly ceased, there being only an occasional shot from our guns, as opportunity offered, to prevent the planting of batteries by the enemy.

Between 5 and 6 o'clock a flag of truce from the enemy was seen approaching. I sent Colonel Wilder to receive it. It covered a note from General Bragg, commanding the enemy's forces, asserting that we were surrounded by an overwhelming force, all hopes of re-enforcements cut off, and demanding a surrender to save the loss of human life, which must result from carrying the works by storm.* I promptly and peremptorily declined; but when Colonel Wilder returned, after the delivery of my reply, and informed me that so far as he had been able to observe the force against us was truly overwhelming, and especially in artillery, and our situation critical, and being only a senior officer of equal rank with several others in the works, some of whom had had greater experience, I, at his suggestion, deemed it my duty to call a council of war of those officers. I desired also to gain time, in hopes of relief from this place or from Bowling Green. I therefore sent a note to General Bragg, asking a further suspension of hostilities, to give me time for such consultation. He consented to such suspension until 9 p. m. This was a point gained, as by that time it would be too late for further attack, except by assault, which I felt able to repel. By this time I had got telegraphic communication with Louisville, and immediately telegraphed General Gilbert, in substance that we had held the enemy (said to be Bragg's and Polk's whole army) at bay all day; that evidently fresh columns were being moved against us, and whether we should be able to continue to hold our position without assistance remained to be seen; that we should do the best we could. I received an answer, ordering me to turn the command over to Colonel Wilder. I replied that, under the circumstances, I regarded the order as unjust, but should obey it. In the mean time the council had been convened, consisting of Colonels Owen, Wilder, King, Emerson, and Murray, and Captain Konkle and myself. The unanimous conclusion was, if that they had the force claimed, viz, over 25,000 men and sixty pieces of artillery, besides cavalry, it would be a useless sacrifice of human life to resist, and especially as by their artillery they could in spite of us occupy the heights north of the river, which completely covered our works. But it was also unanimously resolved that we should be permitted by some competent officer or officers to have actual observation of their strength or that we should demonstrate it by actual trial of arms.

At the conclusion of the council I formally relinquished the command to Colonel Wilder, who has reported the further proceedings. I at once telegraphed General Gilbert, in substance, that I had so relinquished the command, and that I should take my musket and go into the trenches; that, as a senior officer, under the circumstances, I would not, as an officer, fight under a junior. I was immediately ordered by him to report to Colonel Wilder under arrest, which I did. It is but just to observe that I did not object to serving under Colonel Wilder. Between him and myself had existed and yet exists the most friendly and cordial relations. We had in all things agreed, and no praise from me would add to his reputation as an officer. The proper authorities must judge from subsequent events whether my telegram to General Gilbert was such evidence of weakness as justified my removal from command, or whether it was simply evidence that I saw our peril and was not afraid to look it in the face. To that authority I shall also appeal for the justness of my arrest.

Of the coolness and determined courage of the men I cannot speak too highly. Of officers, where all did their duty well, especial praise seems almost out of place; yet some of course had better opportunities than others to display tact, coolness, and courage. Justice requires me to acknowledge my obligations to Lieut. Col. Edward A. King, of the Nineteenth Regulars, but now colonel of the Sixty-eighth Indiana Volunteers. He had position about midway of the south line of the works west of the railroad. Six companies of his regiment were held in a hollow near by as a support, the assault being anticipated in that direction. His experience, coolness, and close observation, even when shells and musket-balls flew thick and fast, were invaluable and cannot be too highly praised. Colonel Owen was in command of the field works on the left (Fort Craig), with discretionary authority. I need scarcely say that it was trustworthily confided. I should also mention the excellent conduct of Adjt. John R. Simpson, of the Fiftieth Indiana, and Lieutenant Pumpelly, of the Sixteenth Kentucky, who acted as my aides. On Sunday they boldly reconnoitered the woods along our march to guard us against surprise. On Tuesday they did their duty with a quiet fearlessness that deserves favorable notice.

Our loss, 1 officer (Lieutenant Burton) and 6 privates wounded (one private mortally and Lieutenant Burton dangerously, a musket-ball passing through both legs and shattering a bone of one). The enemy's loss was over 100, said to be 105.

The forces under my command during this affair were those mentioned by Colonel Wilder in his report and the re-enforcements thereto hereinbefore noticed.

I am, respectfully,

C. L. DUNHAM,
Colonel, Commanding U. S. Forces at Green River.

ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL AND CHIEF OF STAFF,
Army of Kentucky.

N. B.—It is probably but just to Major-General Gilbert and myself to add that since my arrival in this city he has informed me that within a few moments after issuing the order directing me to report to Colonel Wilder under arrest he sent me a dispatch, not only releasing me from arrest, but restoring me to the command; but, telegraphic communication being in the mean time cut off, it did not reach me.

Respectfully,

C. L. DUNHAM,
Colonel, Commanding, &c.

*Reports of General Braxton Bragg, C. S. Army, commanding Department No. 2.*MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 17, 1862.

(Received September 26.)

The garrison at this place surrendered last night without our firing a gun. We get 4,000 prisoners, 4,000 small-arms, pieces of artillery, and munitions of war in large quantities. My junction with Kirby Smith is complete. Buell still at Bowling Green.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT No. 2,
Munfordville, Ky., September 17, 1862.

SIR: Since my last dispatch this army has moved on steadily in the accomplishment of its secondary object, a junction with Maj. Gen. E. K. Smith. Waiting two days in Glasgow to collect a supply of bread-stuffs, an advance brigade thrown in this direction to cut the railroad and observe the enemy was indiscreetly advanced by its commander to the attack of a superior force here strongly fortified. After a most desperate fight they were repulsed with a loss of about 300 in killed and wounded. As soon as I heard of this misfortune my whole command was put in motion, and in less than twenty-four hours we had the place (some 25 and 35 miles distant by the routes taken) completely surrounded, and in a few hours an unconditional surrender of the whole garrison was made without our firing a gun. We received some 4,000 prisoners, an equal number of small-arms, 10 pieces of artillery, and munitions. The prisoners will be paroled and sent to General Buell at Bowling Green, the nearest point of the enemy's lines. My position must be exceedingly embarrassing to Buell and his army. They dare not attack me, and yet no other escape seems to be open to them.

My admiration of and love for my army cannot be expressed. To its patient toil and admirable discipline am I indebted for all the success which has attended this perilous undertaking. The men are much jaded and somewhat destitute, but cheerful and confident without a murmur.

We move soon on a combined expedition with General Smith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BRAXTON BRAGG,
General Commanding.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL C. S. ARMY.

EXHIBITS RELATING TO SURRENDER OF MUNFORDVILLE, KY.

HEADQUARTERS CONFEDERATE STATES TROOPS,
Near Munfordville, Ky., September 16, 1862.

To the OFFICER COMMANDING U. S. FORCES
Near Munfordville, Ky.:

SIR: Surrounded by an overwhelming force, your successful resistance or escape is impossible. You are therefore offered an opportunity by capitulation of avoiding the terrible consequences of an assault. The bearer, Lieut. Col. [H. W.] Walter, of my staff, will receive your reply.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BRAXTON BRAGG,
General, Commanding.

Camp Dunham, near Munfordville, Ky., September 16, 1862.

General BRAXTON BRAGG,

Commanding Confederate States Forces :

SIR : Your note of this date is received. As much as I shall regret the terrible consequences of an assault upon the works under my command I shall defend them to the utmost, and God help the right.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. L. DUNHAM,
Colonel, Commanding U. S. Forces near Munfordville, Ky.

P. S.—I regret to say since your note has been received two Confederate officers have been observed near our works with glasses making observations thereof. I regard this as a violation of the true spirit of a flag of truce.

Respectfully,

C. L. D.

No. 5.

Reports of Brig. Gen. James R. Chalmers, C. S. Army, commanding Second Brigade, right wing Army of the Mississippi, including operations September 12-17.

HDQRS. SECOND BRIGADE, RESERVE DIVISION,
 RIGHT WING ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Cave City, Ky., September 15, 1862.

MAJOR: At 5 p. m. on yesterday, having buried my dead and sent all of my wounded who could bear transportation to this place, I notified the enemy that the truce was ended. They replied that they had not finished burying their dead and asked that it might be continued for an hour longer, to which I consented. In accordance with my previous determination I then withdrew my forces and returned without molestation to this place, where we arrived at a late hour in the night. The movement was made in good order.

The position of the enemy at Munfordville is too strong to be taken by infantry or such light artillery as I had; they can, however, be easily shelled out with heavier guns, either from this side of the river or the other. When hostilities ceased on yesterday my guns were within 200 yards of the works and my infantry had driven all the enemy inside of them and [they were] compelled to keep themselves closely concealed behind them. There are points more distant from which the works could be easily shelled with 12-pounder guns, if none heavier could be got. The best approach to the place from Glasgow on this side the river is by the Burkesville road. Points from which the works can be shelled can be reached with but little danger of injury from their heavy guns.

The information upon which I made the attack deceived me completely as to the number of the enemy, the strength of their works, and the possibility of their being re-enforced. I was told that they had from 1,200 to 1,800 men, that no re-enforcements could possibly reach them, and was led to believe that their works were nothing more than rifle pits, and they perhaps unfinished, which could be easily taken by a bold dash with an infantry force, when in truth they had not less than 2,500 men; their works were extensive and complete and mounted with heavier guns than I had, and I am credibly informed that on Saturday they received a re-enforcement of 200 men, and during that night or early on yesterday morning a regiment of 500 old troops, under Colonel Dunham, arrived. In the last interview had with them at the termination of the truce Colonel Dunham had assumed the command. He had been in the fort for some time, but had declined to supersede Colonel Wilson [Wilder] until the termination of the truce. It is due to Colonel Scott, Louisiana cavalry, from whom I received my information, to say that he was himself misled as to the strength and disposition of the enemy by the fact that on Saturday night, when he demanded the surrender of the fort, the commander answered that he could not surrender to a cavalry brigade, leaving the inference to be drawn that if he had been supported by an infantry force they would have surrendered to it. I do not understand how he was deceived as to the possibility of re-enforcements coming to them.

I fear that I may have incurred censure at headquarters by my action in this matter, but with the information in my possession I felt that it was my duty to make the attempt and I could only believe that the result would be successful. This impression was strengthened at the beginning of the attack by the following incidents: A large force of the enemy, estimated at from two to three regiments, which we found drawn up in line of battle, retreated with but little resistance before the advance of my battalion of sharpshooters, who drove them into their rifle pits, and at the same time the enemy set fire to what I supposed to be the railroad bridge, but what, as I afterwards found, was a church near their principal work. In addition to this their artillery refused to reply to ours except by an occasional shot until ours had been moved up within a few hundred yards of them. These facts, connected with the information which I had previously received, forced me to the belief that the enemy were preparing to retreat or that they could be easily forced to surrender.

My heaviest loss was on the left, which was under the immediate command of Colonel Smith, of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment. I had originally instructed him to advance upon the left and observe the enemy, and, if he thought he could do so successfully, to charge the intrenchments; but afterwards, when I had gained a position upon the enemy's left and in rear of the intrenchments upon which Colonel Smith was moving, I sent an order to him to join me with his command; but unfortunately before the order reached him he had made the fatal charge in which he and Lieut. Col. [James G.] Bullard and many of his officers and men fell. Colonel Smith was found in advance of his own regiment almost at the very foot of the intrenchments. A number of Federal officers who witnessed his conduct testify in glowing terms to his dauntless intrepidity.

Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, of Blythe's Mississippi regiment, who was ordered with his regiment to support Colonel Smith, fell mortally wounded while leading his men on. I shall not attempt to express my admiration of the conduct of my troops. There was not an officer nor a man who did not discharge his whole duty with a cheerfulness and courage worthy of all honor. After marching for the greater part of two nights in succession and fighting unceasingly for four hours without food or water the only murmurs that I heard were when the flag of truce demanding the surrender of the fort was sent in, and some of the troops who did not understand its object feared that it was designed to make terms in our own behalf; and as we fell back last night their only wish seemed to be that the enemy might leave the cover of his walls and follow us.

We took one prisoner, who had been sent out as a skirmisher, and a Missourian who was in the enemy's service and who was on picket deserted to us; both of these are now here. I captured and brought off from the depot at Woodsonville 1 hand car and 3 barrels salt. I captured here 3 boarding cars, 4 box cars, 2 hand cars, 9 hogsheads tobacco, 1 barrel salt, 2 boxes new clothing, 6 boxes worn clothing, and 1 box boots. The salt has been turned over to the commissary, and the clothing and boots to the quartermaster, who has distributed them to the troops. The tobacco belongs to citizens. I shall send all my wounded who can bear it to Glasgow to-day.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES R. CHALMERS,
Brigadier-General.

Major HUGER, A. A. G., Res. Div., Right Wing Army of the Miss.

HDQRS. SECOND BRIGADE, RESERVE DIVISION,
RIGHT WING ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Fort Craig, near Munfordsville, Ky., September 19, 1862.

MAJOR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the action of this brigade from the 12th to the 17th instant inclusive:

In obedience to orders from Major-General Withers, received on the afternoon of the 12th while passing through Glasgow, Ky., I halted my brigade at Beaver Creek, about 3 miles from that place, on the Louisville turnpike, to cook rations, and then moved forward at 8 p. m., leaving all my wagons except the ordnance train in camp at Cave City. I sent forward a small detachment of cavalry which had been furnished to me by General Withers, under the command of my aide-de-camp, Lieut. G. T. Banks, with orders to enter the town without giving any alarm, if possible, to take possession of the telegraph and post-offices and to place guards on all the avenues of approach so as to prevent all passing, and I followed them as rapidly as possible with the infantry and artillery. After a march of 11 miles, which was made in excellent order, we reached Cave City at 11.30 p. m. The town was completely taken by surprise, and possession was immediately and quietly taken of the telegraph and post-offices and of the railroad depot. It being expected that one or more trains of the enemy's troops would pass up the road from Bowling Green toward Louisville the track was torn up and other preparations were made to capture it, but the train did not make its appearance.

The brigade was encamped near the town and strong pickets were thrown out on all the roads leading to it. By the aid of Sergeant Bradford, First Regiment Louisiana Infantry, who had been detailed to accompany me for that purpose, I established telegraphic communication with Louisville and intercepted a few messages passing to and from the enemy at that place, the most of which, together with those found on file in the office, I forwarded to you. Unfortunately the wires had been cut by our troops south of Cave City, and the operator at Louisville soon began to suspect that something was wrong; otherwise I might have obtained more valuable information.

On the morning of the 13th I made a reconnaissance of the country in the direction of Munfordville, and finding a mill near Horse Cave containing a considerable quantity of wheat I ordered the Tenth Mississippi Regiment (Col. R. A. Smith) and Blythe's Mississippi regiment (commanded by Lieut. Col. James Moore) up to take possession of it, with the view of having the wheat ground for the use of the troops. During the day I learned from intercepted dispatches that the advance of our army to Glasgow had thrown the enemy into consternation along the whole line from Louisville to Bowling Green, and that they were under the impression that the force occupying Cave City was 7,000 strong and was advancing on Munfordville, where they had a camp of instruction, from which place they were asking for re-enforcements and provisions.

Late in the afternoon I intercepted a dispatch from General Gilbert, commanding at Louisville, ordering transportation to be ready at 7 p. m. to convey Colonel Dunham's regiment, 500 strong, and five days' rations for 3,000 men to Munfordville. About 9 p. m. I received a message from Colonel Scott, commanding brigade of cavalry, through one of his officers, to the effect that the force of the enemy at Munfordville was not more than 1,800 men, entirely raw troops, and that they were fortifying their position, but that the railroad and telegraph had been destroyed in their rear, cutting them off completely from all communication and re-enforcements. He also informed me that he intended to attack them at daylight on the following morning, and desired that I would co-operate with him with a part of my force.

Relying upon the information thus received and that gleaned from the intercepted dispatches I determined to support him with my whole brigade, leaving only a sufficient force behind to protect Cave City and its approaches, and accordingly moved out of the town at 10 p. m., and, after a march of 12 miles, I reached the enemy's lines in front of Munfordville at daylight on the 14th instant. The enemy's works, as I afterward found, consisted of three distinct parts. On their right was a range of rifle pits sufficient to contain 3,000 men, semicircular in form, and terminating on the extreme right in a strong stockade, which stood upon the brink of the lofty bluff overlooking Green River. About 100 yards to the left of this was another rifle pit capable of sheltering at least one regiment, and still farther to the left and upon higher ground stood their principal work, a regular bastion earthwork, in and about which were stationed about 300 men. The passages between these works were almost entirely protected from our fire by the nature of the ground. The whole work protected the railroad bridge over Green River, and was connected with the opposite bank by a pontoon bridge. While on the march I had learned from citizens who had been in the works that they were much stronger than I had at first been led to believe; but I was unable to obtain any definite or clear description of them, and the foggy nature of the morning prevented me from making any satisfactory reconnaissance. I learned, however, that the right of their works could be shelled from an eminence known as Mrs. Lewis' Hill, and my original intention was to open a fire upon them from that point for some time before making an assault. With this view the battalion of sharpshooters was ordered forward to drive in the enemy's pickets, who were stationed in the woods on the left of the turnpike.

The firing commenced at 5 a. m. by the sharpshooters driving the enemy's pickets from the hill across an open field to their supporting line, which was supposed to be two regiments of infantry. Maj. W. C. Richards, commanding battalion of sharpshooters, was severely wounded at the first fire, and Captain West, who succeeded to the command, having sent back information of the force by which he was opposed, the Ninth and Twenty-ninth Mississippi Regiments were ordered up to his support, but the enemy were driven into their intrenchments by the sharpshooters before they could be brought into action. At the same time the battery (Ketchum's, under the command of Lieut. James Garrity) was ordered to take position on Mrs. Lewis' Hill and to open fire on the intrenchments, and the Tenth Mississippi Regiment was ordered to support it.

A heavy volume of flame and smoke which arose at this time near the enemy's work was supposed to proceed from the railroad bridge, and this, coupled with the fact that they had retired so rapidly before our advance and had refused almost altogether to reply to the fire of our artillery, led me to the belief that they were preparing to evacuate their position. I therefore determined to press forward at once against the works, and moved one section of the artillery, under the immediate command of Lieutenant Garrity, with the Seventh Mississippi (Col. W. H. Bishop), the Ninth Mississippi (Col. T. W. White), and the Twenty-ninth Mississippi Regiments (Col. E. C. Walthall), to the knob, an eminence in front of the bastion fort, from which I opened a fire on it. Blythe's regiment was left to guard the ordnance train, and the sharpshooters were pressed forward to keep the enemy within their works. The section of the battery left on Lewis' Hill, under the command of Lieutenant Bond, was ordered to move farther down the hill and nearer to the rifle pits on our left, and Colonel Smith was instructed to move with the Tenth Mississippi Regiment to the banks of the river and to advance up it toward the fort as near as possible, and, if he saw a favorable opportunity, to storm them. The artillery on the knob opened a rapid fire on the bastion fort, but owing to the light caliber of the guns and the very defective character of the ammunition with but little effect. From this point I discovered a house surrounded with woods on the right of the fort and within range of it, and I at once ordered the Ninth and Twenty-ninth Regiments to move forward and occupy the woods opposite the fort, with instructions to keep the men under cover, to approach the works as closely as possible, and to storm them if they could do so successfully. The Seventh Regiment was ordered to follow them within supporting distance. This was accomplished with small loss, the enemy stationed in the woods falling back at once before our advance. Our regiments attained a position under cover within range of the fort, and the sharpshooters, who were deployed in front as skirmishers, kept the enemy closely within their walls. I immediately ordered up the artillery from the knob and planted it near the house, not more than 200 yards from the fort, and in a position where it was protected in some measure from the fire of the enemy by a depression in the ground and by the timber. This position completely flanked the enemy's rifle pits and stockade on the center and left of their works, and if my guns had been of longer range I could have rendered them untenable. The distance was, however, too great for my guns, which could only reach the bastion and the rifle pits in the center, from the latter of which their fire drew every man. The fire of my artillery was maintained from this point during the continuance of hostilities.

When making this movement I notified Colonel Smith of it, and repeated my previous instructions to him.

In attempting to carry out these instructions, being entirely ignorant of the ground to be passed over, he came within range of the enemy's guns from the right of their work and in front of the abatis of fallen trees, in a position where it was equally dangerous to advance or retreat, and immediately advanced against the works. Hearing the firing, I ordered Blythe's regiment to support the Tenth, and that regiment was soon engaged with the enemy in endeavoring, under a very heavy fire, to force its way through the abatis. In this attack Colonel Smith, of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, was dangerously wounded; Lieutenant-Colonel Bullard, of the same regiment, was killed; Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, commanding Blythe's Mississippi regiment, was mortally wounded, with a large number of their officers and men. By the fall of these officers the command of Blythe's regiment devolved upon Maj. [J. C.] Thompson, and that of the Tenth upon Capt. [J. M.] Walker, both of whom discharged that duty during the remainder of the engagement in a highly satisfactory manner. As soon as I was informed of the loss of these officers I instructed Maj. [James] Barr [jr.], of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, who was acting on my staff as inspector-general of the brigade, to assume command of his regiment, but before he could reach it the firing had ceased. Before I knew the disastrous nature of this attack, believing that the bastion fort could be carried by a combined attack by my whole force, I sent orders to Colonel Smith to move to the right and join me with the two regiments under his command; but he was wounded before the order reached him, and his regiment was so engaged that it would have been impossible to withdraw it without great loss. Perceiving, however, after the order was sent that a furious struggle was going on upon the enemy's right, I thought it a favorable opportunity to move against them upon the left, and I at once ordered the three regiments under my immediate command to advance from their cover, the Seventh on the right, the Ninth on the left, and the Twenty-ninth in the center, and to storm the fort. This movement was made in fine style. The regiments moved in a perfect line across the road and up the hill upon which the fort stood to a point where they were in some measure protected by a depression in the ground and by the ruins of a church which the enemy had burned early in the morning and which we had supposed to be the railroad bridge. Here they halted and poured in so deadly a fire that the enemy were compelled to seek shelter behind their walls, and only ventured to return the fire from their artillery or by holding their guns at arm's length over the walls without exposing their persons. Seeing that the Ninth Mississippi Regiment was more exposed than the others I ordered it to move by the right flank in rear of the others, intending to form it on the right of the Seventh and to advance it against the fort from the direction of the river. The order to advance was repeated and the foremost files were within 25 yards of the ditch and pressing rapidly forward toward it when a fire from artillery was unexpectedly opened from a hill in our rear, the shells falling among our ranks. Supposing that the enemy must have established a battery in our rear I ordered the Seventh and Ninth Regiments to about-face and charge it. This order was promptly obeyed and these regiments were already within a short distance of the battery, which fell back before them, when I was informed that it was attached to Colonel Scott's cavalry brigade and had come up to our relief. I immediately halted the two regiments, intending to lead them again upon the fort, but unfortunately the other regiment, not understanding in the confusion the object of the movement which had been made and supposing that a retreat had been ordered, had fallen back. It being impossible to renew the attack at once under the circumstances, the whole force was withdrawn in good order to a position in the woods near that from which they had made the attack. It was then 9.30 a. m.

A careful examination of the ground since the engagement has satisfied me that had we not been surprised and disconcerted by the unexpected fire from Colonel Scott's artillery in our rear this attack would have been successful. The enemy had in that work, as I have since learned, only about 300 men, who had been driven by our fire to hide themselves, while I had before it not less than 700 men, who were pressing forward toward it in the most gallant and determined manner. A few steps farther would have carried them into the ditch, and once in close contest the issue could not be doubted. That work once taken and the rest lay at our mercy. Its guns could have been turned to rake the other works, and the remainder of the enemy's force would have had no choice but to surrender or be slaughtered.

Soon after regaining our position I had an interview with Colonel Scott, who said he had made repeated efforts to inform me of his presence and of his intention to plant his battery upon the hill from which it fired. Unfortunately none of them had reached me. He also stated that he was inclined to believe that the enemy would surrender if a demand was made upon them, from the fact that when he had approached the place on the afternoon of the day before from the opposite side of the river and demanded its surrender Colonel Wilder, the officer in command, had replied that he could not surrender to a cavalry force, leaving it to be inferred that he would surrender if attacked by infantry and artillery; and he repeated what his messenger had told me on the night before in reference to the destruction of the railroad and telegraph in their rear and the impossibility of their receiving any reinforcements. At his suggestion I addressed a note to Colonel Wilder by Maj. [J. B.] Morgan, of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi Regiment, under a flag of truce, stating my strength and renewing the demand for a surrender, to which Colonel Wilder replied, saying that he had also been re-enforced since the engagement began and refusing to surrender, but proposing a truce to enable both parties to remove their dead and wounded. I acceded to this proposition, stating in my reply that I would take as much time as might be necessary and would notify him of its conclusion. Copies of the notes which passed between us are herewith inclosed and numbered from 1 to 3.

Fatigue parties were immediately sent out to remove the dead and wounded, but as tools for burying the former had to be obtained from the enemy, from whom I could get only a few, and as the latter had to be removed more than a mile in order to put them in comfortable quarters, this work was not accomplished until 5 p. m. In accordance with the terms of the truce I then notified Colonel Wilder that it was at an end, when, much to my surprise, Colonel Dunham, who had assumed command of the fort in the mean time, requested that it might be prolonged in order to enable them to complete burying their dead. Major Morgan, who bore my message, promised that I would make no offensive movement, and afterward Colonels White and Walthall, whom I sent to communicate with Colonel Dunham as soon as I heard of his request, agreed that this might continue for one hour.

After my interview with Colonel Scott in the morning I determined that I would not renew my attack upon the works. My previous attempt had satisfied me that I had been deceived as to the strength of the enemy's works, as well as their numbers and disposition and the possibility of their being re-enforced. They had at the commencement of the engagement, as I have since learned from their officers, about 2,300 men, and were re-enforced by Colonel Dunham with 500 men from the north side of the river during its continuance. Their works were mounted with ten guns, of which there were two 12-pounder Napoleon guns, one 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch Parrott gun, and the others 6-pounders, mostly rifled. My own force, owing to the heavy details left as pickets at Cave City, numbered only 1,613 officers and men, including Ketchum's battery of two 6-pounders and two 12-pounder howitzers. The force with which Colonel Scott joined me was 300 cavalry, with two small mountain howitzers, and he reported that there were two regiments of cavalry belonging to his brigade on the opposite side of the river. I felt assured that with this force, disproportioned as it was to that of the enemy, I might, by a determined assault, have taken the fort, but the heavy loss which I had already sustained, especially on my left, and the certainty that it would be greatly increased by a renewal of the attack, coupled with the conviction that the place could be easily and speedily taken by a larger force without loss of life, determined me not to make another attempt upon it. As soon therefore as notice had been given to the enemy of the termination of the truce I withdrew my troops under cover of the woods to the turnpike. While on the march I was informed of the request of Colonel Dunham that the truce might be prolonged, and immediately sent Colonels White and Walthall to communicate with him, as I have before stated. I halted the brigade on the turnpike just beyond the bridge crossing the railroad and remained there until the expiration of the hour agreed on, when I resumed the march and proceeded without molestation to Cave City, which I reached about midnight.

My loss in this affair was 3 officers and 32 men killed, and 28 officers and 225 men wounded, of whom some have since died. Of these the greater part in proportion to the numbers engaged fell in the attack on the right of the enemy's works. The wounded were first removed from the field to the depot and other buildings at Rowlett's Station, where their wounds were dressed, and afterward those who could bear transportation were conveyed in ambulances and wagons to Cave City, where they were placed in the hotel and depot and every possible arrangement made for their comfort. Those whom it was not thought proper to remove were left at Rowlett's Station under the charge of surgeons and with the assurance from Colonel Wilder that they should not be molested, which assurance, I am glad to say, was fully carried out.

On the following day (15th instant), having taken the pledge of the telegraphic operator captured at Cave City not to give any information to the enemy, I sent him into their lines under the charge of Capt.

[R. A.] Bell, of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, with a flag of truce. I at the same time sent by Captain Bell a note to Colonel Dunham, requesting permission to remove such of my wounded from the hospital as might be able to bear it, and also the bodies of such as had died, which he granted at once, and in his reply stated that I could have access to my wounded at Rowlett's Station at any time. Copies of this correspondence are herewith inclosed, numbered 4 and 5.

At 5 o'clock on the morning of the 16th instant, in obedience to orders from Headquarters Right Wing Army of the Mississippi, this brigade moved from its camp at Cave City in advance of the main body toward Munfordville. About 8 a. m., when within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the fort, my cavalry scouts encountered those of the enemy and fired upon them, killing one horse. A detachment from the battalion of sharpshooters was immediately ordered forward as skirmishers, and soon after the whole battalion, under the command of Captain West, was ordered to advance and drive back the enemy's skirmishers, who began to show themselves in considerable numbers in the woods on the crest of Mrs. Lewis' Hill.

At this time Brigadier-General Duncan came up with his brigade and I at once resigned the command to him. A section of my battery (Ketchum's) was ordered forward to shell the woods in which the enemy's skirmishers were concealed, but after a few shots they were compelled to cease firing, as their shells were endangering our own men who were driving the enemy before them. The Seventh Mississippi Regiment was then ordered forward to support the sharpshooters, but before it could be brought into action the enemy had fallen back, and did not make another stand until they had reached their works. The sharpshooters continued to annoy the enemy until 6 p. m., when they rejoined the main body of the brigade. The remainder of the brigade was ordered to move to the left of the turnpike and was halted behind a spur of Mrs. Lewis' Hill, and afterwards, by order from General Bragg, it moved farther to the left and took position with its left resting on the river and right extending toward the turnpike, where it was entirely protected from the fire of the fort by a hill. Here we remained until the next morning, the 17th, when we were ordered up to witness the surrender of the garrison of the fort, and afterwards, by order of General Bragg, in compliment, as he stated, to our gallant attack upon the place, we took possession of the works.

The only loss sustained in this movement was by the battalion of sharpshooters, who had 3 men severely wounded while engaged with the enemy's skirmishers.

In the attack on the 14th instant I took 2 prisoners, who have since been turned over to the proper officers to be paroled with the others. At Cave City we captured 3 boarding cars, 1 box car, 2 hand cars, 1 telegraphic machine and battery, 2 boxes new clothing (uniforms), 6 boxes worn clothing (uniforms), 1 box boots, and 1 barrel salt; and at Woodsonville I captured and brought off to Cave City 1 hand car and 3 barrels salt. The cars were left on the track at Cave City when our forces moved out of that place. The telegraphic machine and battery were sent to Major-General Polk. The salt was turned over to the commissary department, and the clothing and boots were turned over to the quartermaster of this brigade and issued to the men, who were greatly in need of them.

I cannot close this report without expressing my admiration of the conduct of the officers and men under my command. The cheerfulness with which they endured the hardships of the march from Chattanooga; the alacrity with which, after a march of ordinary length during the day, they made the night march from Glasgow to Cave City and then on the succeeding night from that place to Woodsonville; the courage with which they first drove the enemy into his works and then attacked him in them, and which drew encomiums even from their foes; the endurance with which they fought for four hours against heavy odds without an opportunity for rest and with but little food or water, and the orderly manner in which, after a day of such toils, they retraced their steps to Cave City, entitle them to the highest praise that I can give; nor can I omit the opportunity to express my regret at the loss of the many brave officers and men who were killed or wounded. Most prominent among these—not more by their rank than by their high soldierly qualities—were Colonel Smith, of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, who fell severely wounded in advance of his regiment and within a few yards of the enemy's works while leading a charge against them; Lieutenant-Colonel Bullard, of the same regiment, who was killed, and Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, commanding Blythe's Mississippi regiment, who was mortally wounded in the same attack, and Maj. W. C. Richards, commanding battalion of sharpshooters, who was severely wounded early in the action. They fell where they would have but liked to have fallen, in the very face of the enemy and while leading their men against them, but their loss will be severely felt in this brigade and their places cannot easily be supplied.

My thanks are due to the members of my staff for their gallant and efficient conduct in the separate departments. During both engagements Capt. W. A. Goodman, assistant adjutant-general; Lieut. G. T. Banks, aide-de-camp; Walter L. Strickland, volunteer aide-de-camp, whose horse was twice wounded; Maj. James Barr, jr., of the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, and acting brigade inspector, and Maj. H. H. Chalmers, acting commissary of subsistence, were constantly and actively engaged in bearing orders often under a heavy fire. Lieut. J. B. Mattison, ordnance officer, was active and efficient in the management of his train. Dr. J. H. P. Westbrook, senior surgeon of the brigade, proved himself eminently fitted for his position by his skill and energy displayed in the care and treatment of the wounded, and Maj. [J. M.] Thompson, brigade quartermaster, was exceedingly prompt in bringing up wagons and other vehicles from Cave City for their removal to that place.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES R. CHALMERS,

Brigadier-General.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 2,

Knoxville, Tenn., November 3, 1862.

This attack was unauthorized and injudicious; but the conduct of the troops and commander in action reflects credit on both, and adds but another proof to the many of their distinguished gallantry. The loss of the gallant and admired Colonel Smith, with the other valuable officers and men of this distinguished brigade, will be mourned by their comrades and the country.

Report of Lieut. James Garrity, commanding W. H. Ketchum's Battery.

CAMP AT CAVE CITY, KY., — —, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report the part taken by Ketchum's battery in the engagement of yesterday:

We took possession on an elevation in front of the enemy's works about 1,000 yards distant about 5 a. m. and immediately opened fire, which we kept up until the two howitzers under my immediate command were ordered to a position on the right and in front of the fort; but finding it was out of range I was ordered forward and took position within point-blank range of the enemy's principal work, and kept up a steady and continuous fire on the fort and breastworks until about 9 o'clock, at which time the firing ceased on both sides.

The casualties in this section were 7 men wounded, 1 horse killed, and 6 wounded.

The left section, commanded by Lieutenant Bond, remained in the position the battery first occupied until 6 a. m. It was then ordered to move to a hill half a mile distant to the left, and kept up a steady fire on the enemy's breastworks until he ceased firing. Casualties none.

I take pleasure in being able to represent the conduct of the officers and men under my command as being highly commendable.

Number of men engaged, 100.

Very respectfully,

JAMES GARRITY,

First Lieutenant, Commanding Ketchum's Battery.

Report of Col. John W. Frazer, Twenty-eighth Alabama Infantry, of operations September 16.

MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 18, 1862.

CAPTAIN: In obedience to circular just received I have the honor to report:

On reaching the range of the guns on the fortifications on the 16th instant this command was moved in line of battle to the left of the position previously occupied by the battery of Captain Waters and halted, supporting the battery. Before the battery opened fire the regiment was ordered to move by the right flank and take position on the side of the mountain on the right of the Munfordville road. Here it rested in line for an hour or more, when, in accordance with orders, we marched to the brow of the mountain to support our skirmishers. While here we received an occasional shell from the works and were fired on by the enemy's skirmishers. Two companies from our left were then detailed to drive in the enemy's skirmishers occupying a wood in front and on the opposite side of the valley from us. This detachment, commanded by Capt. John H. Turpin, Company B, moved quickly forward, and after exchanging a few shots drove in the enemy's [skirmishers], as it is reported, with some slight loss or damage to them. These woods were held by this detachment until the command was relieved from its position on the mountain by a portion of the command of Major-General Buckner. After being relieved, as above stated, I reported with my command at the foot of the mountain, and marched with the brigade to a point a half mile northeast of the works, when the brigade bivouacked for the night.

One private of Company L, wounded by a spent ball in the finger, constituted all the damage sustained by this command.

It gratifies the commanding officer to be able to say that the men and officers were calm, cool, and cheerful during the entire day and obeyed every command with great alacrity and promptness.

I have the honor, captain, to be, very respectfully,

JNO. W. FRAZER,

Commanding Twenty-eighth Alabama Regiment.

*Report of Col. W. H. Bishop, Seventh Mississippi Infantry, of operations
September 14.*

CAVE CITY, September 15, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit to you the following report of the part taken in yesterday's engagement by this regiment:

About sunrise I received orders to follow after the right section of the battery which took position on a hill on the right of the Munfordville road. Here I received orders to take my position on the left of the Ninth Mississippi Regiment. This regiment had already passed the battery and entered a corn field beyond to the northeast, and before I could reach the position to which I was ordered I received another order to hold my regiment in reserve behind the Ninth and Twenty-ninth Regiments. This order was in a few minutes followed by another order to move forward and make the attack between the Ninth and Twenty-ninth. I ordered my regiment forward on the right of the Twenty-ninth, supposing the Ninth to be already on my right in advance, where I heard pretty brisk firing. I moved into a small corn field about 150 or 200 yards from the breastworks and on the left of their fort or stronghold. From this position I intended making a charge, but immediately after entering this field the firing in advance on my right almost entirely ceased, and no attack having been made by the Twenty-ninth on my left, I ordered my men to lie down, intending to confer with Colonel Walthall for an immediate and simultaneous charge, my own regiment being too small to charge alone. Almost instantly after this order the center of my regiment, which was imperfectly screened from observation, received a severe fire of grape, which killed 3 men and wounded 5 others. I immediately ordered the regiment back about 20 yards to the fence, behind which they could be effectually screened and protected. Here a lieutenant, commanding a company of sharpshooters (whom I had previously mistaken for a portion of the Ninth), asked me for assistance to drive the enemy back on the right. I ordered three companies forward deployed as skirmishers. Shortly afterward, on being informed that these companies were exposed to a severe cross-fire from the right, I moved the regiment in that direction, and soon after with the Ninth and Twenty-ninth made an attack near the enemy's fort. This attack had progressed only a few minutes when I was ordered to fall back and attack a battery on the right and to our rear. While moving in that direction I received word that the battery was a Confederate battery. A flag of truce ended further aggressive movements.

I would remark that the heavy details for picket duty, the number left sick and unable to march from this place, besides infirmary details, &c., left me only about 123 effective men and 141 aggregate in the action. Of this number 4 were killed, 15 wounded, and 1 missing. The men generally were cool and acted with courage.

I am, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. BISHOP,

Colonel, Commanding.

Capt. W. A. GOODMAN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

*Report of Col. Thomas W. White, Ninth Mississippi Infantry, of operations
September 14.*

SEPTEMBER 19, 1862.

SIR : I have the honor to report the part taken by my regiment in the attack made by the Second Brigade of Withers' division on the enemy at Woodsonville, Sunday, the 14th instant :

We left Cave City with the brigade at 10 p. m. Saturday, and marching all night reached the hills near the railroad while the sharpshooters were driving in the pickets and skirmishers of the enemy. We followed them in and were formed in line in the field north and east of the railroad depot at Rowlett's Station. We then marched by the flank through the woods on the hill to our right, and on reaching the orchard, on its northern base, were ordered to form in line in the woods near the house of Woodson and charge the fort on the northeastern end of the enemy's lines. The regiment formed as desired, but on examining the fort and rifle pits supporting it I concluded to wait a few moments until Colonel Walthall arrived, who was directed to form near and support me. In the mean time two guns of Ketchum's battery were brought and put in position in the grove in front of the house and commenced to fire on the fort and lines of the enemy. General Chalmers arriving now on the ground, and my regiment being formed in line with the Twenty-ninth, we moved up amid a very heavy fire toward the fort through a corn patch and over several fences, and crossing the turnpike road, took shelter under a bank on the road-side about 100 yards from the fort and commenced a very heavy and well-directed fire on the men who were firing from the walls of the fort. In passing through the field and while firing behind the bank we lost several men. The Twenty-ninth being on my right and the ground being sheltered for them near the fort, part of my right wing moved up nearer the fort on the left of that regiment. We had now been over the road some fifteen or twenty minutes when I heard the order to charge given and passed along the line from the right. The regiment advanced at a run through a very heavy fire of grape-shot and small-arms toward the fort. Our men got within some 40 steps, but recoiled and returned in confusion to the bank near the road, when they formed and prepared to charge again, all of them stopping as soon as the road was reached. At this time I received an order to move the regiment by the right flank to charge a light battery which was reported to be firing at us from the hill on our right. As the noise was great and the order given on our right flank the regiment did not get off in good order, some leaving in advance of others as the word was passed along the line. We formed, however, in a corn field back of a house and prepared to charge on the battery above mentioned, when we were informed by an aide of General Chalmers that the battery was one of Colonel Scott's command, and ordered [us] to retire under cover of the woods, where the sinks in the ground gave shelter from the enemy's fire.

In the charge on the fort I lost several most gallant officers wounded and many brave men killed. Where all behaved so well I will not particularize, but the regiment, officers and men, did all that could have been expected or required of them.

I inclose a list * herewith showing the casualties, from which it will be seen that out of an aggregate of 282 men engaged we lost 9 killed and 44 wounded.

I am, captain, your most obedient servant,

T. W. WHITE,

Colonel Ninth Mississippi Regiment.

Report of Capt. James L. Finley, Tenth Mississippi Infantry, of operations September 14.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to make the following report of the part taken in the action of September 14 by the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, 340 men, Col. R. A. Smith commanding:

After marching from Cave City on the night of the 13th instant and arriving near the crossing of the Cave City road and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad filed to the left with and in support of Ketchum's battery. After standing in line of battle some fifteen or twenty minutes was ordered to charge the enemy's works, which order was obeyed. After being under fire some three hours a flag of truce made its appearance. Demanding the object of the flag of truce, was informed by the officer bearing said flag that it was for the purpose of clearing the field of the killed and wounded. We immediately removed our killed and wounded, arms and accouterments, buried our dead, then retired at the proper time to the Cave City road, where we were joined by the balance of the brigade and marched back to Cave City.

I beg leave to state that the conduct of George Fugel, of Company D, color-sergeant, and B. F. Bonds, of Company E, and R. B. Tatom, of Company C, color-guards, was highly commendable and worthy of notice in this report.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES L. FINLEY,

Captain, Commanding.

Capt. W. A. GOODMAN,

Asst. Adjt. Gen., Second Brigade, Withers' Division.

No. 11.

Report of Col. Edward C. Walthall, Twenty-ninth Mississippi Infantry, of operations September 14.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I respectfully submit the following as a report of the engagement on yesterday near Munfordville in what concerns this command:

About 6 o'clock in the morning, near the forks of the road near the bridge, I was ordered by Brigadier-General Chalmers to move forward my command within supporting distance of the battalion of sharpshooters, which I did, and drew up the regiment in line of battle about 200 yards in their rear, they having been previously deployed as skirmishers in the woods in front. Soon after this I received an order from General Chalmers, through Capt. [M.] Conly, to move my command across the road to the left. This done I received an order through Mr. Strickland to move to the right of the road and form on the left of the Ninth Mississippi Regiment, and just as the command was in the act of moving Captain Conly brought me an order to advance through the open field to the right of the position I then occupied as soon as I saw the Ninth Mississippi Regiment pass out of the woods into a field still farther to the right. In passing through this field I was fired on from the earthworks on the left and 2 privates were killed. After crossing the field I received an order through Major Barr to move to the right and support the sharpshooters and carry the works. On reaching the place indicated I discovered the Seventh Regiment in front of me, and they immediately moved off to the right. While they were moving General Chalmers came up and ordered me to move up under shelter of some houses on the hill in front of one of the forts of the enemy and fire on them. The command was moved up, the companies on the right partially sheltered behind the houses, and then advanced partly under the protection of a small hill in front to within 20 yards of the fort. After firing and receiving a heavy fire for a few moments a bayonet charge was ordered by General Chalmers. I gave the command and the charge was attempted but without success, the earthworks being about 10 feet high and surrounded by a deep ditch about 8 feet wide. After this the firing on either side was kept up for ten or fifteen minutes, when, it being manifest that my command could effect nothing in the position it then occupied, I retired to the woods in rear of the houses above named and halted under cover of a hill. I came off in good order. As soon as I reached this position I was ordered by General Chalmers to move my command to a depression in the hill-side near the battery to support it if necessary. Soon after I reached that point the firing ceased and was renewed no more.

I carried to the field 25 officers, 50 non-commissioned officers, and 232 privates. The number of killed and wounded is furnished below.*

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. C. WALTHALL,
Colonel, Commanding,

Capt. W. A. GOODMAN, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Maj. John C. Thompson, Blythe's (Forty-fourth) Mississippi Infantry, of operations September 14.

CAMP NEAR CAVE CITY, KY., September 15, 1862.

SIR: In obedience to your order of to-day I have the honor to report that at about 7 o'clock on the morning of Sunday, the 14th instant, the Blythe Mississippi Regiment, consisting of 281 rank and file aggregate, commanded by Lieut. Col. James Moore, was ordered to leave the railroad depot at Woodsonville, to proceed to the battle ground, distant about three-fourths of a mile, and report to Col. [R. A.] Smith, commanding the Tenth Mississippi Regiment. Having no guide, and being unacquainted with the position of the regiment, we had to be guided by the sound of the guns. When arrived near the breastworks of the enemy we were saluted with heavy and successive volleys of musketry. Colonel Moore was at the center, Capt. [W. P.] Malone on the left, and I on the right of our regiment. Their fire was immediately returned and was kept up with animation on both sides for about two hours, when I was informed that Colonel Moore was shot down. Proceeding at once to the center, I found him lying on the ground apparently mortally wounded. I immediately ordered the firing to cease and the men to lie close to the ground. This order was given to induce the enemy to believe that we had withdrawn under cover of the smoke. The firing by the enemy having partially ceased, the men were ordered to fall back quietly and with as little noise as possible. The retreat was made in fine order, and we halted at a distance of 80 or 100 yards to ground where we were partially protected by a slight elevation. The line was formed, but seeing that we were still exposed I again ordered them to fall back to a distance of about 100 yards, where they were again halted and formed. The falling back was done in fine order and without the loss or injury of a man. About this time the flag of truce was sent in.

The Blythe regiment was animated with the most heroic spirit, and throughout the conflict displayed a coolness and courage that defied all obstacles. The retreat was made without loss, and when the line was reformed the same eagerness was displayed which had been exhibited at the onset. The regiment is entitled to high commendation for its conduct on the occasion.

Appended I send the report* of killed and wounded, with the nature of their wounds, made by the regimental surgeon, Dr. D. A. Kinchloe, from which it will be seen that the number of killed was 4, wounded 38.

Respectfully submitted.

Report of Col. A. J. Lythgoe, Nineteenth South Carolina Infantry, of operations September 16-17.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1862.

The Nineteenth Regiment South Carolina Volunteers left the camp near Cave City at 4 a. m. on the morning of the 16th instant, moved with the Fourth Brigade, to which it is attached, to a short distance of the fort at Woodsonville, where the general commanding the brigade assigned it to a position on an eminence on the right of the road. In passing to it the regiment was for a short time exposed to the fire of grape and shell. One man, a private in Company I, had his haversack strap cut by a grape-shot. The regiment was placed in the position to which it was assigned, when one company was thrown out as skirmishers. This company soon became engaged with the pickets of the enemy at long range. Two companies of the Twenty-eighth Alabama Regiment were sent out by Colonel Frazer to join the company of this regiment. The three companies then drove the pickets of the enemy into their trenches, when the firing ceased and the regiment was ordered to move still farther to the right into a body of woods, where it remained until the morning of the 17th instant, when it was moved with the brigade to the camp in the vicinity of Munfordville.

Very respectfully,

A. J. LYTGOE,

Colonel, Comdg. Nineteenth South Carolina Volunteers.

Report of O. F. West, commanding Richards' Battalion, of operations September 14.

CAMP AT CAVE CITY, Monday, September 15, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the battalion under the command of Maj. W. C. Richards encountered the enemy's pickets in strong force on the Munfordville road, about 1 mile south of Green River, on Sunday, September 14, at early dawn. They fired on us, and Company A was instantly deployed, and Company C was soon ordered to follow. They executed the maneuver promptly and in fine order under a heavy fire. Major Richards was at this time severely wounded, and ordered a sudden and quick forward movement. We advanced, driving the enemy before us without check, until we found ourselves within range and in full view of their intrenchments. Here I ordered a halt and firing ceased; our advanced position was held until the main body of our forces came up and the engagement became general. As soon as a line was formed for action Capt. T. W. Richards, with his company, charged on the enemy, who were concealed behind houses, and drove them before him; here he fell wounded. Lieut. J. D. Nesbitt, then taking command of his company, led it in the charge on the fort and fell dangerously wounded. The company then being without officers, Lieut. [J. T.] Fant, of the Ninth Mississippi Regiment, was ordered to take command; he was soon after severely wounded, and I ordered this company to be attached to Company A, under command of Lieutenants Day and Jones. Capt. T. Brownrigg's company was held as reserve and moved close behind the line of skirmishers in fine order.

The officers and men of this battalion conducted themselves with commendable coolness and gallantry during the entire battle.

The battalion went into the engagement with 130 men effective strength and came off with 116, having 6 men wounded and 8 missing; the missing have since reported.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. F. WEST,

Captain, Commanding Battalion.

Capt. W. A. GOODMAN.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1862.—Skirmish near Falmouth, Ky.

Report of Capt. G. W. Berry, commanding Home Guard.

CAMP 5 MILES FROM FALMOUTH, KY., Sept. 18, 1862.

GENERAL: On yesterday 28 cavalry attacked us at 3.30 o'clock; my men all being on scout except 11. We fought them for about forty minutes under cover of a house, when 23 of them retired, leaving 5 men and 5 horses on the ground; how many wounded were carried off I cannot tell. I counted cartridges, and saw I could not stand another forty minutes' attack, and at night fell back here.

We had only 1 wounded and he very badly. I send you the prisoner we took in hopes you can get some information from him. He tells me they have eighty pieces of artillery; also tells me that he can't understand why they are retreating.

Respectfully,

G. W. BERRY,
Commanding Home Guard.

General LEW. WALLACE.

Report of Maj. Gen. Horatio G. Wright, U. S. Army, commanding Department of the Ohio.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
Cincinnati, Ohio, October 15, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, dated the 12th instant, detailing the circumstances occasioning the withdrawal of his command from Cumberland Gap:

It appears from this report that the evacuation, which was in pursuance of the unanimous opinion of a council of the general officers of the command, was a matter of necessity, arising from their provisions being exhausted, their communications cut off, and no information of any prospect of relief being received. While the evacuation of the Gap is to be regretted, I do not see how, with starvation staring him in the face and with no certainty of relief being afforded, he could have come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at. The several communications which I had addressed to him appear not to have reached him. After the unfortunate battle near Richmond the entire country between the Ohio River and Cumberland Gap was in possession of the rebels, and communications could be sent only through the agency of individuals familiar with the country, and who of course ran great risk of capture. Several persons were found to undertake the mission, but none seem to have succeeded in getting through. The march of General Morgan from Cumberland Gap to the Ohio River was most successfully accomplished, and reflects much credit on him and his officers for the skill with which it was conducted, and upon the men for the cheerfulness with which they bore the hardships of a toilsome march of over 200 miles, on scanty fare, over a country affording little subsistence, and often, for long marches, on an inadequate supply of water. The holding of Cumberland Gap has generally been considered as of the greatest moment, it being viewed as the only practicable avenue for the passage of an army into Kentucky from the Southeast. Its importance has, however, I apprehend, been much overestimated, there being several passes through the mountains which, though less easy, are nevertheless practicable, as is shown by the fact that Kirby Smith, with a rebel force of over 20,000 men, passed into Kentucky through one of them. This knowledge diminishes, in my judgment, the importance hitherto attached to the possession of the Gap, unless the neighboring avenues through the mountains into Kentucky are also held.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Major-General, Commanding.

Reports of Brig. Gen. George W. Morgan, U. S. Army, including operations August 16–October 3.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Greenupsburg, Ky., October 3, 1862.

GENERAL: On the night of the 17th of September, with the army of Stevenson 3 miles in my front, with Bragg and Marshall on my flanks, and Kirby Smith in my rear, my command marched from Cumberland Gap mid the explosion of mines and magazines and lighted by the blaze of the store-houses of the commissary and quartermaster. The sight was grand. Stevenson was taken completely by surprise. At 5 o'clock p. m. on the 17th instant I sent him three official letters. The officers of our respective flags remained together in friendly chat for an hour. I have brought away all the guns but four 30-pounders, which were destroyed by knocking off the trunnions. During our march we were constantly enveloped by the enemy's cavalry, first by the Stevenson and since by the Morgan brigade. Throughout I maintained the offensive, and on one day marched twenty hours and on three successive nights drove Morgan's men from their supper. Morgan first assailed us in the rear and then passed to our front, blockading the road and destroying subsistence. For three successive days we were limited to the water of stagnant pools and that in small quantities. We expected to meet Humphrey Marshall at this place, but have been disappointed. Unless otherwise ordered I will proceed with my column to Camp Denison to rest and refit.

With high respect,

GEORGE W. MORGAN,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. HORATIO G. WRIGHT,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

HDQRS. LATE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND,
Portland, Ohio, October 12, 1862.

MAJOR: On the night of the 16th of August last the army of Stevenson, claimed by the enemy to be 20,000 strong, arrived in front of Cumberland Gap, and I immediately ordered Captain Martin, of Munday's cavalry, to proceed, by forced marches, to observe Rogers' and Big Creek Gaps. When within 18 miles of Rogers' Gap he encountered the advance guard of Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith's army, then invading Kentucky. Martin's company was attacked and routed by a greatly superior force of the enemy. General Smith, with 25,000 men, afterward increased to 30,000, established his headquarters at Barboursville, and sent two divisions, under Major-General McCown, to occupy Cumberland Ford. We were now closely enveloped by two armies, numbering 45,000 men, and our supplies were entirely cut off. In consequence of bad roads and want of proper transportation our subsistence stores were short, and I immediately placed my command on half rations, with the determination of holding out to the last extremity. In order to save the artillery, cavalry, and wagon horses from starvation, and for the further purpose of sending tried troops to re-enforce the column organizing at Lexington for our aid, I ordered 400 men of the Third Kentucky, under the gallant Colonel Garrard, to be mounted, and directed him to proceed, with Munday's cavalry, to join the United States forces then en route for our relief. A battalion of the Third Tennessee, under Colonel Houk, had been attacked by a greatly superior force at London, and after a brave resistance was compelled to retreat; but, after a fatiguing march through the mountains, succeeded in gaining Cumberland Gap. The other battalion, under Lieutenant-Colonel Chiles, did gallant service at the Big Hill and at Richmond, for which the hearty thanks of Major-General Nelson were tendered. At Richmond three battalions of my command participated in the battle against immense odds; and, though defeated, by their good conduct they preserved untarnished the honor of our flag.

The enemy's forces having been withdrawn from Cumberland Ford on September 1, I sent De Courcy's brigade to Manchester to secure supplies, though the entire country within 50 miles had been already exhausted. In the mean time I seized every available opportunity to assail the enemy, and sent two expeditions against Baptist and Rogers' Gaps, one against Big Creek Gap, and small expeditions to capture the enemy's stragglers left at Barboursville and London. In all we captured about 500 prisoners and killed and wounded 170 of the enemy, with trifling loss to ourselves. We resorted to every means to draw the enemy into a fight in front of Cumberland Gap. At one time I caused the brigade of De Courcy to be placed in ambush beyond the Poor Valley Ridge, and sent Baird's brigade 4 miles up the Virginia Valley with 50 wagons for corn, which was obtained and brought in; but the enemy adhered to his adopted policy and refused to fight, though Baird formed in line of battle in his immediate front and awaited his coming till 5 p. m. The bands struck up "Dixie," but to no effect. At that time the pickets of the two armies were within hailing distance of each other. In the hope that the enemy would be defeated in front I caused Rogers' and Big Creek Gaps to be heavily blockaded and determined to attack the enemy as he attempted to escape; but the action at Richmond was lost and the country around the Gap was stripped of every stalk of corn.

On the 9th of September I addressed a letter to Major-General Wright, by Lieut. Charles S. Medary, one of my aides-de-camp, with a verbal message that by eating the mules we could hold out sixty days. But on the 12th of September Capt. M. C. Garber, the able and energetic division quartermaster, informed me that it was impossible longer to feed the mules, and suggested that they should be sent toward the Ohio River by way of Manchester. For two reasons I decided not to do so—the hope that the mules could be converted into food, or it might become necessary to harness them to the cannon to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy. But without forage the mules must soon perish from hunger and the air become pestilent from their carcasses.

At this time we had been six days without bread, and the mill at Manchester supplied but little more than sufficient flour for De Courcy's brigade, and no more wheat was to be obtained. The other supplies were rapidly being exhausted, and not one syllable of intelligence had been received since the action at Richmond as to the position of Buell's army or as to what force was being organized in Kentucky under the national flag.

It was now certain that the enemy would not attack our position, and it was equally certain that two weeks from that day we would not have the means of transportation for our cannon should the enemy continue to occupy our front. While in the Gap our position was one of comparative ease and entire safety. To evacuate was to brave the worst horrors of war and the chance of being taken at disadvantage by an overwhelming force of the enemy. To hold the Gap until compelled by hunger to yield would have transferred to the enemy thirty-two guns, 14,000 stand of small-arms, vast magazines of ammunition, and palsied the arms of more than 10,000 brave men, who had been seasoned to all the hardships of war. I determined to convene a military council, and without expressing an opinion learn the views of my colleagues. Up to this time I had impressed upon the minds of my command the belief that under no circumstances would I evacuate, nor would I have ever done so had I not been convinced that it was the only wise course left open for me.

On the 10th of August I telegraphed General Buell that I had "about three weeks' supplies for my entire command." On the 8th of August I telegraphed to Captain Brown, assistant quartermaster at Lexington—

Twenty-five thousand men are between this place and Knoxville, and they are constantly arriving by way of Dalton. The safety of this place depends upon the supplies which you can rush forward. Not a second is to be lost. Give us supplies and we will be regardless of the enemy's force.

The enemy gained our rear and cut off our supplies.

A council of war, composed of Brigadier-Generals Spears, Baird, and Carter, with Lieutenant Craighill as recorder, assembled on the 14th of September, and it was unanimously decided that we had only the alternatives of evacuation or surrender. Such was my own opinion; but I waited one day longer, in the hope of receiving intelligence which would justify our remaining in our position. No intelligence came, and I devoted every energy to secure a rapid and successful evacuation of the Gap. In this, as in all else, I was nobly sustained by every officer and soldier of my command. Evacuation was peculiarly trying to the soldiers from East Tennessee, but both Generals Spears and Carter, from that State, strongly advised that policy.

Capt. W. F. Patterson, an officer of great merit, and of whose valuable services I have before spoken, under the general direction of Lieut. W. P. Craighill, chief engineer, was directed to mine the road and mountain cliffs, so as to prevent my column from being annoyed on its march by the army of Stevenson. This was well done. We had mounted thirty-two guns, and I determined to withdraw all but four 30-pounders, for which there was no possible means of transportation. Captain Tidd, a skillful and ingenious mechanic of the telegraph corps, was instructed to spike the 30-pounders, cut off their trunnions, wedge the bores with shot and spikes, and then hurl them over the cliffs. This was all effectually done.

On the night of the 16th of September a large train was sent toward Manchester, under the convoy of the Thirty-third Indiana and two companies of the Third Kentucky and the Ninth Ohio Battery, under the command of Colonel Coburn, an able and intelligent officer. The entire night of the 16th and the day of the 17th were occupied in busy preparation. At dark on the latter day the regular picket guards were withdrawn, and Lieutenant-Colonel Gallup, provost-marshal of the post, aided by Captain McNeish, with 200 chosen men, assumed the delicate and dangerous duty of holding the enemy in check during the night. Late in the day Lieutenant-Colonel Gallup bore three letters, under a flag of truce, to the enemy's lines, and, while well employed in an hour's chat with the officer accompanying the enemy's flag, some indiscreet person set fire to a portion of the quartermaster's establishments. The red flame and smoke soon curled over the mountains, and seemed like a proclamation to the enemy of what was then going forward. But, thanks to the tact of Gallup, for whose many valuable services I here make acknowledgment, the fire and smoke were ascribed to the burning of brush upon the mountain-sides. About 10 p. m. a breathless courier came in to announce the desertion of a sentinel, as was supposed, to the enemy. It was a moment of intense suspense. All of the guns but of one battery had been withdrawn from the fortifications and sent northward through the Gap, which was masked from the enemy's view by a mountain ridge $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the south of the Gap. The fire had spread from building to building, and the little valley, encircled by the mountains at the foot of the Gap, was one sea of flame. Captain Patterson now commenced to explode his mines, and the enemy seemed to be startled into a knowledge of what was going on. His pickets advanced by the Cottrell and Tazewell roads, but were driven back by a well-directed fire from Gallup's pickets. Spears had been ordered to form his brigade in line of battle at the foot of the mountain on the north side of the Gap, with a section of Foster's battery in the intervals between the regiments. Thus the approaches from Baptist Gap were commanded. At midnight Carter descended the mountain, followed by Baird. The descent was slow, difficult, and dangerous. Had the enemy boldly attacked he could have done much harm. But he was taken by surprise and evidently feared our mines. Gallup kept out his pickets till nearly dawn, when he caused the remaining buildings containing Government property to be destroyed, and with his own hands fired the train which blew up the principal magazine. The night was dark and the difficult march was continued until the advance brigade reached Flat Lick, a distance of 20 miles from the Gap. From this point we advanced by two parallel roads along Goose and Stinking Creeks, and reached the vicinity of Manchester on the night of September 19. At this place I halted one day to perfect the organization for the march, which was resumed on the 21st ultimo. The enemy's cavalry now appeared on our rear and endeavored to cut off one of our trains, but was gallantly repulsed by the Sixth Tennessee, under Colonel Cooper, who had before rendered good service in attacking the enemy's force near Big Creek Gap, which place he afterward blockaded. Captain Adams, the faithful and energetic commissary, had sent forward to Booneville and Proctor to obtain supplies, and, as the road diverged at Morris' farm, I sent the brigades of Baird and Carter via Booneville and those of Spears and De Courcy directly to Proctor. A brigade of cavalry, under General John H. Morgan, now commenced to annoy us, and, the night before our arrival, burned the steam-mill at Proctor; but upon our approach Morgan discovered that I was about to surround him and made a precipitate retreat. Already the troops had suffered greatly for want of water, but the route to Hazel Green was still more difficult. The ridge was almost entirely destitute of water, and where it did exist it was found in small quantities in holes down 80 or 100 feet among cliffs. The North Fork road had been destroyed by the spring and winter rains, but water was plentiful. I determined to advance in parallel columns, and directed Spears and De Courcy to march by the ridge and Baird and Carter by the North Fork road. Thanks to the skill and devotion of Captain Patterson, and to the officer-like bearing of the brigade commanders, regimental officers, and the heroic endurance of the soldiers, all of these terrible difficulties were nobly met and overcome, and the advance brigade halted one day at Hazel Green. At this place we captured two rebel officers. Morgan had already attacked us on the flank and rear, and now passed to our front and commenced a more serious system of annoyance, by blockading the narrow ridges and deep defiles which abound on that almost impracticable route.

After a day's rest the column was again put in motion toward West Liberty, where we expected to meet Humphrey Marshall, as we had been informed that he had left Mount Sterling with his command on the Saturday night previous and that on the day following Kirby Smith arrived with a column at that place. On this march the enemy's cavalry attacked the rear of De Courcy's brigade and scattered eighty or a hundred of our cattle. The cavalry soldiers dismounted and skirmished as infantry, but not until six horses and their riders were stretched upon the ground.

At West Liberty I halted for two days to concentrate my command and await Humphrey Marshall; but our scouts and spies penetrated in every direction without learning anything of his position. We had now cut his line, and occupied a central position between his divided forces. A portion of his command from Virginia arrived within 15 miles of West Liberty, but on learning of our approach rapidly retreated. The column now moved toward Grayson. In several places the roads were heavily obstructed by timber, and in one instance we were compelled to make a detour and construct a new road. Whenever opportunity offered we assumed the offensive and attacked the enemy while engaged in blockading the road. On three successive evenings so closely did we push him that we drove him from his hot supper. Morgan left Grayson late on the afternoon of October 1st and our advance reached there at 11 o'clock the same night. Here he ceased to annoy us.

Our loss, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is about 80 men. His exact loss I do not know, but from the bloody evidences which were found in the positions occupied by his troops his loss must have been double our own.

On October 3 my column reached Greenupsburg, on the Ohio River. I had sent forward Captains Garber and Patterson to procure transportation for the passage of the river, which was effected in good order.

Colonel Byrd, of the First Tennessee, forded the river with the trains of Baird and Carter. To avoid too lengthy a report many incidents of interest have been omitted.

It affords me great pleasure to speak of the admirable bearing of my entire command, officers and soldiers, during that most difficult and trying march of 219 miles. It was worthy of all praise and receives my sincere gratitude. Especial credit is due to Brigadier-Generals Spears, Baird, and Carter, and to Colonel De Courcy; to Lieutenant-Colonel Gallup and Capts. W. F. Patterson, M. C. Garber, and G. M. Adams; to Lieut. W. P. Craighill and Lieutenant Burroughs, engineers; to Captain Foster, chief of artillery, and Lieutenant Burdick, acting ordnance officer, and to Lieutenant-Colonel Ridgell and Lieutenant Reeder, Third Kentucky Volunteers. And my cordial thanks and acknowledgments are due to my personal staff, Capt. C. O. Joline, assistant adjutant-general; Lieutenants Saunders and Medary, aides-de-camp; Lieutenant Montgomery, acting aide-de-camp, and Lieut. H. G. Fisher, chief of signal corps. In mentioning the names of these officers there is no distinction intended to the prejudice of any one, for all have behaved nobly.

It is proper that I should make particular mention of the services of Brigadier-General Baird during our occupancy of the Gap for the zeal displayed by him in aiding Lieutenant Craighill in executing his plans for the defense of that important post; nor can I close the report without respectfully calling the attention of the commanding general to the important services rendered me by Lieut. W. P. Craighill, of the Engineer Corps. He is an officer of distinguished merit, and is thoroughly informed on all the subjects connected with the art of war. He would make an able chief of any staff or fill with high credit any other position to which he may be assigned, and deserves a much higher grade than he now holds.

The evacuation of Cumberland Gap was dictated by a solemn sense of public duty. My command captured it without the loss of a single life, and, though a place of great strength, it can again be taken, should such be the policy of the Government; but the first step toward that end should be the construction of a good military road from Lexington to Cumberland Ford.

I respectfully call your attention to the reports of brigade and corps commanders.

I have the honor to be, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. MORGAN,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Maj. N. H. McLEAN,
Asst. Adjt. Gen. and Chief of Staff, Cincinnati, Ohio.

HEADQUARTERS U. S. FORCES AT PORTLAND, OHIO,
October 16, 1862.

MAJOR: In the hurry of preparing my report of the march of my command from Cumberland Gap I inadvertently neglected to refer to the meritorious services of Lieutenant-Colonel Ridgell, Third Kentucky, and Capt. Sydney S. Lyon, acting topographical engineer, which I now take pleasure in doing. Also the valuable and highly creditable services of Dr. B. Cloak, acting medical director, and the corps of surgeons under him. Their conduct was admirable and is worthy of the highest praise.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. MORGAN,
Brigadier-General.

Maj. N. H. McLEAN, Chief of Staff, Cincinnati, Ohio.

MOUNT VERNON, OHIO, June 6, 1863.

GENERAL: On the 6th of December, 1862, I wrote to you from Memphis (see Exhibit A) that the journals of that date announced that General Halleck, in his report of December 2, 1862, stated that "the alleged cause of the retreat from Cumberland Gap was the want of supplies;" but that the commanding officer had just before reported that he had "several weeks' provisions," and that "under no circumstances" would he abandon "that important post," and that an "investigation" had "been ordered."

As two months had elapsed since General Halleck had been informed of the evacuation, and as I had not been notified that an investigation had been ordered, so that I might have an opportunity of producing evidence of the facts upon which I acted, and as no intimation had been given of any dissatisfaction at Washington as to my conduct, save an anonymous telegram, which was discredited by the country, by the army, and by myself, in the exercise of the right guaranteed to every officer I demanded a prompt hearing before a court of inquiry or court-martial. To that demand, on the 20th of December, 1862, General Halleck, through Assistant Adjutant-General Kelton, replied (Exhibit B) that "Major-General Wright was directed some time since to investigate and report the facts concerning that affair," and that "if that report should be satisfactory no further proceedings" would be required, and that I would be held free from all blame.

You will observe, sir, that this assurance of General Halleck was made on the 20th of December, 1862, and that his report of general censure was made on the 2d of that month. My astonishment therefore was great when, in reply to my letter of January 6, 1863, General Wright, on the 27th of that month (Exhibit C), informed me that on the 15th of October, 1862—six weeks before General Halleck wrote his report—he, General Wright, had made his investigation and had written to General Halleck commending my policy in evacuating Cumberland Gap, and had stated that he "did not see how, with starvation staring him (Morgan) in the face and with no certainty of relief being afforded, he could have come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at." General Wright further informed General Halleck that "the evacuation was in pursuance of the unanimous opinion of the general officers of the command" (Exhibit D, record of council of war) "was a matter of necessity, arising from their provisions being exhausted, their communications cut off, and no information of any prospect of relief being received." And yet with this report of the investigation, made in accordance with his directions, and by the officer selected by himself, with this report lying before him, General Halleck published to the world that he had ordered an investigation, but suppressed the fact that the investigation had been made six weeks before the publication of his report and that any action had been fully sustained.

Although I have suffered public wrong I feel too deep an interest in the great issue for national existence now being tried on the battlefield to add a new disturbing element by making a public vindication. But I would be unworthy of the cause in the defense of which I drew my sword were I to allow any personal consideration to prevent me from placing on the record a statement of facts as set forth in this paper.

Having waited in vain for a further reply from General Halleck, on the 18th of January, 1863 (Exhibit E), I wrote to you that I had "patiently remained under the public censure of General Halleck for the period of four months, believing that time and investigation were only necessary to secure the approval of my course," and I requested to be informed "whether my conduct in the evacuation of Cumberland Gap met with the approval or disapproval of the General-in-Chief." To that communication General Halleck has not found it convenient to reply; but in his letter of February 8, 1863 (Exhibit F), in response to General Wright's letter of February 4 (Exhibit G), General Halleck says, "The facts as now presented justified General Morgan's retreat."

What facts? General Halleck possessed no facts on the 8th of February, 1863, which he did not know on the 2d of December, 1862, when he published his report. In his letter of February 4, 1863, General Wright simply reaffirmed the facts and opinions already stated by him in his official report of the investigation made October 15, 1862. And in reply to General Wright's letter of February 4, 1863, General Halleck says in his letter of February 8:

In this letter [of February 4] and your former letter [Wright's report of October 15] you fully exonerated General Morgan from all blame in abandoning Cumberland Gap. No further investigation will therefore be made.

In substance General Wright's letter of February 4, 1863, and his report of October 15, 1862, are identical, as General Halleck admits. Upon what principle then did he censure me upon the one and justify me on the other?

He expresses "regret that General Wright did not make a full and formal investigation at the time it was ordered." And yet when General Halleck penned the expression of that regret he knew that the investigation was as full and formal as it could have been made except by court of inquiry or court-martial. He says that such an investigation "was due to General Morgan as well as to General Wright and to the Government." If due to me, why did General Halleck refuse to grant me a court-martial or court of inquiry? If due to the Government, why did not General Halleck procure an order for a court of inquiry or himself order a court-martial? General Halleck ought to know that General Wright had not the power to order a court of inquiry. He (General Halleck) refused me a court and did not order one himself, but on the contrary, he directed the investigation to be made by a single officer, selected that officer himself, and at this late day he grudgingly justifies my conduct on the report of that officer.

General Halleck further says:

General Morgan represented his force as able to hold Cumberland Gap against any number of troops which the enemy could bring against him. He was almost boastful in his confidence that he could do this. On these assurances the Government believed that the post would be held by us and serve as a serious obstacle to the retreat of General Bragg's army.

General Halleck strangely confounds "force" with "subsistence." I did hold my position against a force more than four times greater than my own; the enemy completely surrounded but dared not attack me, and had not General Halleck failed to open communication between Lexington and Cumberland Gap, as he promised to do (Exhibit H), that stronghold would be ours to-day.

I had sufficient force to beat the enemy if he attacked me, but had not subsistence sufficient to keep my troops two weeks longer from starvation.

In his report of December 2 General Halleck says that just before the evacuation I reported that I had "several weeks' supplies;" but in his letter of February 8 he asserts that in a dispatch of September 11, 1862, alleged to have been written by me six days before the evacuation, I said that I had "supplies for seventy or eighty days." But in that same letter General Halleck says, "it is true that he (Morgan) stated in his dispatches that his supplies were limited."

How then does General Halleck reconcile the assertion of seventy or eighty days' supplies with his admission that I reported that my supplies were limited? He says that I so stated in my dispatch of September 11, 1862. But I deny having at any time written such a dispatch to General Halleck, General Wright, or any other officer. No such dispatch was ever written by or for me, and if any purporting to be such is in existence I denounce it as a forgery.

In my official report of October 10, 1862, to General Wright (Exhibit I) I said:

On the 9th of September (Exhibit J) I addressed a letter to Major-General Wright by one of my aides-de-camp, with a verbal message, that by eating mules we could hold out sixty days (Exhibit K, statement of aide). But on the 12th of September the able and energetic division quartermaster informed me that it was impossible longer to feed the mules, and suggested that they should be sent to the Ohio River.

I further stated that my troops had been six days without bread, and that De Courcy had failed to obtain the hoped-for supplies at Manchester.

These facts were all before General Halleck while he was writing his report of December 2, for which he so ungracefully apologizes in his letter to General Wright of February 8, 1863.

General Halleck further says:

Had his (Morgan's) true condition been known measures might have been taken to relieve him.

Does General Halleck mean to say that he did not do all he was able to do at Big Hill, Richmond, and Lexington? Does he admit that he did not cause Bragg and Smith to be driven from Kentucky at the earliest possible moment? If so, then it is certain that General Halleck is responsible for the loss of Cumberland Gap, for the enemy maintained his position 100 miles north of Cumberland Ford until more than two months after my troops had been starved out of Cumberland Gap.

However ill-informed General Halleck may have been as to the general theater of operations, I propose to prove that he had no excuse for being ignorant of the condition of my command. He had been duly notified that my division was surrounded on the barren summit of the Cumberland Mountains; that Stevenson was in my immediate front with a force much larger than my own; that Bragg was on my right flank with a vast army; that Kirby Smith had gained my rear with a force three times greater than mine, and that Marshall occupied the sterile region to the north between the Gap and the Ohio River. He had been further informed by my official report of the capture of that stronghold, dated June 22, 1862, that—

While at Cumberland Ford I was compelled to haul forage for my animals (Exhibit L) a distance of 90 miles; and that during the months of April and May the roads were so bad that a train of ten wagons could only advance 3 or 4 miles per day.

That on the 30th of June, 1862, I telegraphed to Lieutenant-Colonel

Swords, assistant quartermaster-general, "We are in want of everything; we are destitute of forage."

That on the 21st of July, 1862, Chief Engineer Craighill, detailed for service at the Gap from the Regular Army, telegraphed to Brigadier-General Totten at Washington City, "The country in our rear is exhausted; that in our front soon will be."

That on the 23d of July I telegraphed to the Secretary of War and to General Buell, "My supplies are very short."

That on the 29th of July, in my letter of instructions to Chief Engineer Craighill, about to proceed to General Halleck's headquarters, I stated that "East Tennessee and Kentucky to the blue-grass region are exhausted." (The former had been ravaged by the enemy.)

That on the 10th of August I telegraphed to the Secretary of War and to General Buell, "I have about three weeks' supplies."

That on the 16th of August I telegraphed to the Secretary of War and to General Buell, "Smith cannot possibly remain three weeks in my rear, while I can hold this place five weeks with my present command." (I did hold the Gap four weeks and five days from the date of that dispatch.)

That on the 19th of August I telegraphed General Halleck that "150 wagons laden with forage and subsistence have arrived." Those supplies were principally of forage, which had been hauled over 100 miles, and as the teams had to be fed while on the road from the wagons the amount was greatly reduced.

Here then is the proof that General Halleck was informed of my true condition, and that if he had the means to have given me relief, as he says he "might have done," he is beyond all doubt responsible for the loss of Cumberland Gap.

General Halleck says that "the Government believed that Cumberland Gap would form a serious obstacle to the retreat of the enemy." If the administration so believed it was the duty of General Halleck to have corrected so erroneous an impression. He was aware that I had invaded East Tennessee in June, 1862, through two other gaps, and that Kirby Smith had invaded Kentucky by the same routes during the August following. Hence, even had General Halleck furnished me with supplies, as he says he might have done, the forces of Bragg and Smith would have retreated by two or three roads instead of by one.

It was not by my order that Kentucky was denuded of troops nor through my neglect that Rogers' and Big Creek Gaps were left invitingly open to invasion. In obedience to instructions from the Secretary of War I kept him advised of my movements, and on the 11th of May, 1862, and twice afterward, I suggested the importance of protecting the lines of communication between Louisville and Nashville and between Lexington and Cumberland Ford; and afterward I strongly recommended the occupation of the last-named gaps. But neither gap was occupied and both lines were left unprotected; the cavalry I had repeatedly asked for was not furnished me, and the natural results of the weakened and exposed condition of Kentucky were the raids of John Morgan and the invasions by Smith and Bragg.

Regarding the occupation of East Tennessee as of vital importance, in vain I made every effort to have a rail or other good military road constructed to Cumberland Gap, from thence to be extended to intersect the great road from Richmond which connects East Tennessee with Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi.

East Tennessee is overwhelmingly devoted to the Union, and with proper cultivation is capable of feeding its own population and an army of 150,000 men Once in our possession the rebels would be compelled to evacuate Virginia, for they would be cut off from their only practicable route to the Gulf States, and have lost the vast supplies, upon which they so much depend, from Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas.

Three times I earnestly requested to be allowed to advance upon Knoxville, and pledged myself to sweep East Tennessee from Bristol to Chattanooga. I had surplus arms for six additional regiments of patriotic Tennesseans. I could have destroyed all communication with Virginia until Buell could have advanced from the Southwest, but I was ordered not to act on the offensive, and Buell was not allowed to attack Bragg near Chattanooga while I advanced against Kirby Smith upon Knoxville. Had not these plans been interfered with the invasion of Kentucky would not have taken place and East Tennessee and Cumberland Gap would be in our possession to-day.

General Halleck complains that I was "almost boastful" in my confidence "that I could hold my position against any number of troops which the enemy could bring against me." There was a stern necessity for a tone of confidence upon my part, for I had reason to know that there was panic from Washington to Louisville. And although cut off from supplies and threatened by a force vastly greater than my own my command maintained a "boastful confidence" and sought to inspire at least a moderate degree elsewhere. In answer to an official telegram I said:

I am surprised to hear that there is consternation at Louisville or elsewhere. Here (Cumberland Gap) all is quiet and orderly. We are prepared for the enemy whenever he may show himself.

The enemy did show himself and the result proved that we were ready to receive him. During the thirty-two days that we were invested we captured over 500 officers and soldiers, making an equivalent of 542 privates, and killed or wounded 170, making an aggregate loss of over 700 on his part against a loss of less than 40 on our side. These facts were duly reported.

On the 19th of August I telegraphed to General Halleck:

This position shall not be yielded while we have a pound of meat or an ounce of powder. But I trust that the road may soon be opened by a column from Lexington.

General Halleck replied:

I will see that you are very soon re-enforced.

His promises only resulted in defeat and disaster to our arms. On the 19th of August his re-enforcements were driven from Big Hill; on the 30th of the same month they were routed at Richmond, and on the 2d of September in hot haste he abandoned Lexington and Frankfort, and retreated to Covington and Louisville; and Bragg maintained his position in the blue-grass region, more than 100 miles this side of Cumberland Gap, for more than two months after General Halleck promised his speedy re-enforcements.

Inasmuch as my advance against Cumberland Gap has been made a subject of investigation before the Buell Commission, and as I have not been summoned as a witness, it is proper that I should here state a few facts, some of which were unknown to me when my official report was written.

My camp at Cumberland Ford was 14 miles north of the Gap, and to reach the Gap in front was a six hours' march. But to turn it by a flank movement by way of Big Creek Gap required from my position an almost impracticable march of ten or twelve days over a distance of 95 miles. To deceive the enemy as to my intention I advanced in two columns, one passing the mountains at Rogers' and the other by Big Creek Gap, thus threatening at the same time Cumberland Gap, 19 miles east of Rogers', Knoxville, 45 miles south of Rogers', and Clinton, about 20 miles south of Big Creek Gap. Clinton was a base of supplies for the enemy.

Before advancing from the ford I informed General Buell that Smith's force was three times greater than my own, and requested that a diversion should be made in my favor against Chattanooga. My request was complied with, and Smith believed the feint to be an attack, and recalled Barton from Big Creek Gap, and with 12,000 men started to the relief of Chattanooga. But when Smith reached London he received a telegram stating that East Tennessee was being invaded by two columns. This recalled to him a ruse rumor which I had several weeks previously caused to be circulated of my intention to attack the Gap in front with 12,000 men, while at the same time I would advance by a flank movement with two columns into East Tennessee.

On the 16th of June I learned that Smith and Barton were advancing to attack me (Exhibit N), but it was not until a week or ten days after our occupation of the Gap that I learned fully of the disposition of Smith's forces. He left Stevenson with 6,000 men to defend Cumberland Gap, sent Barton with 4,000 men to the Big Valley to observe the approach to Knoxville by the Rogers' Gap road, while with 8,000 men he took position at Clinton.

Smith's disposition of his troops indicates his belief that I intended to advance upon Knoxville, and he hoped to meet me with his forces concentrated. My order of march (Exhibit O), shows that I anticipated his plan and was prepared for him, and my rapid advance upon Stevenson foiled the execution of his design, and Cumberland Gap was thus captured without the loss of a man.

General Buell knew that I was maneuvering against a force three times greater than my own, and this explains his anxiety for the safety of my command.

Upon assuming command at Cumberland Gap I adopted a conciliatory policy (Exhibits P and Q), and the citizens of the adjoining counties of Virginia and Tennessee flocked in to resume their allegiance to the United States.

GEORGE W. MORGAN,

commanding general; Brigadier-General Spears, commanding First Brigade; Brig. Gen. A. Baird, commanding Second Brigade; Brigadier-General Carter, commanding Third Brigade. The brigade of De Courcy (Fourth) absent on detached service.

The proceedings were opened by General Morgan, stating in detail the information in his possession relative to the positions and numbers of the Union and rebel forces in Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and as to the probabilities of succor both in force and supplies reaching this post, and of the condition of the force as to supplies of food, clothing, and ammunition.

General Morgan stated that the council was convened to consider the question of remaining here or evacuating the position, and that he should be governed, as far as that question was concerned, by the decision of the council. After a free interchange of opinion it was agreed unanimously that in view of all the circumstances of the case the position should be evacuated.

LORENZO THOMAS, Adjutant-General U. S. Army:

SIR: I trust that I shall be pardoned for again requesting the attention of the general-in-chief to the subject of the evacuation of Cumberland Gap. Four months have elapsed since that event, and I have respectfully and patiently remained under the implied censure of the general-in-chief, believing that time and investigation were only necessary to secure the approval of my course. In the communication I had the honor to receive from your department in December, 1862, I was informed that the investigation of the subject had been committed to Major-General Wright, whose report would be final.

My reputation is my only fortune; it belongs to my children, and a sense of duty to them, to the service, and myself induces me to respectfully request to be informed whether General Wright has yet made his report, and whether my conduct in the evacuation of Cumberland Gap meets with the approval or disapproval of the general-in-chief.

Brigadier-General.

Respectfully forwarded through the headquarters of Major-General McClelland,

EXHIBIT F.

HDQRS. OF THE ARMY, *Washington, D. C., Feb. 8, 1863.*Major-General WRIGHT, Cincinnati, Ohio:

GENERAL: Your letter of the 4th instant [following] is just received. In this and your former letter you fully exonerate Brig. Gen. G. W. Morgan from all blame in abandoning Cumberland Gap. No further investigation will therefore be made. It however is to be regretted that you did not make a full and formal investigation at the time it was ordered. This was due to General Morgan as well as to yourself and to the Government.

All of your reports, as well as those received from General Morgan, almost to the day of his abandoning his post, represented his force as able to hold it against any number of troops which the enemy could bring against him. He was almost boastful in his confidence of his being able to do this. On these assurances the Government believed that the post would be held by us, and serve as a serious obstacle to the retreat of General Bragg's army. Great disappointment was therefore felt at learning that so important a point had been abandoned at a most critical moment in the campaign.

It appears now from your letters and from General Morgan's report that he was forced to abandon Cumberland Gap for want of supplies. It is true that he had stated in his dispatches that his supplies were limited and that he was collecting all he could from the surrounding country, but he did not intimate that they were so short as to compel him to abandon his post. On the contrary, in your dispatch to me of September the 18th you report that in his dispatch of September 11 he says he has supplies for from seventy to eighty days and feels secure. It now appears from his report that he had actually abandoned his post for want of supplies before the above dispatch was received here.

There is but one way of accounting for this discrepancy between the dispatches and the report—that the former were purposely made incorrect in order to deceive the enemy, if intercepted, in regard to General Morgan's real condition. They certainly deceived our Government. Had his true condition been known it is possible that measures could have been taken in time to relieve him. Seventy or eighty days' supplies on hand on the 11th day of September would have served him till near the end of December, before which time he was very certain to be relieved by you or by the army of General Buell.

The facts as now presented justified General Morgan's retreat, but the facts as understood by the War Department at the time, derived from his dispatches, furnished no possible justification for his abandoning Cumberland Gap in the middle of September. If the opinion of the Department was unjust toward General Morgan it was due entirely to incorrect information derived from his dispatches.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

Brig. Gen. G. W. CULLUM, &c.:

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the dispatch of the general-in-chief of this date, saying that I had been "directed some time ago to investigate and report upon the conduct of Brig. Gen. Morgan in evacuating Cumberland Gap" and that "no report has yet been received."

Soon after the command of General Morgan reached the Ohio River I saw and conversed with many of the higher officers of the command in regard to the circumstances attending the evacuation, and was satisfied, even before General Morgan's official report came to hand, that the course adopted by him was one of unavoidable necessity. This I stated in my letter of the 15th October last, transmitting the report of General Morgan, and I considered this report as being all that I was called upon to furnish, being satisfied myself of the propriety and actual necessity of the evacuation of the Gap. I conceived that report to be conclusive, unless the commanding general desired some further investigation.

I would further remark that subsequent statements of officers of General Morgan's command have confirmed the correctness of the opinion expressed in my letter of October 15, above referred to, and have satisfied me that he could not have held out more than twenty days longer at the utmost, and then only on much reduced rations, with no provisions with which to subsist his troops on the march, and with a loss of animals meanwhile for want of forage, which would have compelled him to abandon his artillery and wagons.

No formal investigation was instituted, because I did not conceive it to be called for by the general-in-chief or to be necessary.

Referring to my letter of October 15 and General Morgan's report, transmitted therewith for further information, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,

Statement of Lieut. Charles S. Medary, Third U. S. Artillery, Aide-de-Camp, relative to his interview with Maj. Gen. H. G. Wright, at Cincinnati, Ohio, September 18, 1862.

On the 10th of September, 1862, I left Cumberland Gap as bearer of a dispatch dated September 9, 1862, from General Morgan to Major-General Wright, commanding the Department of the Ohio.

Colonel De Courcy, with his brigade of four regiments, had been sent by General Morgan with a large wagon train to collect supplies of bacon and flour at Manchester. On the night of the 11th I reached that place, and was informed by Colonel De Courcy that General Morgan had been misinformed as to the provisions which could be there obtained; that very little bacon could be had, and that his brigade consumed three-quarters of all the flour that could be ground at the mill, and that he had collected all that could be obtained.

To guard against the loss of the dispatch in the event of my being captured I made an abstract of General Morgan's dispatch, and then delivered the dispatch to a Union citizen, who promised to send it to General Wright, which was done, and the dispatch safely reached him two or three days after my arrival.

I reached Cincinnati on the evening of the 17th of September, and on the day following I had an interview with General Wright. I delivered to him a copy of my abstract of General Morgan's report, and informed him that I had been instructed to communicate certain facts to him not contained in the dispatch, which were substantially as follows:

That there was an effective force of between 7,000 and 8,000 men at the Gap; that Garrard had been sent with a force to join General Nelson at Lexington; that there were in all thirty guns, among which were four 30 and six 20 pounders (Parrotts), and that there was a large supply of ammunition; that the troops at the Gap had been on half rations for three weeks and had been without flour or bread for a week prior to the date of the dispatch; that General Morgan had sent De Courcy's brigade to Manchester, where he hoped to obtain considerable supplies of flour and bacon, upon which he depended; that if he succeeded in obtaining those supplies General Morgan thought he might hold out sixty days.

I then remarked to General Wright that, in my own opinion, after learning that Colonel De Courcy had failed to obtain the anticipated supplies, I did not think that General Morgan could hold out over twenty or thirty days from the time I left the Gap even if the soldiers used the mules as food. And I should here state that when General Morgan spoke of holding out sixty days he said that he would kill the mules for food if necessary; but I do not recollect whether I mentioned that fact to General Wright or not.

Having finished the foregoing verbal statement, General Wright requested me to make a memorandum of the facts I had stated. I made a brief memorandum, in which I also gave the position and strength of Kirby Smith, Stevenson, and Humphrey Marshall, but it was not so full as the verbal statement.

WASHINGTON, June 22, 1862.

Brigadier-General MORGAN:

This Department has been highly gratified with your successful occupation of Cumberland Gap, and commends the gallant conduct and labors of your officers and troops, to whom you will express the thanks of the President and this Department. Cumberland Gap is regarded as a strategic point of great importance, which, unless you have orders from your commanding officer, this Department will consider you well employed in holding and strengthening that position so that the enemy can by no chance recover his position. I have been striving ever since receiving the intelligence of your success to aid and send you a skillful officer of the Engineer Department to place and construct the necessary works. That has delayed my communication to you. The great demand in this quarter has absorbed the whole engineer force, but tomorrow I hope to send you an officer highly recommended by General Totten for his professional skill. It is out of the power of this Department to supply you at present with any cavalry for offensive operations, and as your force for some time can be advantageously employed defensively in its present position, I trust you will not need it.

With thanks for your diligence and activity, I remain, yours, truly,

It has been with mortification and regret that the general commanding has learned that outrages have been committed upon private property of citizens, some of whom are loyal to the Union, by a few bad men, who have disgraced their uniforms by their unsoldier-like conduct.

Private citizens and private property must be respected, and the honor of our flag and of the brave men who are ready to die beneath its folds shall not be sullied by a handful of desperadoes who have crept into the ranks of the army, and if any such act is committed after this order has become promulgated and known the perpetrator of the outrage shall suffer the penalty of death, as prescribed by the Rules and Articles of War.

Report of Maj. Gen. John P. McCown, C. S. Army, commanding Department of East Tennessee, of the evacuation of Cumberland Gap.

HEADQUARTERS. DEPARTMENT OF EAST TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, Tenn., September 22, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that the enemy evacuated Cumberland Gap in the night of the 17th instant, blowing up his magazines and destroying small-arms and stores in large quantities. He left six pieces of artillery, including two 4½-inch Parrotts, which were rendered unfit for service.

General Stevenson's advance started in pursuit on the morning of the 18th. Owing to the absence of his supply train the rear guard did not move until the morning of 20th. Colonel [H. W.] Hilliard's legion and a regiment of infantry are now garrisoning the Gap. Enemy reported yesterday at Manchester. Stevenson close by.

COLONEL: I have the honor to report my arrival here between 1 and 2 o'clock this p. m. I took about 200 prisoners, sick and well; have the well ones in my column, nearly 100. Took some 10 or 12 officers; had them paroled. Captured 5 wagons loaded with flour; a number of arms, &c. I learn from citizens, especially the editor here, that six divisions of the rebel army have passed northward to Green River and, as they suppose, to Louisville. The divisions are as follows: Generals Withers', Cheatham's, Hardee's, Buckner's, Anderson's, and Brown's, altogether estimated at 45,000 men, with about eighty pieces light artillery, mostly 10 and 12 pounders.

General Bragg left here on Tuesday morning. They expect Breckinridge in to-morrow with a division numbering about 6,000. I sent out detachments on the pikes leading to Cumberland and Tompkinsville and other points. They returned without having made any discoveries. It is rumored that General Price is at Hopkinsville with his forces. I am getting my column in motion for Prewitt's Knob.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEWIS ZAHM,
Second Cavalry Brigade.

Col. J. B. FRY.

I also captured a mail, which I send with this.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1862.—Skirmish near Snow's Pond, Ky.

Report of Brig. Gen. Quincy A. Gillmore, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Snow's Pond, Lexington Pike, Ky., September 25, 1862.

SIR: Your two letters of to-day are received.

I have to report an attack on my lines this morning at 11 o'clock by over 500 rebel cavalry, with one field piece. They made a sudden dash on the pickets from the direction of California, capturing several small posts. Fifty men are missing, but I am in hopes that some of them will make their appearance. They disappeared (as suddenly as they came up) toward Crittenden. I learned their number from parties who met them on the Crittenden road. It is doubtless the identical party that I have heard of before, numbering 508.

I am gratified that more cavalry are coming, and I wish they were here now. It is next to impossible to resist these sudden dashes with infantry, and my pickets will be in constant danger of being driven in unless I have enough mounted force to scour the country for miles around.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

HDQRS. U. S. FORCES, Maysville, Ky., Sept. 29, 1862.

SIR: About dusk on the evening of the 27th instant a special messenger brought me the intelligence from Ripley that Col. Basil W.

Duke, with about 750 of John Morgan's gang of rebels and two small pieces of artillery, had attacked Colonel Bradford's command at Augusta, 18 miles below this place, and, after a most desperate resistance on the part of Colonel Bradford and his men, had succeeded in capturing Colonel Bradford and his entire force. I immediately assembled all the available force at my command, being 325 infantry and one 6-pounder piece of artillery, and sent them, under command of the Hon. William H. Wadsworth, to Germantown, 12 miles distant from Maysville. I also dispatched a courier after 100 cavalry (the only mounted force I had) that I had sent to Flemingsburg, about 2 o'clock that afternoon, to capture or drive off a rebel recruiting party and some of Humphrey Marshall's cavalry, which were there. I instructed Colonel Wadsworth to reach Germantown before daylight and remain there until I could arrive with re-enforcements. In the mean time a boat had been sent up the river about 8 miles to bring down a body of Home Guards to take possession of Maysville and repel any attempt that I feared might be made to make a raid on that place in my absence. I then took a boat and went to Ripley, where I found 175 of the armed and organized militia and one smooth-bore 6-pounder field piece. I appointed Lieutenant-Colonel Edwards, of the Militia, commander of this force, and immediately crossed the Ohio to Dover, and started with them to Germantown, 11 miles distant, where we arrived a little after daylight. I ordered Col. E. Grand Girard, of Ripley, to procure provisions for my men, and after collecting all the force he could to press on after me.

Colonel Wadsworth had reached Germantown before daylight. He had posted pickets on all the roads and had taken every necessary precaution to aid my design of surprising the enemy. My original design was to march down from Germantown to Augusta, having ascertained that a march of only 3 miles from Germantown in that direction would bring me completely in the rear of the enemy and render a successful retreat on his part quite improbable, my design being, however, to surprise him at Augusta; but some scouts that Colonel Wadsworth sent out brought in the intelligence that Colonel Duke, after burning the best part of the town of Augusta, had retired in the direction of Brookville, and had probably reached that place before midnight. I at once set out for Brookville, 7 miles distant from Germantown, and was overtaken on the way by the cavalry from Flemingsburg, which had then marched since 2 o'clock the preceding evening more than 60 miles. I arrived within three-quarters of a mile from Brookville about 8 a. m., when I halted and ordered Captain Youart, commanding detachment of the Forty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, to proceed by a circuitous route and take possession of the Falmouth road, concealing himself from the view of the enemy. I did this, being well assured that the enemy would retreat on that road. Captain Youart had just started when Judge Bush, who had been sent with his cavalry to the heights to reconnoiter, informed me that the enemy was forming in line of battle. I was then satisfied that the enemy had notice of our approach, and my principal force being militia and undrilled recruits, and knowing that the enemy outnumbered me, I thought it imprudent to divide my force, and countermanded my order to Captain Youart. It was very unfortunate that I did so. The truth was that the enemy had no notice of my presence, and had formed his line with the view of marching out on the Falmouth road. This was detected upon my arrival at the heights overlooking the town. It was then too late to take possession of the Falmouth road, and I could not, from any position on that side of the town, play on the rebels with artillery. I therefore ordered my detachment of the Forty-fourth Ohio Volunteers to charge at double-quick time down into the town, and I ordered the artillery and the remainder of my force to follow them promptly at quick-time. This was the first notice that Colonel Duke had of our presence. He, with a guard of 25 men, was in the court-house at that moment, and he was paroling prisoners. Some of my cavalry, seeing the Forty-fourth running into town, became excited, and imprudently and without orders rushed in advance of the Forty-fourth down a road leading to the rear of the court-house. Colonel Duke rushed out, mounted his men, and dashed off on the Falmouth road, passing within 25 yards of my detachment of the Forty-fourth Ohio, which mistook them for our own men, who had charged around the court-house. They were dressed very much as our own cavalry. I felt greatly annoyed, but under the circumstances I could not censure the men for not firing on them. We pressed to the other side of the town, and perceiving that the main body had halted about half a mile distant on hearing the alarm, I ordered the artillery into position and commenced shelling them. The third shot exploded in their midst, killing 6 and wounding 1, when they retreated precipitately toward Falmouth and were soon out of the range of our cannon. Between 30 and 40 prisoners were released that Duke did not have time to parole. Some of them rushed out and fled, and I do not know the precise number thus released.

Our loss was 1 killed. He belonged to the Fourteenth Kentucky Cavalry. He was shot from an alley, I think, by a citizen of Brookville about the same time Colonel Duke escaped from the court-house.

At noon we started for Augusta, 9 miles distant, and were overtaken by two wagon loads of provisions and 100 more men, under Colonel Grand-Girard. We reached Augusta before sundown, where boats were procured, and we arrived at this post the same night before 9 o'clock.

I do not think men could be found who will bear up with more fortitude under privation, hunger, and a most fatiguing march than did all the men on this occasion. Col. Charles A. Marshall, Hon. William H. Wadsworth, and Judge Bush, of Maysville; Colonel Edwards and Colonel Grand-Girard, of Ripley, volunteered to accompany me, and I feel under great obligations to them for the part taken by each. More than half of my command were citizens, but all marched and behaved like veteran troops, excepting on the occasion when the cavalry charged without orders, and their zeal and eagerness deprived us of Colonel Duke and 25 of his men. They made, however, a most handsome dash.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. B. WILSON,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding Post.

Maj. N. H. McLEAN,

Asst. Adjt. Gen. and Chief of Staff, Dept. of the Ohio.

No. 2.

Report of Capt. A. D. Wilson, master of gunboat Allen Collyer, of skirmish at Augusta.

GUNBOAT ALLEN COLLYER,
Off Foster, September 27, 1862—p. m.

DEAR SIR: I went up to Augusta to get some ammunition from the Belfast. Was there at 12 m. While there the Florence Miller passed down. Colonel Bradford sent a note requesting me to stay, as he expected an attack before night. About an hour after the Florence Miller came back, blowing her whistle. I then started down the river, and when I met her I understood them to say that the rebels were crossing the river at Chilo. I hurried down and found that it was a party of scouts that went out from Augusta yesterday and were returning. I hurried back as soon as possible, and found that the rebels had attacked Augusta with artillery, compelling Colonel Bradford to surrender, burning the town, the Belfast and Florence Miller going up the river.

Had it not have been for the blowing of the Miller's whistle and the misunderstanding of information I would have been there and assisted the Belfast. I have returned to watch the part of the river assigned to me.

Yours, truly,

A. D. WILSON,
Master.

Capt. JOHN A. DUBLE.

I understand that the rebels are 1,000 strong, with three pieces of artillery.

The Belfast and Miller are above Augusta, and I do not think can run by the guns planted on the hill back of town. I went within one mile of town, and did not think I could do any good attacking them, as Colonel Bradford and men were prisoners.

A. D. WILSON.

No. 3.

Report of Joseph Doniphan, of skirmish at Augusta.

AUGUSTA, KY., [September 28, 1862].

SIR: On Saturday, about 12 o'clock m., Colonel Bradford received intelligence of the approach of between 400 and 500 rebels, under command of Basil Duke. The colonel immediately prepared to defend the town, his force consisting of about 100 Home Guards and militia, and the gunboat Belfast, Captain Sedam commanding.

About 1 o'clock the gunboat Allen Collyer moored alongside the Belfast, and Colonel Bradford dispatched a messenger to the Collyer, requesting her to remain, as we would certainly be attacked by 2 o'clock.

A few moments later the Florence Miller, carrying a gun, came along and anchored in front of our town.

Colonel Bradford then posted his men in the houses along Front street and up Pine street to Second. The enemy in the mean time had reached the hill back of the town and were rapidly surrounding us. Hardly had our forces gotten their positions when the rebels with two small pieces of artillery appeared on the hill. The Belfast threw a shell, and so well was it aimed that it struck within 30 feet of the enemy's gun, killing 2 or 3 of the rebels, and causing them to change the position of their gun. The enemy then opened fire, throwing shell with little or no accuracy, and the Belfast fired two more shots with good effect.

Up to this time the forces in the houses were not engaged; but, to the surprise and sorrow of our people, the Belfast weighed anchor and abandoned us to our fate. The Florence Miller, without firing a gun, did the same thing. The Allen Collyer, although importuned to stay with us, steamed off before the fight and never returned.

Then came a shout from the rebels and they were upon us. From every window our true and trusty boys were firing, and for one-half hour the leaden hail was doing its work of death. Rebel after rebel was made to bite the dust, while our boys thus sheltered were fighting for their homes and firesides.

But what a scene now followed! The houses in which our forces were in were set on fire; the cannon of the enemy was planted in our streets, and, disregarding women or children, they were firing shell into the houses. Yet true to their work, the little band of Union men fought on until it was useless to try to hold out longer.

Colonel Bradford ordered a surrender. So soon as this was done then commenced the pillage and plunder, every rebel acting for himself. Stores were broken open and rifled of what was wanted by the rebels. This, however, was soon over. The rebel bugle was sounded, and the enemy retired from our town in good order, though in haste.

The fighting was desperate, and although our loss is small, yet gallant and brave men have gone from us forever. Our killed and wounded amount to 12 or 15, while that of the enemy number between 75 and 100; among them some 8 or 10 officers. We had no means of ascertaining the names of all the rebels killed and wounded, but among the number wounded mortally is a son of George D. Prentice, of Louisville. Capt. W. Rogers, of Harrison County, was killed, and a Lieutenant Wilson. The rebels left some of their dead and wounded in our hands, all of whom have been properly cared for. They took our horses, buggies, wagons, and all means of transportation to carry off their dead and wounded.

Among the killed on the Union side was Dr. W. Taylor, N. B. Worthington, John B. Story, George Byers, Oliver Stairs, John Gephart, John Perkins, and W. Gregg.

The prisoners were all taken from town as rapidly as they could march. Some have been paroled and returned home.

The conduct of the gunboats seems to us as cowardly in the extreme. Just above our town is a large sand bar, and so soon as the rebels could cross the bottom they ran out on this bar 100 or 150 strong, drew up in line of battle, and fired volley after volley at the Belfast and Florence Miller, and not one shot was fired in return. With one fire of grape the whole horde of rebels could have been mowed down; but the gallant commanders fled, fled! Ay, and when they got to Higginsport actually hauled their cannon ashore and moved off up the river with their boats.

Much of our town is destroyed; the loss will reach $100,000. The principal sufferers are Thomas Myers, J. B. Ryan, W. D. Diltz, W. P. Taylor, Mrs. Hooke, T. F. Marshall, V. Meldin, J. T. McKibben, and Mrs. Barr.

The Confederate forces are a battalion of Morgan's. Colonel Bradford, Colonel Harris, and F. L. Cleaveland, esq., are still in the hands of the enemy.

On yesterday Colonel Wilson and Colonel Wadsworth, commanding the forces from Maysville, Ripley, &c., passed on to Brookville in the effort to overtake the rebels, but were there only in time to fall upon their rear guard, they having retreated in great haste in the direction of Falmouth.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH DONIPHAN.

Report of Col. John Kennett, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, commanding Cavalry Division.

ELIZABETHTOWN, KY.,
 September 29, 1862.

COLONEL: A courier from Colonel Zahm having arrived this evening I have the honor of inclosing it. By this morning's dispatch I acquainted you with the victory part of my command achieved over the Third Georgia Cavalry, having surprised them at break of day, surrounded them, and captured the entire regiment, without the loss of a man or firing a single shot. We have their horses—poor stock—and arms. I sent them in to you as prisoners. I could not take time to parole them, and I hurried them away to secure so signal a victory, anticipating an attack to rescue them and being absorbed with field preparations for our enemies. We are surrounded by heavy bodies of cavalry, and we should have a section of artillery, with a portion of infantry.

Colonel Zahm being detained we will await his safe arrival and then leave, unless otherwise ordered. Telegraph line cut yesterday at noon. Our horses are saddled nightly; we sleep on our arms, and will be drawn up in the order of battle to-morrow morning by 4 o'clock. Such are our precautions to prevent surprise.

Not a word from you since we have been here. All quiet to-night.

Your obedient servant,

JNO. KENNETT,
Colonel, Commanding Cavalry Division.

Col. J. B. FRY.

Report of Col. Edward M. McCook, Second Indiana Cavalry, commanding First Cavalry Brigade.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CAVALRY BRIGADE,
 Elizabethtown, Ky., September 30, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that a detachment of my brigade, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, Second Indiana Cavalry, surprised and captured the Third Georgia Regiment of Cavalry, with their arms, equipments, and horses. All of their field officers and staff officers were taken with the regiment.

From the information gained I learn that the enemy's infantry and artillery are within 3 miles of where this force was taken. They have some 25,000 or 30,000 bushels of wheat at mills in that vicinity, being ground for the use of the army, and I suppose the enemy's force is left there for the purpose of protecting this.

Citizens of the neighborhood say there is one brigade of infantry and one of cavalry and three pieces of artillery between New Haven and Bardstown. Their object in concentrating this force seems to be to protect these mills.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK,
Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

Colonel KENNETT.

Findings of General Court-Martial in case of Col. Martin J. Crawford, Third Georgia Cavalry.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT No. 2,
No. 160. } Murfreesborough, Tenn., December 26, 1862.

I. At a general court-martial, convened at Murfreesborough, Tenn., December 15, 1862, in pursuance of Special Orders, No. 60, from these headquarters, and of which Maj. Gen. J. M. Withers, Provisional Army of the Confederate States, is president, was arraigned and tried Col. M. J. Crawford, Third Georgia Cavalry, on the following charge and specifications:

CHARGE—Conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

Specification 1.—In this, that he, Martin J. Crawford, colonel Third Georgia Cavalry, being in command of a portion of his regiment at New Haven, Ky., did allow the enemy to surprise and capture his command. This at New Haven, Ky., on or about September 29.

Specification 2.—In this, that he, the said Martin J. Crawford, colonel Third Georgia Cavalry, being in command of a portion of his regiment at New Haven, Ky., did surrender his command to the enemy without offering them any resistance whatever. This at New Haven, Ky., on or about September 29.

To which charge and specifications the accused pleaded as follows:

To 1st specification, not guilty.

To 2d specification, the accused admitted that he surrendered his command to the enemy without offering them any resistance, but denied that there was any criminal or improper conduct on his part in so acting.

To the charge, not guilty.

FINDING AND SENTENCE.

The court, after mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, finds the accused as follows:

Of the 1st specification to charge, guilty.

Of the 2d specification to charge, not guilty.

Of the charge, guilty.

The court do therefore sentence the said Col. Martin J. Crawford, Third Georgia Cavalry, to three months' suspension from rank and pay and to be reprimanded in orders by the general commanding.

II. The proceedings, finding, and sentence in the foregoing case are approved. To an intelligent, conscientious, and patriotic officer like Colonel Crawford no reprimand can add to the sting of a conviction and sentence on such a charge. The neglect of duty by which an outpost is surprised and captured not only involves the officer and his immediate command, but the very safety of the army, which is reposing on confidence misplaced and undeserved. Tending to the same result it is second only in criminality to a willful betrayal of a sacred trust, involving the safety of the country. Colonel Crawford will report his address monthly during his suspension to these headquarters.

III. The general court-martial of which Maj. Gen. J. M. Withers, Provisional Army of the Confederate States, is president, is dissolved.

By command of General Bragg:

GEO. G. GARNER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1862.—Skirmishes at Russellville and Glasgow, Ky.

Report of Col. Sanders D. Bruce, Twentieth Kentucky Infantry.

BOWLING GREEN, KY., [October 1], 1862.

GENERAL: Rebels burnt bridge at Black Lick, near Auburn, Monday night. I sent Seventieth Indiana and part of Eighth Kentucky down, rebuilt the bridge, surprised the enemy at Russellville, and routed them completely, killing and wounding 50, taking 15 prisoners and 40 horses and saddles. Also routed party at Glasgow yesterday, taking 10 prisoners; among them Lieutenant-Colonel Crews, Capt. J. M. Brown, and Lieutenant Thomas. One of prisoners has pass from General Bragg directed to General Breckinridge at Chattanooga, showing that he was expected in that direction.

No enemy in force near here; small parties stealing horses through the country. I intend to whip them all out.

S. D. BRUCE,
Colonel, Commanding.

General J. T. BOYLE.

OCTOBER 3, 1862.—Skirmish at Cedar Church, near Shepherdsville, Ky.

Report of Col. Minor Milliken, First Ohio Cavalry.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST OHIO CAVALRY,
Camp at Shepherdsville, Ky., October 3, 1862.

CAPTAIN: Agreeably to instructions received from the general commanding the division I crossed the river this morning, and proceeded on the road to Bardstown until I came to Cedar Church, 5 miles from this point. A body of the enemy had encamped there last evening. I here turned to the right, proceeded a mile and returned, and took the road to Woodbridge, proceeding on it $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and returned. When I had proceeded a mile a lad met me, who lived on the Bardstown road, who told me a squad of cavalry had followed us back toward the church. I immediately sent a company across the country to intercept their return and pushed on to the church. I had been there but a moment and was endeavoring to find which road they had gone on when my intercepting party opened fire. I hurried to them and found them driving the enemy toward us. I formed one company in the road and, letting down the fence, placed a company on their left flank. When they came up resistance was impossible. They threw down their arms and surrendered.

We took 2 captains (Gray and Conner), 1 second lieutenant (Young), 19 privates and non-commissioned officers, 22 horses, some of them good; 23 stand of arms, shot-guns, sabers, and carbines, and 22 sets of horse equipments, good. We lost nothing and fired but a few shots. The troops were of Colonel Lay's (Tennessee) regiment.

The prisoners have already given you the only information my reconnaissance revealed.

The officers' horses I have returned to them. The horses and horse equipments I have taken up on my return as captured property. The arms are at your disposal.

I am, very truly, your obedient servant,

MINOR MILLIKEN,
Colonel First Ohio Cavalry.

Capt. WILLIAM KESLEY,
Asst. Adjt. Gen., First Div., Third Corps, Army of the Ohio.

P. S.—My force was Companies B, D, and G, First Battalion, numbering about 100 men.

OCTOBER 4, 1862.—Skirmish near Bardstown, Ky.

Report of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS, Bardstown, October 4, 1862.

GENERAL: Bardstown is in our possession, after a pretty sharp skirmish of our advance cavalry with Wharton's brigade.

I intended to have camped on Cox's Creek, 4 miles from here, but the cavalry were drawn into a fight by the rebels, which made it necessary to send assistance, when the enemy retired and yielded the town. We have several hundred prisoners sick in hospital, all of whom I will have paroled to-morrow.

It is supposed by the citizens that the infantry of Wharton's brigade has been cut off by the advance of our troops. I have disposed the troops so as to intercept them if possible, but I believe they have all escaped. The last of their infantry left this morning on the Springfield pike, and on another road, which the citizens call the Little Beech Fork road. A Dr. Cowan informed me that the adjutant of a Florida regiment told him that Bragg's force consisted of sixty-five regiments, averaging 400 each, and that there was a great deal of sickness among them. The doctor is convinced that they are concentrating at Danville.

Bragg left here last Sunday morning for Danville and has not been back since. Polk left here this morning.

Very respectfully,

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major-General.

General BUELL.

P. S.—We have some sick officers prisoners. The loss sustained by our cavalry was about 20 killed and wounded and a great many missing.

OCTOBER 4, 1862.—Skirmish near Clay Village, Ky.Report of Brig. Gen. Joshua W. Sill, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS SECOND DIVISION, October 5, 1862.

GENERAL: Yesterday, at 11 a. m., the advanced guard of the Fifth Brigade (Colonel Kirk) engaged Scott's cavalry, estimated at 600, 3 miles beyond Clay Village, and took 13 prisoners and killing and wounding 7 or 8. The brigade bivouacked at Clay Village. Information reached me from several sources during this day that the enemy had evacuated Frankfort, but full credit was not attached to these reports, as they came from second-hand sources. I have just conversed, however, with two reliable men direct from Frankfort. On Friday evening and Saturday morning the rebels had massed at Frankfort an army estimated at from 12,000 to 20,000. They inaugurated Richard Hawes as Governor at 12 m. yesterday; at 3 p. m. they began to evacuate, and during the evening burnt the railroad bridge over the Kentucky River, and also tore up the flooring and timbers of the turnpike bridge. The river can be forded.

I have ordered the march at 4 a. m. to-morrow. Bragg, Smith, Marshall, Heth, and Stevenson were there. The retreating troops took the road to Versailles. Stevenson's troops took the road to Lawrenceburg. General Dumont has arrived here with three brigades and two batteries and 500 cavalry.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. SILL,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. D. C. BUELL.

OCTOBER 7, 1862.—Skirmish near La Vergne, Tenn.Report of Brig. Gen. James S. Negley, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Nashville, October 9, 1862.

SIR: Maj. Gen. S. R. Anderson, Brigadier-General Forrest, and Governor Harris have been rapidly concentrating a large rebel force at La Vergne, 15 miles east, with the avowed intention of assaulting Nashville. Deeming it a favorable opportunity to check this project by a sudden blow, a concerted movement was made on the night of the 6th instant by a force of 400 infantry and 400 cavalry and four pieces of artillery, under command of General Palmer, sent via Murfreesborough road. At the same time 1,800 infantry, under Colonel [John F.] Miller, marched by a circuitous route to the south of La Vergne. The enemy's pickets and vedettes were in considerable force on the roads and skirmished with our advance 10 miles, enabling the main force, consisting of one regiment (the Thirty-second Alabama Infantry), with one steel rifled cannon and 3,000 cavalry, to assume a position, forming their lines in anticipation of our entire force advancing on the Murfreesborough road, which was part of our object.

The enemy commenced the action by opening fire with three pieces of artillery at a distance of 300 yards. This was soon silenced by a shell from one of our guns exploding their ammunition-chest. At the moment the enemy were directing their movements against the right flank of General Palmer's force Colonel Miller's infantry arrived, advancing in splendid line of battle, delivering a well-directed fire into the enemy's ranks, which was followed by a skillful deployment of the right and left to cut off their retreat. The Confederates held their ground for thirty minutes and then fled in the wildest disorder, leaving 175 prisoners in our hands, among whom were 2 lieutenants, 2 lieutenant-colonels, and a number of line officers, three pieces of artillery, ordnance and quartermaster stores, a large amount of provisions, camp equipage, personal effects, stand of regimental colors, and three railroad cars, which we destroyed. Their defeat was complete. Their loss in killed and wounded was about 80.

The conduct of our officers and men was highly meritorious, with numerous instances of individual bravery and efficiency.

A report in detail will be forwarded by the first opportunity.

Our loss is 5 killed, 9 wounded, 4 missing.

I have the honor to remain, yours, very truly,

JAS. S. NEGLEY,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Reports of Maj. Gen. Don Carlos Buell, U. S. Army, commanding Army of the Ohio, including operations October 1–30, with congratulatory orders.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO, Perryville, October 9, 1862.

I have already advised you of the movement of the army under my command from Louisville. More or less skirmishing has occurred daily with the enemy's cavalry since then. It was supposed the enemy would give battle at Bardstown. The troops reached that point on the 4th, driving out the enemy's rear guard of cavalry and artillery. The main body retired toward Springfield, whither the pursuit has continued. The center corps, under General Gilbert, moved on the direct road from Springfield to Perryville, and arrived on the 7th within 2 miles of the town, where the enemy was found to be in force. The left column, under General McCook, came up on the Mackville road about 10 o'clock yesterday, the 8th. It was ordered into position to attack and a strong reconnaissance directed.

At 4 o'clock I received a request from General McCook for re-enforcements, and heard with astonishment that the left had been seriously engaged for several hours and that the right and left of that corps were being turned and severally pressed. Re-enforcements were immediately sent forward from the center; orders were also sent to the right column, under General Crittenden, which was advancing by the Lebanon road, to push forward and attack the enemy's left, but it was impossible for it to get into position in time to produce any decided results. The action continued until dark; some sharp fighting also occurred in the center. The enemy was everywhere repulsed, but not without some momentary advantage on the left.

The several corps were put in position during the night and moved to attack; at 6 o'clock this morning some skirmishing occurred with the enemy's rear guard. The main body has fallen back in the direction of Harrodsburg. I have no accurate report of our loss yet. It is probably pretty heavy, including valuable officers. Generals Jackson and Terrill, I regret to say, are among the number of killed. I will report more in detail as soon as possible.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General, Commanding.

Major-General HALLECK.

LOUISVILLE, KY., November 4, 1862.

SIR: It is due to the army which I have commanded for the last twelve months, and perhaps due to myself, that I should make a circumstantial report of its operations during the past summer. Such a report requires data not now at hand, and would occupy more time than can be spared at present from the subject of more immediate interest, namely, the operations from Louisville against the rebel forces in Kentucky under the command of General Bragg. I therefore commence this report from that period, premising only, in a general way, that my attention to the condition of affairs in Kentucky was demanded, first, by the minor operations of the enemy, which by the destruction of the railroad had completely severed the communications of my army and left it at a distance of 300 miles from its base with very limited supplies; and, second, by the formidable invasion, which not only threatened the permanent occupation of the State, but exposed the States north of the Ohio River to invasion.

Leaving a sufficient force to hold Nashville, the remainder of the army under my command was put in march for Kentucky. The rear division left Nashville on the 15th and arrived at Louisville, a distance of 170 miles, on September 29. The advance arrived on the 25th. The particulars of the march will, as I have said, be given in a subsequent report, in connection with other matters.

I found in and about the city a considerable force of raw troops, hurriedly thrown in from Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, for the defense of the city against the formidable force that had invaded the State under Generals Bragg and Kirby Smith. Under the command of Major-General Nelson, whose untimely death cannot be too much deplored, these troops had been organized into brigades and divisions, and they had some able and experienced officers in Generals Boyle, Jackson, Cruft, Gilbert, Terrill, and others. But the troops were as yet undisciplined, unprovided with suitable artillery, and in every way unfit for active operations against a disciplined foe. It was necessary to reorganize the whole force. This was done as far as possible by intermixing the new troops with the old without changing the old organization. The troops were supplied with shoes and other essentials, of which they were greatly in need; among them certain light cooking utensils, which the men could carry, and dispense with wagons, the allowance of which was reduced to one for each regiment, to carry a few necessary articles for officers and one for hospital supplies, besides the ambulances.

The army was to have marched on September 30, but an order, which was subsequently suspended, relieving me from the command delayed the movement until the following day.

The army marched on the 1st ultimo in five columns. The left moved toward Frankfort, to hold in check the force of the enemy which still remained at or near that place; the other columns, marching by different routes, finally fell respectively into the roads leading from Shepherdsville, Mount Washington, Fairfield, and Bloomfield to Bardstown, where the main force of the enemy under General Bragg was known to be. These roads converge upon Bardstown at an angle of about 15° from each other.

Skirmishing with the enemy's cavalry and artillery marked the movement of each column from within a few miles of Louisville. It was more stubborn and formidable near Bardstown; but the rear of the enemy's infantry retired from that place eight hours before our arrival, when his rear guard of cavalry and artillery retreated after a sharp engagement with my cavalry. The pursuit and skirmishing with the enemy's rear guard continued toward Springfield.

The information which I received indicated that the enemy would concentrate his forces at Danville. The First Corps, under Major-General McCook, was therefore ordered to march from Bloomfield on Harrodsburg, while the Second Corps, under Major-General Crittenden, moved on the Lebanon and Danville road, which passes 4 miles to the south of Perryville, with a branch to the latter place, and the Third Corps on the direct road to Perryville. My headquarters moved with the Third (or center) Corps. Major-General Thomas, second in command, accompanied the Second (or right) Corps. After leaving Bardstown I learned that the force of Kirby Smith had crossed to the west side of the Kentucky River near Salvisa, and that the enemy was moving to concentrate either at Harrodsburg or Perryville. General McCook's route was therefore changed from Harrodsburg to Perryville.

The center corps arrived on the afternoon of the 7th, and was drawn up in order of battle about 3 miles from Perryville, where the enemy appeared to be in force. The advance guard, under Captain Gay, consisting of cavalry and artillery, supported toward evening by two regiments of infantry, pressed successfully upon the enemy's rear guard to within 2 miles of the town against a somewhat stubborn opposition.

The whole army had for three days or more suffered from a scarcity of water. The last day particularly the troops and animals suffered exceedingly for the want of it and from hot weather and dusty roads. In the bed of Doctor's Creek, a tributary of Chaplin River, about 2½ miles from Perryville, some pools of water were discovered, which the enemy showed a determination to prevent us from gaining possession of. The Thirty-sixth brigade, under the command of Col. Daniel McCook, from General Sheridan's division was ordered forward to seize and hold a commanding position which covered these pools. It executed the orders that night, and a supply of bad water was secured for the troops.

On discovering that the enemy was concentrating for battle at Perryville I sent orders on the night of the 7th to General McCook and General Crittenden to march at 3 o'clock the following morning, so as to take position respectively as early as possible on the right and left of the center corps, the commanders themselves to report in person for orders on their arrival, my intention being to make the attack that day if possible. The orders did not reach General McCook until 2.30 o'clock, and he marched at 5.

The Second Corps, failing to find water at the place where it was expected to encamp the night of the 7th, had to move off the road for that purpose, and consequently was some 6 miles or more farther off than it would otherwise have been. The orders did not reach it in time, and these two causes delayed its arrival several hours. Still it was far enough advanced to have been pressed into the action on the 8th if the necessity for it had been known early enough.

The engagement which terminated at night the previous day was renewed early on the morning of the 8th by an attempt of the enemy to drive the brigade of Colonel McCook from the position taken to cover the water in Doctor's Creek. The design had been discovered, and the divisions of Generals Mitchell and Sheridan were moved into position to defeat it and hold the ground until the army was prepared to attack in force. A spirited attack was made on Colonel McCook's position and was handsomely repulsed.

Between 10 and 11 o'clock the left corps arrived on the Mackville road. General McCook was instructed to get it promptly into position on the left of the center corps and to make a reconnaissance to his front and left. The reconnaissance had been continued by Captain Gay toward his front and right, and sharp firing with artillery was then going on. I had somewhat expected an attack early in the morning on Gilbert's corps while it was isolated; but, as it did not take place, no formidable attack was apprehended after the arrival of the left corps.

The disposition of the troops was made mainly with a view to a combined attack on the enemy's position at daylight the following morning, as the time required to get all the troops into position after the unexpected delay would probably make it too late to attack that day.

The cannonading, which commenced with the partial engagement in the center, followed by the reconnaissance of the cavalry, under Captain Gay, extended toward the left, and became brisker as the day advanced, but was not supposed to proceed from any serious engagement, as no report to that effect was received.

At 4 o'clock, however, Major-General McCook's aide-de-camp arrived and reported to me that the general was sustaining a severe attack, which he would not be able to withstand unless re-enforced; that his flanks were already giving way. He added, to my astonishment, that the left corps had actually been engaged in a severe battle for several hours, perhaps since 12 o'clock. It was so difficult to credit the latter that I thought there must even be some misapprehension in regard to the former. I sent word to him that I should rely on his being able to hold his ground, though I should probably send him re-enforcements. I at once sent orders for two brigades from the center corps (Schoepf's division) to move promptly to re-enforce the left. Orders were also sent to General Crittenden to move a division in to strengthen the center and to move with the rest of his corps energetically against the enemy's left flank. The distance from one flank of the army to the other was not perhaps less than 6 miles, and before the orders could be delivered and the right corps make the attack night came on and terminated the engagement.

The roads going from Mackville and Springfield enter Perryville at an angle of about 15° with each other. The road from Lebanon runs nearly parallel to the Springfield road to within 5 miles of Perryville and then forks, the left-hand fork going to Perryville and the right continuing straight on to Danville, leaving Perryville 4 miles to the north. There is also a direct road from Perryville to Danville. Perryville, Danville, and Harrodsburg occupy the vertices of an equilateral triangle, and are 10 miles apart. Salt River rises midway between Perryville and Danville, and runs northward 2 miles west of Harrodsburg. Chaplin Fork rises near and passes through Perryville, bending in its course so as to run obliquely away from the Mackville and Perryville road, on which the left corps advanced. Doctor's Creek, running north, crosses the Perryville and Springfield road at right angles about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Perryville, and empties into Chaplin Fork about 3 miles from town. The ground bordering the Chaplin is hilly, with alternate patches of timber and cleared land. The hills, though in some places steep, are generally practicable for infantry and cavalry and in many places for artillery. The ground afforded the enemy great advantages for attacking a force on the Mackville road, taken in the act of forming, as was the case in the battle of the 8th. General McCook's line ran nearly parallel with Chaplin Fork, the right resting on the road and the left to the north of it. Two of General Rousseau's brigades (the Seventeenth, under Colonel Lytle, and the Ninth, under Colonel Harris) were on the right; then the Thirty-third Brigade, under General Terrill, of Jackson's division; then on the extreme left and to the rear of Terrill the Twenty-eighth Brigade, under Colonel Starkweather, of Rousseau's division. The other brigade of Jackson's division, under Colonel Webster, was at first in the rear of Rousseau's two right brigades, and in the course of the battle was brought into action on the right. General Gilbert's corps was on the right of Rousseau, but the space between them was somewhat too great—first, Sheridan's division, then Mitchell's, and Schoepf's in reserve opposite the left of the corps.

The fight commenced early in the day, as has been described, with a feeble attack on the center corps; then, later, the attack fell with severity and pertinacity on Rousseau's right brigades; then, somewhat later, on Terrill's brigade, and on Rousseau's third brigade on the extreme left. It was successful against Terrill's brigade, composed of new regiments.

The gallant commander of the division, General J. S. Jackson, was killed almost instantly. The heroic young brigadier, Terrill, lost his life in endeavoring to rally his troops and ten pieces of his artillery were left on the ground. Two of them were carried off by the enemy the next morning; the rest were recovered.

The main weight of the battle thus fell upon the Third Division, under General Rousseau. No troops could have met it with more heroism. The left brigade, compelled at first to fall back somewhat, at length maintained its ground and repulsed the attack at that point.

Taking advantage of the opening between Gilbert's left and Rousseau's right, the enemy pressed his attack at that point with an overwhelming force. Rousseau's right was being turned and was forced to fall back, which it did in excellent order, until re-enforced by Gooding's and Steedman's brigades from Gilbert's corps, when the enemy was repulsed. That result was also promoted by the fire which the artillery of Sheridan's division poured into the enemy's left flank. Simultaneously with the heaviest attack on Rousseau's division the enemy made a strong attack on Sheridan's right. Sheridan was re-enforced from Mitchell's division by Colonel Carlin's brigade, which charged the enemy with intrepidity and drove him through the town to his position beyond, capturing in the town 2 caissons and 15 wagons, loaded with ammunition, and the guard that was with them, consisting of 3 officers and 138 men. This occurred about night-fall, which terminated the battle.

The corps of General Crittenden closed in, and Wagner's brigade, of Wood's division, became engaged and did good service on the right of Mitchell's division, but knowing nothing of the severity of the fight on the extreme left the rest of the corps did not get into action.

No doubt was entertained that the enemy would endeavor to hold his position. Accordingly orders were sent to the commanders of corps to be prepared to attack at daylight in the morning. They received instructions in person at my headquarters that night, except General Crittenden, for whom instructions were given to Major-General Thomas, second in command. General McCook supposed, from indications in his front, that the enemy would throw a formidable force against his corps, in pursuance of the original attempt to turn our left. He represented also that his corps was very much crippled, the new division of General Jackson having in fact almost entirely disappeared as a body. He was instructed to move in during the night and close the opening between his right and General Gilbert's left. His orders for the following day were to hold his position, taking advantage of any opportunity that the events of the day might present. The corps of Generals Crittenden and Gilbert were to move forward at 6 o'clock and attack the enemy's front and left flank.

The advance the following morning, in pursuance of these orders, discovered that the enemy's main body had retired during the night, but without any indications of haste or disorder, except that his dead and many of his wounded were left upon the field. The reconnaissance during the day showed that his whole force had fallen back on Harrodsburg, where the indications seemed to be that he would make a stand.

It will be impossible to form any correct judgment of the operations from this time, particularly without considering the condition of the two armies and the probable intentions of the enemy. The rebel army has been driven from the borders of Kentucky without a decisive battle. It is spoken of as if it were a comparatively insignificant force and pursued by an overwhelming one, which had nothing to do but to send out patrols and gather in the fragments of a routed and disorganized army. The very reverse was the case. The rebel force which invaded Kentucky, at the lowest estimates, has been rated at from 55,000 to 65,000 men. It was composed of veteran troops, well armed, and thoroughly inured to hardships. Every circumstance of its march and the concurrent testimony of all who came within reach of its lines attest that it was under perfect discipline. It had entered Kentucky with the avowed purpose of holding the State; its commanders declared that to be their intention to the last. Intercepted communications, disclosing their plans and the disappointment expressed by the Southern press at the result, show that to have been their purpose. The enterprise certainly seemed desperate, but it was entered upon deliberately, was conducted by the best talent in the rebel service, and there was nothing to indicate that it would be abandoned lightly. Some maneuvering for advantage and one decisive battle were to be expected before Kentucky could be rid of her invader. Everything goes to show that the final retreat of the enemy was suddenly determined on, and that it was not at the time to be calculated upon as a matter of course. Any movement on my part, solely in anticipation of it, would only have turned the enemy in a different direction, and any presumptuous attempt to capture a superior force by detachments would, according to all probabilities, have been more likely to result in defeat than in success.

The effective force which advanced on Perryville on the 7th and 8th under my command was about 58,000 infantry, artillery, and cavalry. Of these about 22,000 were raw troops, with very little instruction, or none at all. The reports show an actual loss of upward of 4,000 killed, wounded, and missing in the battle, which would leave the effective force about 54,000 after it. I did not hesitate therefore, after crossing Chaplin River and finding the enemy had fallen back, to await the arrival of General Sill's division, which had marched to Frankfort, and had been ordered to join, via Lawrenceburg and Chaplinton, when it was ascertained that Kirby Smith's force had marched to form a junction with Bragg. That division on the march from Louisville encountered a strong outpost of the enemy on the Frankfort road about 12 miles out, and skirmishing was kept up until its arrival at Frankfort.* It was followed closely by the division of General Dumont which remained at Frankfort.

In marching from Frankfort to join the main body Sill's division was attacked near Lawrenceburg by a portion of Kirby Smith's force, which it drove off, and then continued its march, arriving at Perryville on the evening of the 11th. Pending its arrival the army took position, with its right 4 miles from Danville, its center on the Perryville and Harrodsburg pike, and the left near Dicksville, on roads converging on Harrodsburg.

On the 11th three brigades from Crittenden's and Gilbert's corps, with Gay's and Colonel McCook's cavalry brigades, were sent out to reconnoiter the enemy's position. He was found in some force 2 miles south of Harrodsburg in the morning, but retired during the day, and his rear guard was driven out in the evening, with the loss of some stores and about 1,200 prisoners, mostly sick and wounded. It was probable that he would retire his whole force to Camp Dick Robinson, though it was not certainly ascertained what portion of it had crossed Dick's River. To compel him to take at once one side or the other, and either give battle on this side or be prevented from recrossing to attack our communications when a move was made to turn his position, the left corps moved on the 12th to Harrodsburg (General Sill's division having arrived the night before), the right corps moving forward and resting near and to the left of Danville, and the center midway on the Danville and Harrodsburg road, while a strong reconnaissance was sent forward to the crossing of Dick's River. The enemy was found to have crossed with his whole force.

The ground between the Kentucky River and Dick's River, as a military position, is rendered almost impregnable on the north and west by the rocky cliffs which border those streams, and which are only passable at a few points easily defended. Such is the character of Dick's River from its mouth to where the Danville and Lexington road crosses it, a distance of about 12 miles. It could only be reached by turning it to the south, while the passes to the west, by which our lines of communication would be exposed, were suitably guarded. The army was moving with that view, when I learned, on the evening of the 13th, at Danville, that the enemy was retiring from his position toward the south. Pursuit was immediately ordered for the purpose of overtaking or intercepting him if he should attempt to pass toward Somerset.

* See skirmish near Clay Village, p. 1020.

General Wood's division marched at 12 o'clock that night, and engaged the enemy's cavalry and artillery at Stanford at daylight the next morning. The remainder of General Crittenden's corps and General McCook's corps followed on that road and General Gilbert's marched on the Lancaster road. The enemy kept the road toward Cumberland Gap, opposing with cavalry and artillery the advance of both of the pursuing columns, which, however, progressed steadily.

At Crab Orchard the character of the country suddenly changes. It becomes rough and barren, affording scarcely more than enough corn for its sparse population, and the road passes through defiles, where a small force can resist with great effect a large one; where in fact the use of a large force is impracticable. The little forage the country afforded was consumed by the enemy in his retreat, rendering it impossible to subsist any considerable number of animals. The corps of General McCook and General Gilbert were therefore halted at Crab Orchard, while that of General Crittenden, with General W. S. Smith's division in advance, continued the pursuit as far as London on the direct road and on the branch road to Manchester.

I have not received the formal report of the operations of this corps, but the pursuit was conducted by its commander, according to my orders, with judgment and energy. The road was cleared of the trees felled across it by the enemy and his rear guard attacked successfully at several points. Some prisoners were taken, and about 300 head of cattle and other property, to no very great amount, captured.

It was not expedient to continue the pursuit beyond London, partly because it was impracticable in a manner to afford any material advantage; partly because, without advantage, it took the troops out of the way when they were likely to be required elsewhere. They were therefore promptly turned upon other routes toward Tennessee. A portion were to be at Bowling Green and the rest at Glasgow on the 31st ultimo, and thence continue their march by certain routes.

In that position I relinquished the command of the army on the 30th to Major-General Rosecrans, in obedience to instructions from the general-in-chief. In the mean time the railroads, which had been broken up by the enemy and suspended for two months, had been repaired as far as Bowling Green to carry forward supplies.

I have no means at this time of reporting the casualties that occurred in the minor engagements or skirmishes that took place during the campaign, nor is it possible for me to do justice to the services of the officers and soldiers engaged in them, as the subsequent movements of the troops and my separation from them have prevented me from obtaining detailed reports, except concerning the battle of the 8th. The particulars referred to outside of the battle are based on the brief and sometimes oral reports made at the time, and are unavoidably less complete and definite than I could wish. For the same reason many such I am unable to mention at all. In regard to the battle of the 8th, the reports of the several commanders go much more into detail than is necessary in this report, and I beg leave to commend them to your consideration, especially in relation to the services of many officers whose names are not herein mentioned. Where I have mentioned troops by the name of their commander, unless otherwise expressed, I wish to be understood as commending him for their good conduct.

The daily services of officers in an active campaign, though less brilliant, are often more arduous and important than those of the battlefield, and in this respect also the commanders of corps, Major-General McCook, Major-General Crittenden, and Brigadier-General Gilbert, are entitled to my thanks and the approbation of the Government. This commendation should extend also to many other officers in proportion to their responsibilities, particularly to the commanders of divisions.

I am indebted in the highest degree to the members of my staff for their assistance, especially to my chief of staff, Col. James B. Fry, whose efficient aid I have had during the whole period of my command in Kentucky and Tennessee.

The difficult and responsible duty of supplying a large force by wagon transportation over a line of about 140 miles was ably performed by Capt. J. G. Chandler, chief quartermaster, and Capt. Francis Darr, chief commissary.

Capt. H. C. Bankhead, acting inspector-general; Capt. J. H. Gilman, chief of artillery and acting ordnance officer, and Capt. N. Michler, Topographical Engineers, discharged their duties in the most satisfactory manner. At Perryville they were active and useful in reconnoitering the ground with a view to posting troops for battle.

Maj. J. M. Wright, assistant adjutant-general; Lieut. C. L. Fitzhugh, aide-de-camp, and Lieut. T. J. Bush, aide-de-camp, conveyed my orders to different commanders during the 8th, and at all times performed their duties with intelligence and zeal. The duties of his office have been ably and faithfully performed by Surg. Robert Murray, medical director.

The intelligent officers of the Signal Corps, Capt. Jesse Merrill and Lieutenants Meeker, Sheridan, and Fitch, attached to my headquarters, rendered good service at Perryville and other points.

Private Oakford, of the Anderson Troop, in carrying orders late on the evening of the 8th, fell into the enemy's lines and was captured, but had the presence of mind to destroy his dispatches.

I cannot omit to make honorable mention of the Michigan regiment of Mechanics and Engineers. It has not only rendered invaluable service in its appropriate duties during the past year, but at Chaplin Hills and on other occasions it has, in whole or in part, gallantly engaged the enemy. I especially commend Colonel Innes, Lieutenant-Colonel Hutton, and Major Hopkins for the efficient services of this fine regiment.

The cavalry, under Col. John Kennett, Fourth Ohio, commanding a division; Col. Lewis Zahm, Third Ohio, commanding a brigade; Col. E. M. McCook, Second Indiana, commanding a brigade, and Capt. E. Gay, commanding a brigade, rendered excellent service.

The brigade of Captain Gay was conducted with gallantry and effect by that officer at Perryville on the 7th and 8th.

The other brigades were not in the battle, but came in contact with the enemy on other occasions during the campaign. When the army marched on Louisville they were left on the south side of Salt River, under the command of Colonel Kennett, to escort the train of the army from Bowling Green and watch the enemy in the direction of Bardstown. The train was conducted in the most successful manner by Colonel Zahm.

The brigade of Colonel McCook also acquitted itself in the most satisfactory manner. A portion of it, under Lieut. Col. R. R. Stewart, captured Colonel Crawford and the principal part of his regiment of Georgia cavalry near New Haven on September 29.

Colonel Kennett, with Colonel McCook's brigade, rejoined the army at Bardstown on the 5th. Colonel Zahm's marched across from the mouth of the Salt River to join the column at Frankfort and thence to the main body at Danville.

The campaign, the history of which I have sketched, occupied a period of about twenty days. The result can be stated in a few words: An army, prepared for the conquest and occupation of Kentucky, with full knowledge of our means of resistance and with a confident expectation of prevailing over them, has been driven back, baffled and dispirited, from the borders of the State. It is true that only one serious battle has been fought, and that was incomplete and less decisive than it ought to have been. That it was so is due partly to unavoidable difficulties, which prevented the troops, marching on different roads, from getting upon the ground simultaneously; but more to the fact that I was not apprised early enough of the condition of affairs on my left. I can find no fault with the former, nor am I disposed at this time to censure the latter, though it must be admitted to have been a grave error. I ascribe it to the too great confidence of the general commanding the left corps (Major-General McCook), which made him believe that he could manage the difficulty without the aid or control of his commander. As before stated, there was skirmishing along the whole front, but after a certain hour, for the reasons stated, no general engagement was anticipated that day, and no sound of musketry reached my headquarters by which the sharpness of the action on the left could be known or even suspected, and when the fact was ascertained it was too late to do more than throw in succor before night set in. But although this lack of information was attended with disappointment and unfortunate consequences, yet the unequal struggle was marked by no disaster and conspicuously displayed the courage and discipline of the troops.

From first to last I suppose 4,000 or 5,000 prisoners, sick, wounded, and well, were taken; and at various points some stores and property fell into our hands, among them 2,500 barrels of pork and two pieces of cannon, abandoned by the enemy at Camp Dick Robinson. I do not believe that he carried off in his retreat any large amount of stores. He may have sent off a good deal, from first to last, while he was in quiet occupation of so much of the State.

The reports show a loss of 916 killed, 2,943 wounded, and 489 missing. Total, 4,348 in the battle of the 8th.* It includes many valuable lives. The loss of such men as James S. Jackson, William R. Terrill, George P. Jouett, George Webster, W. P. Campbell, Alexander S. Berryhill, and John Herrell would be mourned in any army and any cause where true manliness and earnest devotion are appreciated.

I inclose herewith the reports of subordinate commanders as far as received and a map showing the lines of operation of the army.†

Major-General Thomas acted as second in command during the campaign, and I am indebted to him for the most valuable assistance.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

Adjutant-General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 47b.HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,
October 12, 1862.

The battle of Chaplin Hills, fought near Perryville on the 8th instant, will stand conspicuous for its severity in the history of the rebellion. It deserves to be commemorated for the determined valor displayed by the portion of the army that was engaged.

The principal force of the enemy, on chosen ground, under General Bragg, attacked our left wing as it was moving into position after a fatiguing march. The suddenness and strength of the attack, and the fall of two of their gallant leaders, Jackson and Terrill, caused some of the new troops of the Tenth Division to fall into disorder, and threw the weight of the battle mainly on the Third Division. This was subsequently re-enforced by two brigades from the center corps, which itself had met with considerable opposition in moving into position. The enemy was repulsed with heavy loss, and when the army advanced to the attack at 6 o'clock the following morning was found to have retreated during the night.

The good conduct exhibited by the troops on this field only realized that which the general has always confidently expected from them. Fortuitous circumstances, which so often affect the incidents of war, screened the enemy from a combined effort of the different corps until night intervened to prevent his defeat from terminating in the destruction of his army, but the thanks of the general are not less due to the gallant officers and men under his command. In the battle and on the march the old troops have given the highest proofs of discipline and courage. The new troops already vie with them. Let them preserve order, remembering that lawlessness in an army is both disgraceful and fatal. The sacredness and dignity of the cause for which they are battling demand nothing less. The nation will mourn the loss of the heroes who fell at Chaplin Hills; it will honor those who prove worthy to fill their places.

By command of Major-General Buell:

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

No. 3.

Report of Capt. Ebenezer Gay, Sixteenth United States Infantry, Inspector and Chief of Cavalry, including operations October 7.

LEBANON, KY., October 21, 1862.

SIR: Being in the advance on October 7, with 500 of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, under Lieutenant-Colonel James; 500 of the Ninth Kentucky Cavalry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Boyle, and 350 of the Second Michigan Cavalry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, I drove the enemy a distance of 9 miles, skirmishing from daylight until dark, to a point on the northwest of the Chaplin Hills, within 3 miles of Perryville, on the road from Springfield. In this action the rebel General Cleburne was mortally wounded. I occupied the point held by the enemy's battery this day with a portion of my command during the night, and removed the main body to a place of rest in the rear.

At 3 a. m. on the 8th instant my advance was joined by a brigade under Colonel McCook. At daylight, hearing firing in front, I moved my command to that position, still held by Colonel McCook, where I found slight skirmishing going on between him and the enemy. I moved on to take the advance, and had hardly passed our skirmishers when I was received by a volley of musketry from a wooded hill on the left side of the road. I formed the Ninth Pennsylvania to the left and perpendicular to the road (its right resting near it) and fronting the woods, supporting the Second Michigan, which was dismounted and sent forward as skirmishers. The Ninth Kentucky was held in reserve. My skirmishers had not advanced far when a heavy musketry fire from the enemy showed that he held the position in force. Four men of the Second Michigan were killed here and 2 commissioned officers and 11 privates wounded.

The Ninth Pennsylvania was now ordered to take position to the left and front, in open ground, in order to ascertain the situation of the enemy's batteries. They had proceeded about a quarter of a mile when the enemy opened upon them from two batteries and his position became known. I placed two pieces of artillery, under Captain Hotchkiss, in position opposite these batteries, and opened fire upon them. In twenty minutes they were silenced and the enemy was driven from the wooded hill. Observing that the enemy were showing themselves farther to my left and front, I moved forward to a more advanced position, near a fork of Chaplin Creek, placing my battery in position on a knoll near it, and throwing out portions of the Ninth Pennsylvania and Second Michigan as skirmishers in advance. The enemy's batteries were again silenced here, and his cavalry, broken and disordered, were driven toward Harrodsburg.

The advance of General McCook's army was now seen on the Mackville road, to the rear and left. At my request, General Rousseau sent forward two Parrott guns, from which a few shells were thrown into the woods far in advance without meeting with any response. My command was then dismounted and rested for about an hour and a half. At the end of this time clouds of dust were seen rising in the direction of Harrodsburg, and it became evident that the enemy was being strongly re-enforced. In a few minutes fire opened from a heavy battery in front, to which my howitzers replied without effect, the distance being too great. The two Parrott guns before mentioned, belonging to Loomis' battery, opened with apparent effect, and were soon joined by the rest of the battery. Another battery of the enemy now opened farther to the left and soon another to the right and his infantry was seen advancing in line, and it became evident that the engagement would become general. An infantry regiment coming to the support of the battery, I withdrew my command to a position to the left of the one first occupied, holding the interval between the Springfield and Perryville and the Mackville and Perryville roads. In an hour the engagement had become general, the enemy attacking the extreme left of General McCook and General Gilbert's left (on my right). I sent a regiment to operate on the extreme left of General McCook and opened fire with my howitzer on the advancing line of the enemy. These howitzers were in position on the right of General McCook and remained there until nearly dark, effectively checking the enemy. Observing that our lines to the left were gradually giving way, I moved my command to the left. Arriving on the ground, I found that a portion of General Schoepf's division, of General Gilbert's army, had come up and checked the enemy's advance. Night came on and the battle ended.

The Second Michigan in this action well sustained the good reputation it had previously earned. The Ninth Pennsylvania sustained a fire from three batteries for forty-five minutes without any disorder in its ranks. The Ninth Kentucky, although a new regiment, which had not been in action before, behaved admirably.

Too much praise cannot be awarded Captain Hotchkiss and his men for their brave and effective services. To Mr. E. McKinney, chaplain of the Ninth Pennsylvania, volunteer aide, and to the members of my staff, Captain Newlin, Seventh Pennsylvania, Lieutenant Farrell, Ninth Pennsylvania, and Lieut. J. M. Bacon, Fourth Kentucky, I am much indebted for their gallant action and valuable services.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. GAY,

Inspector and Chief of Cavalry.

Col. J. B. FREY,

Chief of Staff, Army of the Ohio.

No. 4.

Report of Maj. Gen. Alexander McD. McCook, U. S. Army, commanding First Army Corps.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CORPS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Camp, near Crab Orchard, Ky., October 18, 1862.

COLONEL: I have the honor to report that, in compliance with written instructions from you, dated October 7, 8 p. m., and reaching me at my camp at Mackville, Ky., at 2.30 a. m. on the morning of the 8th instant, I marched at 5 a. m. on the Perryville road. I had but a portion of my corps with me—Rousseau's and Jackson's divisions—the Second Division, under General Sill, having been detached to march upon Frankfort, Ky. The Tenth Division (General Jackson's) was entitled to the advance, but it being composed entirely of new troops, I ordered General Rousseau's division to take the lead. General Rousseau was ordered to march with great caution, I having heard previously that the enemy were in force at Harrodsburg; also your letter informing me that the enemy would resist your advance into Perryville; also that you intended to attack them that day. Hearing artillery in the morning, our march was hastened. Mackville is equidistant from Perryville and Harrodsburg—distance, 10 miles. My instructions required me to advance on the Perryville road until I reached a point 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville or until I came up abreast with Gilbert's corps. The head of my column reached the point designated at 10.30 a. m. General Rousseau advanced his cavalry and a portion of his infantry to the front in order to see if the ground was clear, the artillery (Loomis' battery) being halted on the hill in rear. General Rousseau soon sent me word that the enemy was reported advancing in force on the position assigned my corps. I then rode forward and examined the ground, and saw a few of the enemy skirmishing with the left of Gilbert's corps. My attention was then directed to General Gilbert's left. I saw his infantry in line about 400 or 500 yards to our right. I called General Rousseau's attention to this fact, marked out my line of battle, and ordered him to form on it, having directed Loomis' battery to be brought up and put in position on a commanding piece of ground to the left and near Russell's house (called Clarke's on your map). I had previously ordered General Rousseau to throw forward a line of skirmishers to examine the woods on our left and front; also sending Captain Wickliffe, with his company of the Second Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, to reconnoiter the ground on the left of the skirmishers. General Gay's cavalry was making a reconnaissance in front and toward Perryville. I was then well satisfied that the enemy that had engaged Gilbert's left had retired from the field.

I then informed General Rousseau that my instructions required me to report in person to General Buell; that I was about to leave the field, but would return in a short time. I had given particular instructions to Capt. J. A. Campbell, my assistant adjutant-general, to post General Jackson's two brigades on a commanding piece of ground immediately to the right of the Mackville and Perryville road, and to hold them there in column, so that they could be moved in any direction that occasion required. I then galloped off to report to General Buell, whose headquarters were about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in rear and right of my line. Having reported, I then received verbal instructions from General Buell to make a reconnaissance down to Chaplin River. I immediately returned to my troops, finding that General Rousseau had advanced the line on the right, occupying a commanding ridge about 800 yards in front and to the left of Russell's house. The enemy had placed three batteries in position and were firing upon his line; Loomis' and Simonson's batteries were replying. There being then no infantry of the enemy in sight, I sent an order for these batteries to cease firing and economize their ammunition. The command suffering greatly for water, I then prepared to make the reconnaissance toward Chaplin River, as ordered. Having been informed by my guide, Capt. Beverly D. Williams, acting assistant quartermaster on General Jackson's staff, and also by Col. L. A. Harris, commanding the Ninth Brigade, that by moving a short distance to the left of the Perryville road I could get high commanding ground for a portion of my line, I went forward in person to the high ground overlooking a portion of Chaplin River, advanced to within 600 yards of the river, and saw the water. Having previously ordered a portion of the Thirty-third Ohio Volunteers into the woods on the right as skirmishers to ascertain if any enemy was present in that vicinity, I then sent for Generals Jackson and Terrill, showed them the water, marked their line of battle, and ordered a battery to be posted on this line, with strong support. General Terrill was ordered to advance a body of skirmishers cautiously down the slope of the hill to the water as soon as the line was formed.

During my presence on this ground no enemy was seen, save some rebel cavalry on the opposite hills, across the river, who I suppose were threatening my train in the rear. A few well-directed shots from Stone's First Kentucky Battery, posted to the left and rear of this position, put them to flight. Not being apprehensive of an attack, I left this position and moved toward the right of the line. This was about 1.30 p. m. in the day.

At 2 p. m. an attack was made by the enemy on the skirmishers of the Thirty-third Ohio Volunteers. I then ordered the remainder of the regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, to support the line; also the Second Ohio Volunteers to support the Thirty-third.

My line of battle at this moment was formed as follows: The right of Rousseau's division rested near a barn on the right of the Perryville and Mackville road, extending to the left, on a commanding ridge, through a corn field (the corn being cut and shucked), to the skirt of woods occupied by the Second and Thirty-third Ohio Volunteers. The right of Terrill's brigade, of Jackson's division, resting on some woods running along to the left, on the commanding ground overlooking a portion of Chaplin River to the north, his left forming a crotchet to the rear, in order to occupy the high ground on his left and rear. Starkweather's brigade and Stone's and Bush's batteries, of Rousseau's division, were posted to the left and rear of Jackson's left, on high, commanding ground. Webster's brigade, of Jackson's division, was posted to the left of Russell's house, and in the rear of the center of Rousseau's line, on the right.

The attack on my line now became general. My attention was directed principally to the left, where the attack was most fiercely made. I had no apprehension about my right, as it rested near Gilbert's left. A fierce attack being made on Terrill's brigade, General Jackson being killed at the first fire, this brigade in a few moments gave way in confusion, General Terrill doing everything in the power of a man to steady them.

At this juncture, at 2.30 p. m., seeing that I was assailed by at least three times my numbers, I dispatched my aide-de-camp, First Lieut. L. M. Hosea, Sixteenth U. S. Infantry, to General Sheridan, commanding Gilbert's left division, to request him to look to my right and see that it was not turned.

At 3 p. m. I dispatched Capt. Horace N. Fisher, of my staff, to the nearest commander of troops for assistance. He first met General Schoepf, marching at the head of his division, and reported my condition to him. General Schoepf expressed a desire to come up, replying that he was moving to the front for some purpose, and requested Captain Fisher to see General Gilbert, who was riding with the column. Captain Fisher then reported to General Gilbert that my entire command was engaged and the reserves were all in line and the safety of my corps was compromised. General Gilbert referred this officer to General Buell, to whom this officer reported at 3.30 p. m.

I also dispatched another aide, Capt. W. T. Hoblitzell, to General Schoepf, commanding the First Division and reserve of Gilbert's corps or to the commander of the nearest troops in the rear to inform him of my condition and ask for troops.

I remained in rear of my left center until I saw the enemy's right completely routed and driven back by the gallant brigade of Starkweather, so admirably posted for the work they performed so well. I then galloped to the right of the line, but only in time to see it turned by a large force of the enemy. I then ordered Colonel Webster, of the Ninety-eighth Ohio, to move his troops to the right and repel this attack, if possible. It was in obeying this order that this gallant officer received a mortal wound. Retiring to Russell's house, I ordered my chief of artillery, Maj. C. S. Cotter, to bring up a section of artillery to stop their advance. This was done promptly. The guns were well handled, but could not stop this determined attack.

At this time the right of Rousseau's line was compelled to fall back to prevent it from being enveloped by the enemy. The enemy then placed a battery in the open field, about 800 yards from Russell's house, near Bolton's barn. The fire from this battery was so heavy that the point near Russell's house could not be held. Loomis' battery, having exhausted all its long-range ammunition, had been retired from its position in the afternoon to a commanding ridge about 150 yards in rear of Russell's house and on the right of the Perryville road, supported by three companies of the Michigan Mechanics and Engineers, commanded by Major Hopkins. I ordered Captain Loomis to reserve his canister for close work. This battery opened fire and repulsed this wicked attack for the first time. I then went to the point where the Dicksville and Springfield road crosses the Mackville and Perryville road. Near this point I met Captain Hoblitzell, with a brigade of General Robert B. Mitchell's division. This brigade was commanded by Colonel Gooding, of the Twenty-second Indiana, and consisted of his own regiment, the Fifty-ninth and Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteers, and Capt. O. F. Pinney's Fifth Wisconsin Battery. I ordered the posting of his infantry, and then placed Captain Pinney's battery in position near the cross-roads and in a small skirt of timber to the right.

Gooding's attack, assisted by Pinney's battery, drove back the enemy and reoccupied the position at Russell's house. At this moment Brig. Gen. James B. Steedman reported to me with his brigade, of Schöepf's division. It was now nearly dark. He posted his battery on the right of Pinney's and opened fire. I then conducted his brigade to a position on the right and front of these batteries. The two battalions of the Eighteenth Regulars, under Maj. Frederick Townsend, were posted on a commanding ridge in an open field, the right resting on a wood; the Ninth Ohio on the right of Townsend, the right resting on a field. The other regiments of this brigade were in the second line and supporting the batteries. The line of Steedman's brigade was about 200 yards to the rear and right of Russell's house. By this time it was dark and the firing had ceased on both sides.

I remained in front of Steedman's line until 9 p. m., when I rode to the left and found the line there had been retired by General Rousseau. Believing that the enemy would renew the attack at daylight I ordered him to throw his line back, his left resting upon the Mackville and Perryville road, and his line extending to the right, on commanding ground, to the left of Steedman's brigade. This movement was executed about 12 o'clock at night. When General Terrill's brigade gave way, a portion of his troops fell back with him to the position occupied by Stone's and Bush's batteries, and at this point, when in the act of rallying his broken troops, at 4 p. m. he was struck in the side by the fragment of a shell, carrying away a portion of his left lung. He died at 11 p. m. When Terrill's brigade gave way seven guns of Parsons' eight-gun battery fell into the hands of the enemy. At 6 p. m. four of the guns of Harris' Nineteenth Indiana Battery also fell into the hands of the enemy.

The posting of Starkweather's brigade and Stone's and Bush's batteries saved my left and secured to us the Mackville road, upon which stood our entire ammunition train and ambulances. The ground to the right of the road being rough and rugged prevented the train from being taken off the road and parked.

I have previously stated that the firing on both sides ceased at dark. The enemy posted their pickets about 50 yards from ours, but the main body escaped during the night, and with such precipitation that they left their dead and wounded and could not carry the guns captured from the new batteries from the field. The guns were all recovered next morning, except two Napoleon guns of Parsons' battery, that were kindly exchanged by the enemy for two 6-pounder field guns. The enemy retreated across Chaplin River to the Harrodsburg turnpike, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from the battle-field; thence to Harrodsburg.

The battle-field was a chosen one for the enemy. They marched from Harrodsburg to give our army battle at or near Perryville. The ground upon which the battle was fought was very much broken by hills and deep ravines, which afforded every facility to them for concealing their troops. I was assailed by at least three divisions of the enemy. The bluffs and dry channels of Chaplin River and Doctor's Fork afforded them every advantage for concealing and massing large bodies of troops.

I have since been reliably informed that General Bragg commanded the enemy in person and that Polk's and Hardee's corps were present upon the field.

Thus ends my account of the part taken in the battle of Chaplin Hills by my corps, the bloodiest battle of modern times for the number of troops engaged on our side. Rousseau had present on the field 7,000; Jackson, 5,500; the brigade of Gooding amounted to about 1,500. The battle was principally fought by Rousseau's division, and if there are or ever were better soldiers than the old troops engaged I have neither seen nor read of them.

Great discrimination must be exercised in making a perfectly fair statement respecting the conduct of the new regiments; exposed as some of them were to a terrific fire at the onset of the enemy, it would be extraordinary to expect in them the steadiness and composure of veterans. It was also clearly perceptible that the resolution and obstinate resistance displayed by the old troops in the same brigade or in close proximity had a salutary effect in animating and encouraging the new troops; for instance, the Ninth Brigade. When the Second and Thirty-third Ohio, Thirty-eighth Indiana, and Tenth Wisconsin fought so well, I was proud to see the Ninety-fourth and Ninety-eighth Ohio vie with their brethern in deeds of heroism. Commanders have found occasion for severe reflection on individuals, whose conduct did not entirely justify the confidence reposed in them by their State and country. These cases, happily but few, compel me the more strongly to awaken the attention of our authorities to a more rigid and careful selection of officers who may join to their other qualifications the essential ones of courage and honor. The material of the new levies is evidently as good as in the old regiments. My apology for the misbehavior of some on this day is want of discipline and confidence in their field and line officers.

If it were not a great pleasure my duty compels me to call the attention of my superiors and my Government to the conspicuous gallantry and good conduct of Brig. Gen. L. H. Rousseau on this hotly contested field. The manner of posting his left and the way it was maintained render him one of the most conspicuous lights of the war.

The attention of my superiors is called to the good conduct and gallantry of Col. L. A. Harris, Second Ohio, commanding Ninth Brigade; Col. J. C. Starkweather, of the First Wisconsin, commanding Twenty-eighth Brigade; also Col. W. H. Lytle, of the Tenth Ohio, commanding Seventeenth Brigade. These officers deserve promotion.

Captain Loomis, of the First Michigan Battery, handled his battery with great success and ability. Capt. O. F. Pinney, of the Fifth Wisconsin Battery, greatly distinguished himself during the close of the action, as did the entire brigade of Colonel Gooding, sent me from General Robert B. Mitchell's division.

For favorable mention of other officers and men I refer you to the reports of General Rousseau; also to the adjutants-general of Generals Jackson and Terrill and Colonel Webster, herewith inclosed.

To my personal staff, Lieut. Col. J. V. Bomford, Sixteenth U. S. Infantry; Lieut. Col. E. Bassett Langdon, First Ohio Volunteers; Capt. J. A. Campbell, assistant adjutant-general; Capt. W. T. Hoblitzell, aide-de-camp; Second Lieut. S. W. Davies, First Ohio Volunteers, aide-de-camp; First Lieut. L. M. Hosea, Sixteenth U. S. Infantry, aide-de-camp; Maj. Caleb Bates, volunteer aide-de-camp; Capt. H. N. Fisher, volunteer aide-de-camp, and Capt. James P. Collier, volunteer aide-de-camp, I return my sincere thanks for their conspicuous gallantry and intelligence displayed on the field of battle. Lieutenant-Colonel Bomford was twice wounded while posting a regiment in line.

My orderlies, Privates Isaac Bailey, Second Indiana Cavalry; George L. Richardson, Thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers; Henry Kline, First Ohio Volunteers; Avery Lapham, Thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, and Privates G. Benning Jenness, William Edwards, and Harvey Knowles, escort, behaved with coolness and bravery on the field, and I recommend them to their superiors for promotion.

To Surg. G. B. Beebe, medical director of my corps, my thanks are due for his good conduct on the field and the kind care he has taken of the wounded. Favorable mention is also made of Surgeons Marks, Tenth Wisconsin; L. J. Dixon, First Wisconsin; Williams, One hundred and twenty-first Ohio Volunteers; Wright, Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania; Beckwith, Thirty-eighth Indiana; Sinnet, Ninety-fourth Ohio, and Fowler. Also Assistant Surgeons Taft, One hundred and fifth Ohio; Devendorf, First Wisconsin; Albright, Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania; Mitchell, Tenth Wisconsin; Reeve and Fuller, Twenty-first Wisconsin, and Shannon, of the Second Ohio.

Maj. C. S. Cotter, First Ohio Artillery, my chief of that arm (artillery), behaved with conspicuous gallantry and good judgment during the entire action. He was unfortunately taken prisoner after dark.

Capt. Beverly D. Williams, assistant quartermaster, was my guide during the entire day. The battle was fought near his birthplace. He was of inestimable service to me.

Lieut. M. B. Gratz and Volunteer Aide Henry Duncan, of Kentucky, of Jackson's staff, reported to me for duty after the fall of their gallant general.

Lieut. C. C. Parsons, Fourth U. S. Artillery, also reported to me for duty after his battery had fallen into the hands of the enemy. He behaved with great bravery the entire day and the loss of his battery was no fault of his; he remained with it until deserted by every man around him.

Capt. W. P. Anderson, assistant adjutant-general to General Terrill, also reported to me after the fall of his chief, and behaved with coolness and bravery during the day.

My casualties during the day were very large. The nation is called upon to mourn the loss of such spirits as Jackson, Terrill, Webster, Jouett, Campbell, Berryhill, Herrell, and others, who fell upon this bloody field.

A list of killed and wounded of the Third and Tenth Divisions is herewith inclosed.*

All of which is respectfully submitted.

A. McD. McCOOK,

Major-General, Commanding First Corps.

Col. J. B. FRY, Chief of Staff.

Report of Brig. Gen. Lovell H. Rousseau, U. S. Army, commanding Third Division.

HDQRS. THIRD DIVISION, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
In the Field, October 17, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by the Third Division, Army of the Ohio, in the battle of Chaplin Hills, fought on the 8th instant:

On the morning of the 8th, on the march, General McCook showed me an order of General Buell, in which it was said he should move cautiously on approaching Perryville, as the enemy would probably make resistance in that vicinity.

When near Chaplin Hills battle ground, and perhaps 3 miles from Perryville, the report of artillery to our right and front was heard, and General McCook ordered me to advance my cavalry and infantry in reconnaissance, leaving the artillery on an eminence in the road. I moved on with the infantry, preceded by six companies of the Second Kentucky Cavalry (Col. Buckner Board), and when near the field of battle Colonel Board reported the enemy in sight. I halted the column and sent back for General McCook, and he and I rode forward to the front, examined the ground, and chose a line of battle, to be adopted if the enemy advanced upon us, and soon after moved up to Russell's house, on the hill overlooking the field, and there halted the head of the column. While there the artillery (two pieces) of Captain Harris' [Hotchkiss'] battery, with Gay's cavalry, continued to fire, and small-arms were also heard.

Gay addressed a note to me, saying he had been pursuing the enemy all the morning, was pressing him then, and much needed a regiment of infantry to support his pieces. I ordered the Forty-second Indiana Regiment to do so, and rode forward to his pieces and found him and Captain Harris [Hotchkiss] there. The enemy was just disappearing in the woods far to the front, and out of the range of Harris' [Hotchkiss'] ordinary brass pieces. I then ordered up Loomis, with two of his Parrott guns, and he shelled the woods, the enemy now and then appearing, until finally he was no longer to be seen, and the firing was ordered to be stopped. Everything indicated that the enemy had retired and it was so believed. General McCook rode off to see General Buell, understood to be 2 or 3 miles to our right.

Waiting perhaps an hour, I concluded to resume the march to Chaplin Creek, then probably a mile to our front, to get water for my men, who were suffering intensely for the want of it. There was a small pool in the bed of a little stream to the right of Loomis' two pieces, to which the Forty-second Indiana was directed in order to obtain a supply, and the main column was then ordered forward; but when the head of the column was within a hundred or two yards of Loomis' pieces I halted it and went forward to see what was reported to be the enemy reappearing in the woods beyond, and in a few minutes I could see him plainly, and the discharge of shell from three batteries massed gave unmistakable evidence of his presence in force. I ordered Loomis to reply and bring up the remainder of his guns, and sent an order to Captain Simonson, Fifth Indiana Artillery, to join Loomis; all of which was promptly done. I then sent an order to Colonel Lytle to form his brigade on the right in good position, and galloped back to place Harris' brigade in position to resist the advance of the enemy, which I was just informed by a messenger from Captain Wickliffe, of Colonel Board's cavalry, was being made in that direction in great force, of cavalry, infantry, and artillery. I aided Colonel Harris, commanding Ninth Brigade, to form his brigade in two lines, the Second Ohio, Lieutenant-Colonel Kell; the Tenth Wisconsin, Colonel Chapin, and the Thirty-third Ohio, Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, being in the front line. Soon after this, by a messenger, Colonel Starkweather, commanding Twenty-eighth Brigade, announced his arrival on the left, his brigade having been unfortunately cut off and separated from my division by General Jackson's column that morning at Mackville; but he had the good sense when he heard firing in front to abandon the road, move around Jackson's column, and, by going through the field, to fall in on our left, and I found his brigade on the very spot where it was most needed.

* Embodied in revised statement, p. 1033.

A large body of the enemy's cavalry, appearing that moment $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the front, was admirably shelled and dispersed in great disorder by Captain Stone, First Kentucky Artillery.

I then directed Colonel Starkweather to place Stone's battery and that of Captain Bush, Fourth Indiana Artillery, on a high ridge, on the extreme left, and extending diagonally to the front, and to support those batteries with the First Wisconsin (Lieutenant-Colonel Bingham), placed on that ridge, and by the Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania (Colonel Hambricht), placed on another ridge, running at almost right angles to the one on which the batteries were planted. This formation gave a cross-fire, and proved of infinite value in maintaining that all-important position during the day. These formations were made in great haste and in a few moments, but without the least confusion or disorder, the men moving into line as if on parade.

I then returned to Harris' brigade, hearing that the enemy was close upon him, and found that the Thirty-third Ohio had been ordered farther to the front by General McCook and was then engaged with the enemy, and needed support. General McCook in person ordered the Second Ohio to its support, and sent direct to me to order up the Twenty-fourth Illinois also, Captain Mauff, commanding. I led the Twenty-fourth Illinois, in line of battle, immediately forward, and it was promptly deployed as skirmishers by its commander, and went gallantly into action on the left of the Thirty-third Ohio. The Second Ohio, moving up to the support of the Thirty-third Ohio, was engaged before it arrived on the ground where the Thirty-third was fighting. The Thirty-eighth Indiana, Col. B. F. Scribner commanding, then went gallantly into action on the right of the Second Ohio. Then followed in support the Ninety-fourth Ohio (Colonel Frizell). I wish here to say of this regiment that, although new and but a few weeks in the service, it behaved most gallantly, under the steady lead of its brave Colonel Frizell.

Colonel Harris' whole brigade, Simonson's battery on its right, was repeatedly assailed by overwhelming numbers, but gallantly held its position. The Thirty-eighth Indiana and Second Ohio, after exhausting their ammunition and that taken from the boxes of the dead and wounded on the field, still held their positions, as did also, I believe, the Tenth Wisconsin and Thirty-third Ohio. For this gallant conduct these brave men are entitled to the gratitude of the country, and I thank them here, as I did on the field of battle.

After the Twenty-fourth Illinois went into action I saw the undisciplined troops of General Jackson in front, in support of Parsons' battery, of Jackson's division, yielding the field in great confusion under a most terrific fire of the enemy, who was moving in the direction of my extreme left. General Jackson was killed. The support to Parsons' battery giving way, the guns were captured, but the gallant captain brought off his horses and company.

Seeing the enemy moving toward our left in great force with the apparent view of turning it, driving some broken and disordered regiments before them, I galloped around to Colonel Starkweather, on the left, and directed him to open his batteries (Stone's and Bush's) on the enemy. The order was promptly and effectually executed. The firing was admirable, and the heavy musketry of the advancing enemy was received by the gallant First Wisconsin with shouts of defiance, placing their caps on their bayonets. I ordered the regiment to lie down under cover and await the nearer approach of the enemy, but the artillery repulsed the enemy again and again, and held him in check for several hours, until finally a fresh and overwhelming force moved straight forward toward the guns.

I should have stated that the Twenty-first Wisconsin, Colonel Sweet, was to the front of these batteries, in a corn field, lying down, awaiting the approach of the enemy, and when he approached with his overwhelming force this new regiment poured into his ranks a most withering fire. The steady advance and heavy fire of the enemy caused a portion of this regiment to break in confusion, but the most of it, under its gallant officers, stood manfully to its work till forced to retire, which it did in pretty good order. The enemy were then in reach of the First Wisconsin and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania. I had great confidence in the gallantry of these two regiments, and was not disappointed when this time of trial came. They drove back the enemy several times with great loss, and when their ammunition was exhausted bravely maintained their position, and then quietly (not under fire) retired under orders to the line of battle originally selected by General McCook and myself, where they got a supply of ammunition and were again ready for action. Their loss is very heavy.

The fire of musketry on them and the batteries was terrific, Captain Bush at that place losing 35 horses; but he and Stone, taking all their pieces, fell back with their supports, and at once renewed the conflict and continued it until after dark. At the time this retrograde movement was ordered I sent an order to Colonel Harris to fall back also. The right, Colonel Lytle's brigade, had an hour before been drawn in, thus contracting and rendering more compact the line so thin and depleted by our loss in killed and wounded.

Before this final struggle on the left I had heard that Lytle's brigade had been outflanked on the right by an overwhelming force of the enemy and was falling back. During the day I was so hard pressed on the left and center by the continuous and persistent assaults of the enemy, and knowing if our left was turned our position was lost and a total rout of the army corps would follow, I felt the importance of my presence there, and could not look after the interests of the Seventeenth Brigade; but the whole division fought under the eye of Major-General McCook, commanding First Army Corps, Army of the Ohio, and I felt no fear that anything necessary for its safety would be neglected; and, besides, Lieut. F. J. Jones, my assistant adjutant-general, was often sent to learn its condition, and reported to me, although severely assailed, it had triumphantly repulsed the enemy in several attacks, and that Colonel Lytle felt that he could easily maintain his position; but late in the afternoon an immense force of fresh troops of the enemy, moving around to his right, concealed by the undulation of the ground, turned his right flank and fell upon the right and rear of his brigade, and drove it and forced it to retire, which it did under the orders of Colonel Lytle, who was at the same moment wounded, as he thought, fatally, and, refusing to be taken from the field, was taken prisoner by the enemy.

Hearing of this condition of things I galloped over toward the right, and found the brigade formed in line of battle, the right (the Fifteenth Kentucky Volunteers, Colonel Pope) resting on the hill at Clark's house, with Loomis' battery immediately in the rear on an eminence, the Tenth Ohio, Lieutenant-Colonel Burke, and the Third Ohio, Colonel Beatty, on the left of the road. These regiments had, without support, struggled hard to hold their line of battle for several hours, and were only forced to retire after immense loss and the movements of the enemy above referred to.

While near the Fifteenth Kentucky I saw a heavy force of the enemy advancing upon our right, the same that had turned Lytle's right flank. It was moving steadily up, in full view of where General Gilbert's army corps had been during the day, the left flank of which was not more than 400 yards from it. On approaching the Fifteenth Kentucky (though broken and shattered) it rose to its feet and cheered, and as one man moved to the top of the hill, where it could see the enemy, and I ordered it to lie down.

I then rode up to Loomis' battery and directed him to open upon the enemy. He replied that he was ordered by General McCook to reserve what ammunition he had for close work. Pointing to the enemy advancing, I said it was close enough, and would be closer in a moment. He at once opened fire with alacrity and with fearful effect upon the ranks of the enemy. It was admirably done; but the enemy moved straight ahead, his ranks now raked by the battery and terribly thinned by the musketry of the Seventeenth Brigade, but he scarcely faltered; and finally hearing that re-enforcements were approaching, the brigade was ordered to retire and give place to them, which it did in good order, as did also Captain Loomis.

The re-enforcements were from Mitchell's division, as I understood, and were Pea Ridge men. I wish I knew who commanded the brigade, that I might do him justice. I can only say the brigade moved directly into the fight like true soldiers, opened a terrific fire, and drove back the enemy. It was a gallant body of men.

After repulsing the enemy they retired a few hundred yards to a piece of woods, to encamp, and during the night the enemy advanced his pickets in the woods on our left front and captured a good many of our men, who went there believing we still held the woods.

It was in this way that my assistant adjutant-general, Lieut. F. J.

Jones, and Lieut. J. A. Grover, assistant adjutant-general of the Seventeenth Brigade, were captured by the enemy. I regretted the capture of these young gentlemen deeply. They had behaved most gallantly during the day, and I can truly say deserve well of their country.

Major Hopkins, with three companies of the First Michigan Mechanics and Engineers, remained on the field during the day, and late in the evening formed a line of battle on a line with a portion of the Seventeenth Brigade on the left of the road. Their force was too small to oppose the advancing column of the enemy. They took shelter behind Clark's house, but were forced to retire with the Seventeenth Brigade, which was done in good order. They lost quite a number in wounded and missing.

The conduct of the officers and men under the fire of the rebels was admirable. The Eighty-eighth Indiana, Colonel Humphrey, was with the Seventeenth Brigade on the right. It was not under my eye, but I was informed that it (though a new regiment) behaved well.

I have thus given a general statement of the battle and such incidents as occur to me. It was a hard and gallantly fought field, and the country is called upon to mourn the loss of many brave men who fought in it. My division fought it under many disadvantages. It was attacked on ground well known to the enemy and fixed upon by him as the battle-field, and while it was on the march and it was impossible for us to know much of the nature of the ground on which we fought. My men too were suffering intensely for want of water, having been scantily supplied for a day or two; but they fought it bravely and against three or four times their number of the best soldiers of the rebel army and under the directions and eyes of Bragg, Buckner, Polk, Cheatham, and other prominent generals of the rebel army. If of the old troops any man flinched I do not know it and have not heard of it. Very few men of the undisciplined new regiments behaved badly.

I had an opportunity of seeing and knowing the conduct of Colonel Starkweather, of the Twenty-eighth Brigade; Colonel Harris, of the Ninth Brigade, and the officers and men under their commands, and I cannot speak too highly of their bravery and gallantry on that occasion. They did cheerfully and with alacrity all that brave men could do.

Colonel Lytle, of the Seventeenth Brigade, fell severely wounded while gallantly maintaining his position on the right, and doubtless the country is as much indebted to him and the brave men of his brigade as to those whose conduct I witnessed.

To the whole division I tender my sincere thanks for their gallantry on that bloody day.

I also acknowledge my indebtedness to Lieut. F. J. Jones, my assistant adjutant-general, and to Lieuts. William P. McDowell, L. S. Hartman, D. L. Rousseau, and Harrison Millard, my regular aides, and to W. F. G. Shanks, my volunteer aide, for gallant bearing and efficient services rendered on the battle-field.

I also acknowledge my indebtedness to Lieuts. George W. Landrum, of the Second Ohio; William Quinton, of the Nineteenth Illinois; James H. Connelly, of the Thirty-seventh Indiana, and the Signal Corps of the Third Division for gallantry and valuable services on the field. They attended me voluntarily, though not their place to do so, through the thickest of the fight.

My orderlies, Sergt. Damos Emory and the rest, behaved gallantly through the battle.

Col. Buckner Board, of the Second Kentucky Cavalry, and his command rendered efficient service in making reconnaissances to the front and skirmishing with the enemy.

I herewith transmit the reports of Colonels Starkweather, Harris, and Pope,* and also a list of casualties in my division, amounting in all to 1,950 in killed and wounded.† My division was about 7,000 strong when it went into action. We fought the divisions of Anderson, Cheatham, and Buckner.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Third Division.

Capt. JOHN A. CAMPBELL,

Actg. Asst. Adjt. Gen., First Corps d'Armée, Army of the Ohio.

No. 6.

Report of Col. Leonard A. Harris, Second Ohio Infantry, commanding Ninth Brigade.

SIR: I have the honor to report the part taken by the Ninth Brigade in the action of the 8th of October at Chaplin Hills.

At the commencement of the action the brigade was on the right center and on the left of the Seventeenth Brigade. By direction of the general Captain Simonson's Fifth Indiana Battery was placed on my right, where Loomis' battery was engaged, and the Tenth Wisconsin Regiment directed to support it. The Thirty-third Ohio was on the left, with skirmishers well advanced to the front in the woods; the Second Ohio and Thirty-sixth Indiana in the center, with the Ninety-fourth as a reserve.

The firing becoming very warm on the right, by direction of Major-General McCook the Thirty-eighth Indiana was sent to their support. I placed them in the rear of Simonson's battery, Loomis having withdrawn. The action had now become general along the whole line. Captain Simonson, with two batteries playing on him and a heavy infantry force advancing on him and firing, nobly fought his battery, until, having lost 16 horses and 14 men in killed and wounded, by direction of Major Cotter, chief of artillery, he retired his battery. I immediately directed the Thirty-eighth Indiana to take position where the battery had been. This was not done a moment too soon, as the enemy were advancing on us. By a well-directed volley from the Thirty-eighth Indiana, Col. B. F. Scribner commanding, and the Tenth Wisconsin, Col. A. R. Chapin commanding, they were driven behind the crest of the hill. They again advanced, but were driven back. This was done for the third time, when they took position behind the crest of the hill.

At this time the firing was very heavy. I now sent back for the Ninety-fourth Ohio, Colonel Frizell commanding, but was informed that they had been directed by Major-General McCook to support a section of artillery which General Terrill was working. The positions of the other regiments had all been changed. The Second Ohio, Lieut. Col. John Kell commanding, and the Thirty-third Ohio, Lieut. Col. O. F. Moore commanding, were fiercely engaged with the enemy, who were making desperate efforts to pierce the center. It was at this point that Lieutenant-Colonel Moore was wounded and taken prisoner.

* The reports of Starkweather and Pope not found.

† Embodied in revised statement, p. 1033.

I saw the necessity of holding my position, with or without support, until the right was successful or compelled to retire, and I determined to do so. If I had been driven back the Seventeenth Brigade would have been cut off from the main body and in my judgment irretrievably lost. During this part of the engagement Colonel Scribner informed me that the regiment on the right was not firing. I sent Lieutenant Spencer, my aide, to inquire the cause and to ascertain what regiment it was. On his return he informed me that it was the Tenth Ohio, and that Colonel Lytle said that they were reserving their fire. Half an hour afterward I sent to Colonel Lytle, informing him that I had been compelled to withdraw the Tenth Wisconsin for want of ammunition. The withdrawal of this regiment left an interval of 200 yards on the left of the Thirty-eighth Indiana. In the mean time the Fifteenth Kentucky and Third Ohio, which were on the extreme right, were compelled to retire. Colonel Scribner now informed me that they had exhausted their ammunition and were using the ammunition of the dead and wounded. My aide that I sent after support and ammunition informed me that no support could be had and that ammunition was some distance to the rear. The only aide I now had with me having had his horse shot under him, I rode over to Colonel Lytle and informed him of the condition of things. Upon my return to the Thirty-eighth Indiana I found they had exhausted the cartridges of the dead and wounded. Colonel Scribner then directed his men to fix bayonets and hold the position, which was promptly done. Without a round of ammunition, under a heavy fire in front and an enfilading fire from the artillery, they held their position for twenty-five minutes. Seeing the hopelessness of longer attempting to hold the position I gave the order to retire, which was done in perfect order. I had not fallen back more than 100 yards when a tremendous fire from a column of infantry, which had turned the right flank of the Tenth Ohio, was poured in upon their left and my retiring column.

I retired to the woods in the rear of the corn field, where I met the Thirty-third Ohio, who had just replenished their cartridges. I directed Major Lock, who was commanding, to place them in position parallel to the fence separating the woods from the corn field, and at right angles to the road and immediately opposite the white house, directing them to hold the enemy in check until the Thirty-eighth Indiana and Third Ohio were supplied with cartridges. The Tenth Ohio came up at this moment, under the command of the gallant Colonel Burke, and took position on the left of the Thirty-third Ohio. At this time the Second Ohio were warmly engaged with the enemy on our then left, stubbornly falling back, and husbanding their ammunition, which was nearly exhausted. I also met the gallant and lamented Colonel Webster rallying a regiment of his brigade which was in confusion. I assisted him, and as soon as order was restored requested him to form in the rear of the Thirty-third and Tenth Ohio Regiments, so that the balance of my command might supply themselves with ammunition. This he promptly did. At this moment I again met General Rousseau riding among and encouraging the soldiers.

As soon as the Second and Third Ohio, the Thirty-eighth Indiana, and the Tenth Wisconsin were supplied with ammunition I formed them into line to cover the retiring of the Thirty-third and Tenth Ohio and that portion of Webster's command engaged, directing the Tenth Wisconsin to move obliquely to the right, to support a battery engaged to the right of the road. From this point by your orders I retired the line about 100 yards, when I met and attached to my command the Fiftieth Ohio, under command of the lieutenant-colonel, and bivouacked for the night.

When all have done so well it is sufficient to say, from reports of commanding officers of the regiments and my own observations during the day, that the field and line officers, without an exception, conducted themselves nobly and to my entire satisfaction. Too much praise cannot be awarded the soldiers, every one acting like a hero. My acting assistant adjutant-general, Lieut. George A. Vandegrift, and aides, and Lieuts. F. J. Fitzwilliam and H. E. Spencer were of great service to me during the day, coolly and bravely carrying my orders to all parts of the field. Major Johnson, Tenth Wisconsin, Captain Berryhill, acting major Second Ohio; Capt. John Herrell, Second Ohio, and Captain Drury, Ninety-fourth Ohio, fell gallantly fighting at their posts.

I thought proper to mention other regiments as they became attached to my command during the progress of the action through the loss of their brigade commanders. I also send you reports of regiments which were not under my immediate eye during part of the day. The following is the loss of the brigade:*

Command.	Commissioned officers.		Non-commissioned officers and privates.
	Killed.	Wounded.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.
2d Ohio	2	3	25	77	10
3d Ohio		4	21	70	18
8th Indiana		1	29	121	1
4th Wisconsin	1	2	40	103	4
4th Ohio	1		7	25	7
5th Indiana Battery			2	16	3
Total	4	10	124	412	43

This list is furnished from the men actually buried and the wounded in the hospitals. Some of the missing have since returned, having been taken prisoner while going for water and paroled. The brigade went into action 2,250 strong, including Simonson's battery.

Very respectfully,

L. A. HARRIS,
Colonel, Commanding Ninth Brigade.

Captain McDOWELL, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Col. Benjamin F. Scribner, Thirty-eighth Indiana Infantry.

HDQRS. THIRTY-EIGHTH INDIANA VOLUNTEERS,
Near Harrodsburg, Ky., October 13, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report the following facts concerning the part taken by my command in the battle of Chaplin Hills, October 8:

After having occupied several positions during the preliminary arrangements for the contest I was ordered to the front to support a battery, but upon arrival at the position indicated the battery was retired. I was ordered to form on the brow of the hill, on the right of the Tenth Wisconsin, which was there warmly engaged, which we did, under a heavy fire from the enemy's infantry in front of the right of my line. We occupied this position about two and a half hours, my men taking deliberate aim at every shot. They here spent the 40 rounds in their boxes and then used those in the boxes of the killed and wounded. After this they fixed bayonets and awaited orders.

* But see revised statement, p. 1033.

About this time the right and center of the brigade on our right was seen to give way, when you ordered us to retire, which we did in good order, under a terrific fire from the enemy, who had turned our right and opened upon us with a battery on our right. We halted at your order on the hill on the edge of the woods, and while awaiting the arrival of ammunition were trampled over by a regiment of our troops in full retreat, and my men, to their credit be it spoken, remained firmly in their places. Not a man was observed to share the panic, but, with bayonets fixed, were prepared to repel whatever should come.

The retiring regiments having again formed we were ordered to pass our column to the rear, which was promptly done. We there found our ammunition wagon and supplied our wants immediately. From this position we were ordered to move down the hill to support a battery which was threatened from the left, and where we maintained our position until the close of the engagement.

I have been thus brief in the description, from the fact that during the day we were under your personal observation.

I cannot close without specially noticing the gallant conduct of Lieut. Col. D. F. Griffin, from whose judgment and self-possession I received much assistance.

The conduct of my adjutant, George Devol, was most praiseworthy.

With regard to the officers of the line, it would be invidious to specify by name when all did their whole duty so nobly. They, without exception, remained in their places and gave their whole attention to the work before them, cautioning their men to be sure of their aim and preventing them from uselessly exposing themselves.

Of the men I can only say that they were never more obedient and manageable on drill than upon this occasion, and I believe would have died on the spot rather than to have moved without orders.

The severity of the engagement may be correctly inferred from the following facts: That of the color rank and guard but 3 remain; 5 were killed, and the color-bearer severely wounded in two places. Two others had their clothes penetrated by balls, and but one remained unscathed. The colors were riddled almost to shreds, the top of the staff shot away, and the center cut in two.

Our loss on the field was: Killed, 27; officers wounded, 4; enlisted men wounded, 119. Total, 150.*

We lost in prisoners (taken after they had passed through the engagement with us) 7, 2 of them while assisting the wounded from the field; the others, while in search of water, wandering within the enemy's lines.

HDQRS. THIRTY-THIRD REGT. OHIO VOL. INFANTRY,
Camp near Harrodsburg, Ky., October 13, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith my official report of the loss sustained by this regiment in the action at Chaplin Hills on the 8th instant:

It is deemed unnecessary to enter into a minute detail of the action of my command on that day. The brigade commander, by his presence at the different parts of the field, is no doubt familiar with the conduct of this regiment.

At an early period of the action Lieut. Col. O. F. Moore, commanding, was wounded while gallantly encouraging his men, and, refusing assistance to leave the field, fell into the hands of the enemy. His wound, I am happy to state, was not dangerous, and he has since been paroled.

With the conduct of my officers and men I am perfectly content. My orders were at all times obeyed with alacrity, and their conduct throughout the whole engagement merits my approbation.

The loss sustained was 21 killed, 74 wounded, and 10 missing; total, 105.* Of the number reported to be missing 6 are known now to have been captured and paroled.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. J. LOCK,
Major, Commanding.

Report of Col. Joseph W. Frizell, Ninety-fourth Ohio Infantry.

ARMY OF THE OHIO,
In the Field, October 10, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to make the following report as to the part my command (Ninety-fourth Ohio Regiment) took in the action of the 8th instant at Chaplin Hills:

I formed my regiment, by order of General Rousseau, as a reserve, on the left and in the rear of Simonson's battery, but before it became necessary for me to go directly to the support of the battery I was ordered up by an aide of General McCook to the support of Terrill's battery. I moved up by my left flank, in double-quick, about 800 yards, some 200 yards to the left of the battery, where I found the enemy in great force, and where our forces had given way. I had scarcely halted my command and fronted when a most murderous and incessant fire from infantry was opened upon me. My men stood their ground for about three-quarters of an hour, when the enemy began gradually to fall back. Fresh troops at this moment came up and took our position, but was informed that I again must take the front. Knowing that I was almost out of ammunition, my only alternative was to resort to the bayonet. I moved forward with the expectation of using cold steel, but was satisfied to find that the enemy had promptly left when they saw us making toward them. They gave way entirely in front of us, and after advancing some 125 yards and not being supported I did not feel authorized to proceed farther.

* But see revised statement, p. 1033.

My regiment remained in this position some half an hour, nothing occurring of note except that a rebel colonel came a little too close to us to make observations, when one of Company F's men shot him off his horse. He was brought inside of our lines and expired a few moments afterward. My attention was diverted to my rear, when I saw that a portion of Terrill's battery was going past me in hot haste, and heavy volleys of infantry to the right and rear of me. I immediately formed my men so as to meet the enemy's right, who appeared to be driving our men down the ridge we first occupied. The enemy, however, was checked before they reached our last line. I remained until I received your order to take another position about dark.

The numerous dead bodies found upon the ground in front of the position I occupied showed that the enemy were severely punished. In the early part of the engagement Capt. John C. Drury, of Company B, fell shot through the heart. A finer officer or a braver man fell not that day. In the death of Captain Drury the company lost a gallant leader, the regiment an officer whose place I am fearful will never be filled.

The officers and men of the regiment behaved most gallantly, going into action under a fire almost unprecedented in the annals of war for severity. It was astonishing to see the line stand as steadily as if in mere practice. Lieutenant-Colonel Bassford and Major King displayed great coolness and bravery, and these gentlemen are entitled to great credit for the successful action of my command on this occasion. James E. Edmunds, acting adjutant, rendered great aid. I commend him for his activity and gallantry. Sergt. Maj. William D. Putnam, during the hottest of the fire, attracted the attentive admiration of the officers of the regiment and incited the men by his great courage and daring. Our chaplain, Rev. William Arlington, gave ample proof of a Christian and kind-hearted gentleman by his incessant care to our wounded men.

I went into action with 500 men. My loss, in killed, 8; wounded, 25; prisoners, 2; missing, 5. Total, 40.*

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. FRIZELL,

Colonel Ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

HDQRS. TENTH REGIMENT WISCONSIN VOLUNTEERS,
Chaplin Hills, Ky., October 11, 1862.

SIR: I would most respectfully report that on October 8, at the battle of Chaplin Hills, by your order my regiment was sent to support Simonson's battery.

I took into the fight 360 enlisted men and 16 commissioned officers. In about three hours after taking our position we were attacked by a very large body of infantry, which charged over the ridge directly in our front. Three volleys from my regiment sent them back over the ridge, where we held them until support came from the Thirty-eighth Indiana Regiment, Colonel Scribner.

The battery having retired, the Thirty-eighth Indiana and my own regiment sustained the attack over one hour and thirty minutes, when, having expended all the cartridges, together with all in the boxes of the dead and wounded, by your order we retired for ammunition, which was done in good order.

Our loss is as follows: Killed, 36; wounded, 109; missing, 4. Total, 149.*

Much credit is due to all the officers and soldiers of the regiment for their courage and coolness under a terrible fire of musketry and artillery; but to the soldiers in the ranks is the most credit due, as the nature of the fight was such as to require no military science, but simply brave men.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. R. CHAPIN,

Colonel Tenth Wisconsin Volunteers.

Report of Capt. Peter Simonson, Fifth Indiana Battery.

CAMP NEAR HARRODSBURG, KY.,

October 12, 1862.

The colonel's order of this date was just received. I have to report in the action of Chaplin Hills a loss of 2 men killed, 16 wounded, and 3 missing;* also 16 horses killed on the field and 4 horses so badly disabled that I was obliged to leave them. My loss in material was one limber blown up by a shell striking it, the caisson of which we secured in the morning, but left behind for want of limber and horses. We also lost eight sets of artillery harness and several other small articles of artillery equipments not essential to the working of the guns.

The part taken by my battery during the action was as follows:

We were first ordered to take position by Colonel Harris some 400 yards east of the white hospital, and to the left of the road, in a corn field. After the order was partly executed General Rousseau ordered the battery forward to support Loomis on his left. We then, at about 1 p. m., opened fire on the enemy's batteries on the opposite hills, distance, respectively, one directly in front, say 1,600 yards; another, a little to our right, about the same, and another, still farther to the right, about 1,000 yards.

About 2 p. m. Loomis' battery fell back, and the enemy's battery on our extreme right advanced to a position about 800 yards distant on our right flank, under cover of thick woods. Our firing up to this time and until about 3 o'clock was directed principally against the two batteries in our front, up to which time we had suffered but little.

About 3 o'clock the fire of the battery on our right began to tell on us. At the same time large bodies of infantry appeared about 400 yards, directly in front and on our left and right flanks. I informed Colonels Chapin and Burke, of the Tenth Wisconsin and Tenth Ohio Volunteers, of these facts, who came to my support in the most prompt and gallant manner, the Thirty-eighth Indiana at this time occupying ground some 200 yards in the rear of the battery.

* But see revised statement, p. 1033.

From this time until 3.30 p. m. we fired canister as rapidly as the men were able to work the guns, when we were ordered by Major Cotter, chief of artillery on General McCook's staff, to find a new position, where we could use the balance of our canister with effect. We would have been unable to execute this order but for the gallant support of the Tenth Wisconsin, Tenth Ohio, and the Thirty-eighth Indiana. Major Cotter placed us in position on the right of the road, near the old straw-stack, where one of the enemy's shells struck one of the limber chests.

Abandoned this position by order of Major Cotter at 4 p. m. and took position a little in rear of the white house, next to the woods, in which the brigade was formed the next morning. Finding we could not reach the enemy from this point, we then took position on the crown of the hill, across and in the road, about 100 yards in rear of the white house. At this point we fired away the remainder of our canister and then withdrew.

At about dark we took position in battery and went into camp for the night on the slope of the next hill about 500 yards in rear of the headquarters of the Ninth Brigade.

We fired during the action 755 rounds. The command was composed on entering the fight of 90 men. We brought from the field all our wounded.

Respectfully, yours,

PETER SIMONSON,
Captain, Commanding.

HDQRS. EIGHTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT INDIANA VOLS.,
Camp near Harrodsburg, Ky., October 12, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to make the following report of the part taken by the regiment under my command in the battle of Chaplin Hills on the 8th instant:

The regiment took up its line of march from the camp near Mackville at 5.30 a. m. and arrived at 10 a. m., after a fatiguing march of 7 miles without water, on the ground which was afterward the battle-field. I placed my regiment in line of battle on the left of the main road in a thick woods on the crest of a hill commanding the valley in front, the Third Ohio Volunteers on my left and the Fifteenth Kentucky on my right at right angles. After remaining in this position two hours I was ordered to move my regiment, by Major-General Rousseau, down to a position about 400 feet in front of the house on the hill. After remaining in this position under fire I moved back the regiment while under a severe fire in admirable order to a position on the right of the main road, commanding the cleared fields in front, my left resting on the house on the hill and my right resting in a valley at about an angle of 45° to the road. I remained in this position under a heavy fire of artillery and musketry. I ordered my men to lie on their faces. I waited patiently for an order to advance, which was received at 3 p. m., when I was ordered by Captain Grover, your acting assistant adjutant-general, to take a position in front in a ravine about parallel to our last position and 300 feet in advance. I lay in this position for an hour, when, finding that the enemy were about turning my left flank, I fell back without orders to the right of Loomis' battery, which was posted on the hill about 400 feet to the rear of the house on the hill. This movement was made under the most terrible fire of musketry and artillery. At this time the firing was the fiercest of the day. After remaining in this position about five minutes I ordered an advance to a position behind a fence and poured in about 20 rounds of ammunition upon the advancing enemy, which drove them back in about thirty minutes. By order of Major-General McCook, at 6 p. m. I was ordered to take position in the woods on the right of the cleared fields, where I bivouacked for the night. Finding my regiment in General Steedman's lines I reported to him, and being nearly out of ammunition, I made requisition for a supply and received it.

The loss in my regiment was 2 killed and 20 wounded and 6 taken prisoners while carrying the wounded from the field of battle after night. I also took 1 lieutenant and 5 privates prisoners, whom I turned over to General Steedman.

I take pleasure in saying that all of my officers and men behaved gallantly during the action, and particularly so my adjutant, H. B. Du Barry.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. HUMPHREY,

Colonel Eighty-eighth Indiana Volunteers.

Colonel POPE,

Comdg. Seventeenth Brig., Third Div., Army of the Ohio.

Report of Col. John Beatty, Third Ohio Infantry.

SIR: I herewith present a report of the operations of the regiment which I have the honor to command during the engagement of the 8th instant:

At 11 o'clock a. m. my regiment was ordered to take the advance of the brigade to which it belongs, and proceeded to the crest of the hill overlooking a branch of Chaplin Creek, when the enemy in front opened upon us from a battery and we were ordered to retire to the foot of the hill, some hundreds of yards in the rear. There we formed in line of battle and remained for more than an hour while the batteries were replying to those of the enemy.

About 2 p. m. the enemy were seen advancing toward our position, and my regiment was ordered to the crest of the hill. A battery, known as the Washington Battery, at once opened upon us, and I ordered my men to lie down and wait the approach of the enemy's infantry. The latter advanced under cover of a house upon the other side of the hill, and reaching a point 150 yards distant, deployed behind a stone fence, which was hidden from us by standing corn.

At this time my left wing rested upon a lane known as the ——— road, my line of battle extending along the crest of the hill and passing near to and somewhat beyond a large barn filled with hay. In this position, with a well-handled battery playing upon us, our first fire was delivered, the enemy replying with destructive effect. Capt. H. E. Cunard, Company I, was one of the first to fall, shot through the head, while gallantly performing his duty. A little later Capt. Leonidas McDougal, Company H, while waving his sword and cheering his men, fell pierced by a ball through the breast. Later still First Lieutenant Starr, Company K, died like a soldier in the midst of his men. About 175 of my regiment were killed and wounded upon the crest of the hill. Our line was steadfastly maintained until the barn on our right was fired by a shell from the enemy's batteries, and in a few minutes the heat became so intense that my right was compelled to fall back. After rallying we were relieved by the Fifteenth Kentucky, Col. Curran Pope, and our ammunition being nearly exhausted, we retired to the bottom of the hill. Soon after I sent Companies A, D, and F to act in conjunction with two companies of the Fifteenth Kentucky in endeavoring to hold a fence which ran along the side of a field in which we had been fighting and perpendicular to our former line, but the fire of the enemy's battery, combined with that of his infantry, was so deadly that these men were again ordered to retire. The Fifteenth Kentucky having by this time left the crest of the hill and the enemy opening from a new battery on our right a fire which completely enfiladed our line, I concluded, after consultation with Colonel Pope, to leave the ravine, filed off into the —— road and was marching toward the rear, when I perceived the enemy emerging from the woods upon our right and coming in great force toward the ground we had just been holding. I immediately ordered my regiment to face about and advanced to meet the enemy, intending, in the absence of ammunition, to charge him with the bayonet. I was met here, however, by Lieutenant Grover, of Colonel Lytle's staff, with an order from him to retire. Accordingly we turned into a ravine on the right of the road and were supplying ourselves with ammunition when, hearing that Colonel Lytle, my brigade commander, was killed, and being separated from the other regiments of the brigade, I reported to Colonel Harris, commanding the Ninth Brigade, for further duty. Night soon came on, however, and the engagement ceased.

During the battle the flag presented by the people of Ohio to the Third Regiment was gallantly upheld. It never once touched the earth, although the color-sergeant, Macoubrie, was killed; and after him five others who successively bore it were shot down.

My regiment went into action with 500 men. Our loss was 45 killed, 144 wounded, and 15 missing, a list of whom is hereunto annexed.* Fully appreciating the valor of my own officers and men, I desire to bear testimony to the gallant conduct of the Fifteenth Kentucky, whose members fought side by side with ourselves.

JOHN BEATTY,

Colonel, Comdg. Third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Col. CURRAN POPE, Commanding Seventeenth Brigade.

Report of Capt. Percival P. Oldershaw, U. S. Army, Assistant Adjutant-General, Tenth Division.

HDQRS. 10TH DIV., 1ST CORPS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
In Camp near Crab Orchard, Ky., October 15, 1862.

I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by this division in the action near Perryville, on Chaplin Heights, on the 8th instant:

At 8 a. m. the division, under the command of Brig. Gen. James S. Jackson, consisting of the Thirty-third Brigade, Brig. Gen. William R. Terrill commanding, viz: One hundred and fifth Ohio, Colonel Hall, 645 enlisted men; Eightieth Illinois, Colonel Allen, 659 enlisted men; One hundred and twenty-third Illinois, Colonel Monroe, 772 enlisted men; detachment, Colonel Garrard's, 194 enlisted men; light battery, Lieut. C. C. Parsons, 136 enlisted men, making a total of 2,406; and the Thirty-fourth Brigade, Col. George Webster commanding, viz: Ninety-eighth Ohio, Lieutenant-Colonel Poorman, 822 enlisted men; One hundred and twenty-first Ohio, Col. W. P. Reid, 814 enlisted men; Fiftieth Ohio, Col. J. R. Taylor, 655 enlisted men; Eightieth Indiana, Lieutenant-Colonel Brooks, 738 enlisted men; Nineteenth Indiana Battery, Capt. S. J. Harris, 142 enlisted men, making a total of 3,171, and a grand total of 5,577 enlisted men, left Mackville, on the road to Perryville, distant about 9 miles.

The One hundred and first Indiana, Colonel Garver, also belonging to the Thirty-third Brigade, was detached as guard to the train ordered that morning to Springfield, and consequently did not participate in the action.

We had not proceeded far before we heard the booming of cannon in the distance, and when about 3 miles on the road Captain Bartlett, of the artillery, and for the day acting as aide to General Terrill, met our front, with orders from General McCook to move up without delay, and to throw one regiment as skirmishers to the left of our line of march. Having to keep our column in rear of skirmishers, who were traveling on a very rough and broken country, we were delayed in our progress nearly an hour. The general, with his staff, rode forward to where temporary headquarters for the corps was established, and which afterward proved to be about the center of the scene of action.

At this time some batteries, I believe of General Rousseau's, were in action at long range on the right, and General Jackson, not then contemplating a general engagement, ordered me back to bring up the troops and to place the two brigades at rest on the right and left of the road. The Thirty-fourth Brigade, Colonel Webster, soon came up, and in my absence and delay in clearing the road of ambulances and ammunition wagons, to enable the Thirty-third Brigade to come up, the battery of Captain Harris was moved across the main road to the left and put in position on the right of a high, level ridge. It soon opened fire at long range, no enemy then being visible, and the regiments belonging to the same brigade were placed in position in the rear and left of the battery under the crest of the hill, as will be seen by the report of Lieut. E. E. Kennon, acting assistant adjutant-general, herewith submitted. Here I rejoined General Jackson. A few rounds having opened the enemy's batteries, a 12-pounder shot came within a foot of anticipating the fatal stroke our general received soon afterward.

Riding toward our left and a little in advance of Harris' battery we came upon an open knob, where we found General McCook and all his staff watching some beautiful artillery practice by Stone's battery farther on our left, which was firing up a wide ravine upon the enemy's cavalry moving up a road to our front.

Here Captain Parsons was located soon after, and by 2 p. m. opened with round shot and shell. The One hundred and twenty-third Illinois had been previously brought on the field forming our extreme left and angling toward the rear of the battery. Soon after the battery was in position the One hundred and fifth Ohio, Colonel Hall, came up and took position to the left and rear of the battery, and the Eightieth Illinois, Colonel Allen, through misdirection of the guide, came up later and formed in the valley near the edge of the woods, as will be seen by the report of Capt. William P. Anderson, assistant adjutant-general, herewith submitted.

This battery had fired but a few shots when we heard rifle-shots below in the woods, when the enemy soon advanced and came in sight in the edge of the woods fronting our troops. No sooner was this seen by General Terrill and Lieutenant Parsons, then directing the fire of the guns, than they changed the direction of the fire, and opened at short range (about 90 yards) on the flank of the enemy with grape with deadly accuracy. It checked the advance of the enemy, and after a few more rounds they changed front and faced the battery, which then flanked our left. General Terrill, seeing this, ordered the advance of the One hundred and twenty-third Illinois, Colonel Monroe, and to charge bayonets. It advanced bravely, but unfortunately the enemy had not then left the woods, and there was a rail fence on its edge, which prevented their advancing promptly. The regiment fired a volley and fell back, when almost immediately afterward General Jackson, who was standing on the left of the battery, was killed, two bullets entering his right breast. At the moment I was standing on the right of the battery, watching the gallant defense then being made by the troops on our left. Returning to the general to report the same, I found him on his back, struggling to speak, but unable to do so. He died in a few moments. His staff officers at once removed his body from the crest of the hill some 50 yards. Mr. Wing, one of the general's volunteer aides, went for an ambulance, and while I was absent, notifying General Terrill and Colonel Webster of the general's death, instructing the latter to take command of his entire brigade until he received further orders from General Terrill or myself, the battery had been taken by the enemy and the troops driven back from the open ground on the knob to the skirt of the woods, thus extending our left, and it was impossible to recover the body of our fallen general.

From this time up to 5 p. m. the battle raged with great fury and varied success on both sides. Two regiments, the Second and Ninety-fourth Ohio, belonging to General Rousseau's division, had come into our lines between the two batteries and behaved most gallantly.

Finding no enemy in front of Colonel Webster's brigade, which never lost a foot of ground up to this time, Colonel Webster rode off with me a little to the rear, where we found General McCook. He rode with us up to Colonel Webster's command and reported that his right was being heavily pressed and falling back. He and all of us then saw the progress of the enemy on Colonel Webster's right, as evidenced by the steady approach through the corn of a flag with a black ball in the center of a white ground, and he had hardly time to change the front of Colonel Webster's command (which was then all on exposed ground) when the enemy's infantry, arriving on the edge of the corn, opened fire upon them. The regiments moved down at a double-quick to the right face and formed in the woods, where they opened a deadly volley on the enemy, who were found in large numbers on the ground the next morning. They were killed mostly by the rifles of the Ninety-eighth Ohio. The enemy, however, still advanced, preventing Captain Harris from getting the whole of his battery off. Heavy firing all along this changed front still continued. The line, so far as was observable from this division, was then at a right angle with the main road instead of parallel with it as before, when fresh troops from the extreme right rushed in with rapidity and gallantry, checking the farther advance of the enemy and closing the fight at dark.

At 5.30 p. m. Col. George Webster fell from his horse mortally wounded. No man on that battle-field displayed more of the characteristics of the soldier than he did. He fully understood and most faithfully discharged his duty.

Of General Terrill's fatal wound I was not apprised until the battle closed, when I found him lying prostrate and receiving every aid and comfort from his devoted staff.

Up to the time of the loss of Lieutenant Parsons' battery both he and his adjutant-general, Capt. William P. Anderson, displayed such courage and persistent energy as is not to be surpassed. Lieutenant Parsons, whom I met passing through our lines after the loss of his battery, appeared perfectly unmanned and broken-hearted. His only remark was, "I could not help it, captain; it was not my fault."

Captain Harris, commanding the battery on the right, is, with his men, entitled to all praise for their steady fire, continued for three and a half hours. I cannot conceive a battery to be better served than his was.

Too high praise cannot be given to Lieut. E. E. Kennon, acting adjutant to the Thirty-fourth Brigade, and to Lieut. John Collins, of the Ninety-eighth Ohio, aide to Colonel Webster. It would be hard to conceive of two young officers discharging their duties with more unflinching courage than they showed.

With the exception of Capt. S. M. Starling, inspector-general of infantry and ordnance, all the staff officers left me and I believe reported to General McCook on the decease of our general. Capt. B. D. Williams, division quartermaster, knowing well the topography of the country, was detailed before the engagement on General McCook's staff, and of him and of the other staff officers I have no doubt high praise will be awarded by the general commanding the corps. At one time I found Lewis Craig, a volunteer aide, bravely rallying a regiment then in disorder.

Captain Starling, who staid with me during the whole engagement, rendered most valuable assistance. He joined the service only when the division was formed at Louisville, yet appreciated at a glance the importance of many positions and aided personally in maintaining them. His coolness and courage were unsurpassed. Nor was the courage of the troops at all at fault. It must be remembered that the position of the two batteries forming our right and left was taken without regard to the line of infantry battle. Yet our entire force, with the exception of two regiments, was formed between the two, and from the contracted space and from the fact that all the men and most of the officers, being of the last and recent call, were without experience in such matters, they many times went up in line of battle four, five, and six deep, and delivered their fire. Many of the officers, whose names I never knew, did their whole duty. Some failed, and among them I regret to report Col. J. R. Taylor, of the Fiftieth Ohio. He, though on the field and in sight of his men, was of no service to them. The first position that I saw him in was lying on his face, crouching behind a stump, and twice subsequently I saw him far to the rear of his regiment, while his men were in line of battle, apparently trying to rally some half a dozen stragglers.

I annex a statement of killed, wounded, and missing, amounting to near twenty per cent. of the force engaged.*

The loss of our general, crushing as it is to this young division, and falling as he did so early in the fight, will be felt more deeply by many of his brother commanders, whose friend he had been and whose friends they were. But none will miss him more or mourn his death more sincerely than I, who have been so near him during this unhappy war.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

PERCIVAL P. OLDERSHAW,
Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

Capt. JOHN A. CAMPBELL, A. A. A. G., First Army Corps.

Report of Capt. William P. Anderson, U. S. Army, Assistant Adjutant-General, Thirty-third Brigade.

HDQRS. THIRTY-THIRD BRIGADE, TENTH DIVISION,
FIRST CORPS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
October 10, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken in the action of the 8th instant by the Thirty-third Brigade, commanded by the late Brig. Gen. W. R. Terrill:

The One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers, Eightieth and One hundred and twenty-third Illinois, a detachment of the Seventh and Thirty-second Kentucky Volunteers and Third Tennessee Volunteers, under command of Colonel Garrard, of the Third Kentucky Volunteers, and Parsons' eight-gun battery (made up of detachments from the regiments of the brigade), arrived upon the scene of action about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th instant. The One hundred and first Indiana Volunteers was not present, having been sent that morning as a guard to a train to Springfield.

A short time after its arrival General Terrill was ordered by General Jackson to occupy a hill upon the extreme left of the line. General Terrill immediately rode forward to survey the position, directing the brigade to follow. During the time occupied in marching from the place where the general left the brigade to the position we occupied several messages were sent me by him to push forward with it as rapidly as possible. The distance was probably three-quarters of a mile. The One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers, being the advance regiment, arrived upon the ground first. It was marching by the flank right in front, and the rebels at the time could be seen within 200 yards advancing to occupy the same ground. The One hundred and twenty-third was immediately brought to face the enemy. The position of the parties unluckily threw the rear rank in front, which produced much confusion, the regiment being a new one. For 100 yards in front of them the ground was clear. The rebels were advancing in and protected by the woods beyond. They commenced pouring a heavy fire into the ranks of the One hundred and twenty-third, to which they nobly responded. Parsons' battery immediately took position in the rear of the One hundred and twenty-third. Six of his guns were brought to bear upon the enemy and drove them back. At this instant General Jackson was shot dead. He, with General Terrill, had been standing to the left of Parsons' battery, encouraging the men to stand to their places.

A heavy force of the enemy was now seen advancing upon both of our flanks. The One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers was ordered to meet them upon the left and the Eightieth Illinois Volunteers, with Colonel Garrard's detachment, upon the right. The One hundred and fifth were marching unfortunately like and thrown into line in the same form as the One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers, viz, rear rank in front. They at once opened fire upon the enemy, but did not succeed in stopping their advance. They moved up to within 100 yards of our line without discharging a musket. They then opened a deadly fire. In spite of the efforts of the officers most of our men broke and fell back in great confusion. Lieutenant Parsons at the time was placing his seventh gun into position, when every man at the piece deserted him. He was then ordered by General Terrill to withdraw his battery. He succeeded in bringing away but one gun, four caissons, and two limbers, the horses in the other carriages being killed or disabled.

General Terrill, assisted by some of the officers, succeeded in rallying about 200 men of the One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers and One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers at a fence about 100 yards in the rear of our first position. Here the conduct of some of the officers, I am sorry to report, was disgraceful. The Eightieth Illinois and Colonel Garrard's detachment behaved well. When the left gave way they were obliged to fall back, which they did in good order. The general ordered the fragment of the One hundred and fifth and One hundred and twenty-third to fall back, which they did in good order. He ordered me to find General McCook and to tell him his position and to ask for re-enforcements. General McCook informed me every regiment he had was in the hottest of the fight, but that he had asked for re-enforcements from General Gilbert, and as soon as they arrived General Terrill should be supplied.

Had the enemy pursued his advantage at this crisis the most disastrous results must have followed his vigor. Nothing but a very small, disorganized fragment of the division remained to dispute his possession of the Mackville road, upon which lay our ammunition train, ambulances, and such supplies as had accompanied us. Trusting that re-enforcements might yet reach him, General Terrill rallied the few troops he had left near the place where Bush's battery had taken position. While thus engaged he fell mortally wounded and was carried from the field. Although the command of the division devolved upon General Terrill after the death of General Jackson he fell before he assumed the command.

The brigade was in action less than an hour. Its loss during this time was very severe, as will be seen by the report of Colonel Hall, who assumed command upon the fall of General Terrill.

The conduct of First Lieut. C. C. Parsons, Fourth Artillery, who commanded an eight-gun battery manned by volunteers, cannot be too highly praised. He fought his guns nobly and drove back the advancing enemy, and not until overpowered by numbers did his men give way. Even then Lieutenant Parsons, deserted though he was, remained bravely at his post and had to be removed by force.

The conduct of Colonel Hall, commanding One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers; Colonel Allen, commanding Eightieth Illinois Volunteers, and Colonel Monroe, commanding One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers, is worthy of notice on account of their personal bravery and their efforts to rally their men, as is also that of Colonel Garrard, of the Third Kentucky Infantry.

Lieutenant Nichols, of the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry, and Lieutenant Tuttle, of the One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers, aides-de-camp, for the first time under fire, were of great assistance, manfully doing their duty.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. P. ANDERSON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Col. Albert S. Hall, One hundred and fifth Ohio Infantry.

HDQRS. TENTH DIVISION, FIRST ARMY CORPS,
Perryville Battle-field, Ky., October 10, 1862.

SIR: Having commanded the One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the engagement of the 8th instant near Perryville, Ky., it becomes my duty, although now commanding the Tenth Division, to report the part taken by said regiment in the battle. The regiment was on the march from Mackville to Perryville as part of the Thirty-third Brigade, commanded by General W. R. Terrill, in the Tenth Division, commanded by Brig. Gen. James S. Jackson, in the First Army Corps, commanded by Major-General McCook.

The Thirty-fourth Brigade, commanded by Colonel Webster, of the Ninety-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, was in the advance and engaged the enemy about 2.30 p. m. On hearing the fire of the skirmishers General Terrill ordered forward the Thirty-third Brigade with all possible dispatch and reached the field about 3 p. m.

My regiment was marching in rear of Parsons' battery, and at the moment of reaching the field was ordered to form on the left of the road in reserve. This point was occupied but for a few moments when the order of General Terrill was given to file to the left through the timber to the extreme left of the Union forces. Upon reaching my position I found the One hundred and twenty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, Colonel Monroe, hotly engaging the enemy to the right and rear of Parsons' battery, then in position.

At the moment of coming into position on the left and rear of Parsons' battery it was apparent that the enemy were determined to charge through the left of the One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers and cut off the battery.

This movement was immediately and effectually repulsed by the destructive fire of Parsons' battery and the charge of that wing of my regiment, most gallantly led by Major Perkins, executed by order of General Terrill, who was personally present.

The fire at this moment was terrific beyond description, and the running through my line of a six-horse team drawing a caisson created some disorder in my center. At almost the same moment of this repulse of the enemy a determined assault was made by them on our left. A battery opened on us from the enemy's right, and from the form of the ground nearly enfiladed my line. Parsons' battery was stationed on a sharp crest of open ground about 80 yards from a wood occupied by the enemy. From this crest the ground descended to the woods and then ascended, so that the enemy delivered us the fire of consecutive battalions in rear of each other. The battery was also on a crest which abruptly terminated on the left a few yards from the guns, exposing the support to a cross-fire from the enemy's extreme right, of which the enemy, as before described, promptly availed themselves.

Thus at the distance of 80 yards, in an open field, did Parsons' battery and the One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry deliver to the enemy a most terrible and destructive fire, receiving in return the fire of an enfilading battery and of a rebel brigade concealed in the woods. The battery becoming disabled, and the rebel battery on our flank making our position untenable, by the order of General Terrill in person I moved my regiment 60 yards to the rear and formed on the line of an old fence, then much broken down. The enemy followed the movement, and when he reached the crest (our former position) received a fire that opened their ranks with the wildest havoc. But the position of the ground was such that we were still under the fire of their battery, and the quick eye of General Terrill discovering a movement of the enemy in a ravine to turn our left, again ordered the regiment to retire into a corn field in our rear, which was done in good order and promptly formed. In this field, being much exposed to the artillery and musketry of the enemy and hidden from each other by the corn, some irregularity occurred in the line, while a movement by the flank, then ordered by General Terrill, who could not be seen or heard distinctly by the command, tended still more to divide and scatter the regiment. The most of the living, however, followed the movement promptly, and formed in the rear of Bush's battery, by General Terrill's order, and there remained in its support until the close of the engagement. At this last position, in the rear of Bush's battery, our brave and beloved Terrill, who had stood by my side and moved with my regiment from the moment it was engaged, fell mortally wounded by the fragment of a shell. At this moment the disability of the general threw the command of the Thirty-third Brigade upon me. Turning over the command of the One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry to Lieutenant-Colonel Tolles I proceeded to collect the brigade.

In the early part of the engagement and before the Thirty-third Brigade became engaged Lieutenant-Colonel Tolles with eight companies, by order of General Terrill, was sent to the left of the road a mile in rear of the line of battle to protect the rear. He joined me at Bush's battery, having come forward and joined in the engagement with the Eightieth Illinois Regiment. Of the bravery manifested by the officers and enlisted men of the One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry I can speak with the highest satisfaction. Not an officer and but few of the enlisted men flinched from the hail of death or left their positions until ordered by their proper officers. In the engagement at Perryville they have covered themselves with imperishable honor. Citizen soldiers, with not twenty days' drill, they have exhibited the coolness and efficiency of veterans. Of the mortality and of our wounded I speak with choking sorrow. Capt. L. D. Kee, Company I, and Robert Wilson, of Company H, are no more; they fell upon that fatal crest by Parsons' battery—the former dead, the latter mortally wounded. Braver or better men never lived; truer patriots never offered a holier sacrifice to their country's cause. On the same spot 29 enlisted men of my regiment gave their lives to the cause of constitutional liberty—each a precious offering on freedom's altar. God of the true and brave! these are thine; their country calls them no more. There too on that fatal spot were wounded no less than 130 of their gallant comrades.*

Report of Lieut. Ellis E. Kennon, Ninety-eighth Ohio Infantry, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General, Thirty-fourth Brigade.

NEAR CRAB ORCHARD, KY., October 18, 1862.

SIR: Owing to the death of Col. George Webster, commanding the Thirty-fourth Brigade of the Tenth Division of the Army of the Ohio, on the 8th instant, at Chaplin Heights, it becomes my duty to report to you the position and conduct of the brigade in that engagement.

The brigade arrived upon the battle-field about 1 p. m. and were by Colonel Webster immediately assigned position. The Nineteenth Indiana Battery, commanded by Captain Harris, occupied the crest of a hill. The country to the right and front of the battery being open, the enemy could not approach without being observed and receiving the fire of their guns. The Ninety-eighth Ohio, being under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Poorman, was ordered to move into position to the right of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery to assist in sustaining it, but owing to the nature of the ground it was found impossible for them to form in line of battle. The order was then modified, and the left wing was formed in the rear of the right wing, to be used as the peculiar circumstances of the attack might require. The Eightieth Indiana, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Brooks, occupied a position immediately to the rear and left of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery and to the left of the Ninety-eighth Ohio. The Fiftieth Ohio was first formed in the rear and to the left of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery, but remained in that position a very short time, and was, by order of Colonel Webster, reformed about 300 yards farther to the left, advancing to the crest of the hill in the woods near a small log cabin, with the exception, however, of two companies, which remained during the engagement lying to the left of the Ninety-eighth Ohio. These companies were under command of Captain Cook, and the officers and men deserve credit for the bravery and gallantry they exhibited upon the field.

The Fiftieth Ohio, for some reason, was not under the immediate supervision of its colonel, but was under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Strickland, assisted by Major Defrees, and continued to be under their command during the day. They both deserve credit.

The One hundred and twenty first Ohio was, by order of Colonel Webster, first formed in the rear of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery, to the left of the Ninety-eighth Ohio, but was subsequently ordered to support Parsons' battery; but owing to some considerable delay in arriving at the point designated they failed to be of any material assistance in defending the battery. Indeed, before the regiment had been formed in line upon the hill the battery had been taken and the enemy were approaching in very considerable force. The One hundred and twenty-first abandoned their position in bad order, but were subsequently partially reformed some distance to the rear and fought in a creditable manner. I deem it due to Colonel Reid to here state that he acted bravely and used his utmost exertions to rally his men, as also did the officers of his command; and I would further state that I believe it to be no fault of Colonel Reid's that his regiment did not reach the point assigned them in sufficient time, but it was owing to a misconception of the position on the part of the guide.

* See revised statement, p. 1034.

About 3 p. m. the left wing of the Ninety-eighth Ohio was ordered to the left to support Parsons' battery; but upon arriving at the point designated were ordered back to their original position.

The cannonading and fire of musketry had been for some time and continued to be until the close of the engagement exceedingly severe and destructive. A rebel battery, posted on a hill half a mile distant to the right of Harris' battery, occupying a position nearly enfilading the Ninety-eighth Ohio and Eightieth Indiana Regiments, caused considerable loss in both of these regiments.

In justice to Captain Harris I would state that a well-directed shot from his battery (the shell exploding directly over the rebel battery) silenced it effectively; at least no more shots were fired from that position. The Fiftieth Ohio, with a few exceptions, perhaps 50 men, behaved gallantly, and drove the enemy back as they attempted to gain the summit of the hill and the woods to the left of the Nineteenth Battery, and those men who ran were rallied by their field officers and fought well afterward. The Eightieth Indiana, while occupying the position on the hill to the left of the Nineteenth Battery, and pouring in a steady deadly fire upon the enemy, was marched over by the Second Ohio, which had fallen back upon their line. By order of Colonel Webster the Eightieth changed from front to right flank, the left resting where the right had rested on the battery. They were subsequently ordered to take a new position some 200 yards in the rear of the position they first occupied. This regiment changed position several times under heavy fire, and both officers and men acted gallantly and well throughout. Lieutenant-Colonel Brooks took command of the Second Ohio, which remained with the Eightieth Indiana, and acted with him until nearly the close of the engagement.

After the return of the left wing of the Ninety-eighth Ohio from the position it had been assigned to take in support of Parsons' battery they formed in line to meet the enemy, who had already gained a position to the right of the Nineteenth Battery in a corn field. They were opened upon by the Ninety-eighth Ohio, assisted for a time by the Eightieth Indiana, and in a very few moments that field was covered with the rebel dead. The Ninety-eighth changed position several times under a most murderous fire. For the coolness and steadiness with which these evolutions were performed the service is much indebted to Lieutenant-Colonel Poorman, commanding the Ninety-eighth, who acted as a brave and gallant officer and deserves especial notice. In the mean time two of the guns of the Nineteenth Battery had been taken off the field by the artillerists; four were left. These four guns were fired a number of times by members of the Ninety-eighth after they had been abandoned.

At this time I was ordered to take the Eightieth Indiana to the rear and left upon a hill some 400 yards distant and form them in line, which was done. I then returned (the battle was virtually over) and found that our gallant commander, who had acted so gallantly, had been mortally wounded; and in his loss the country is bereft of the valuable services of as brave and gallant a soldier as ever stood upon a battle-field. Too much cannot be said of him. He was everywhere in the line of battle of his brigade, encouraging by his example his men to deeds of heroism. The affections of his brigade were centered upon Colonel Webster, their heroic leader.

The officers and men of the Ninety-eighth and Fiftieth Ohio and Eightieth Indiana behaved gallantly and well, as did the officers of the One hundred and twenty-first Ohio, and as I believe their men will, if an opportunity is again presented. It was not cowardice but want of discipline and the unfortunate position to which they were assigned that caused disorder in their ranks. The officers and men of the Nineteenth Battery did their duty well, and were of invaluable service.

Lieut. J. T. Collins, Company E, Ninety-eighth Regiment, aide to Colonel Webster, acted with great bravery. The brigade is in good condition and ready to perform any service which its commander may assign it.

The casualties of the brigade were as follows:

Command.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
98th Ohio.....	35	162	32	229
50th Ohio.....	22	32	79	133
80th Indiana.....	25	116	16	157
121st Ohio.....	3	23	16	42
19th Indiana Battery.....	2	13	3	18
Total brigade.....	87	346	146	579

A considerable number of the wounded have since died, and many marked missing were wounded and taken prisoners, but the number I cannot now ascertain.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Report of Lieut. Col. Silas A. Strickland, Fiftieth Ohio Infantry.

HDQRS. FIFTIETH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEERS,
Camp near Perryville, October 10, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following brief report of the part taken by the Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers in the battle near Perryville on the 8th instant:

The regiment was thrown into line of battle, by order of Colonel Webster, commanding Thirty-fourth Brigade, Tenth Division, the regiment in command of Col. J. R. Taylor, in the ravine to the left and rear of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery, at 2.30 p. m. At 3 p. m. Colonel Webster commanded Colonel Taylor to change position to the left, about a regiment and a half distance, on the crest of the hill, to support the same battery at this point. Finding myself the ranking officer present of the regiment, I assumed command and ordered it to the front and commenced firing to resist the enemy, who was closely and rapidly marching on us. The movement was successful, and the steady and continuous fire of the Fiftieth Regiment drove the enemy back. I was then ordered by Colonel Webster to make a charge directly to the front over a fence and through a corn field down a ravine, which was done so promptly and successfully that the enemy fled in great disorder.

The regiment continued to hold this position, at which point I was ordered by Colonel Webster to halt it until about 5 o'clock p. m., when, not having seen nor heard from Colonel Webster for some fifteen minutes' time, an aide rode up and reported Colonel Webster mortally wounded and that the order was to move by the left flank. At this moment I saw the Nineteenth Indiana Battery moving to the rear. Without having any further orders I moved the regiment to the left about 200 yards. I then filed the regiment to the left about battalion distance, where I was met by General Rousseau. He ordered me to move to the front to support a battery, which I promptly did. I must here mention that Company A, Captain Cook, and Company F, Captain Clark, by order of Colonel Webster, from the first were left to the immediate support of the Nineteenth Indiana Battery, and remained in that position, under the command of Captain Cook, during a continuous and heavy fire of musketry, which was effectually returned until the moving to the rear of the battery, when the two companies moved off, supporting the battery, in perfect order.

The officers and men under my command behaved coolly and bravely through the entire engagement. It would be injustice to make any distinction. Captain Carr, of Company D, fell in the charge while boldly leading his men on. Captain Carter, of Company I, fell as gloriously, with his face to the foe, as a soldier should. Lieutenant Key, of Company I, after the fall of Captain Carter, while bravely leading his boys in the charge, was seriously wounded in the knee. I must acknowledge in grateful terms the invaluable services throughout the day of the gallant soldier Maj. Thomas L. P. Defrees. I also take great pleasure in bearing testimony to the promptness and bravery of Adj. George R. Elstner in his constant assistance throughout the engagement.

Although out of the ordinary course of a report of this kind, still I hope you will permit me to make honorable mention of the bravery and timely assistance rendered me at a critical point of the engagement by Lieut. J. T. Collins, of Company E, Ninety-eighth Ohio Regiment, acting aide to Colonel Webster. The Fiftieth Ohio went into action with 597 and came off the field with 467; lost in killed, wounded, and missing, 130; now present and returned fit for duty, 513.

Recapitulation.—Known to have been killed, 19; wounded, 32; missing, 79.*

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SILAS A. STRICKLAND,

Lieutenant-Colonel, Comdg. Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Vols.

Report of Col. William B. Hazen, Forty-first Ohio Infantry, commanding Nineteenth Brigade, Fourth Division, Second Army Corps.

HDQRS. NINETEENTH BRIGADE, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
October —, 1862.

At daylight on the morning of the 8th of October, 1862, the Nineteenth Brigade, Army of the Ohio, under my command, consisting of the Forty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers, Ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, Twenty-seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, One hundred and tenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and Battery F, First Regiment Ohio Volunteers—artillery, under command of Captain Cockerill, the whole numbering 2,350 men, moved forward from camp on Rolling Fork, 2 miles from Haysville, toward Perryville. About 9.30 a. m. we arrived at a point within 3 miles of Perryville, where we were halted and ordered to deploy in line of battle. At 10 o'clock the deployment of my brigade was completed in the following order: The Forty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers, Twenty-seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, and Ninth Indiana Volunteers, covered by skirmishers from their respective commands, formed the first line. The One hundred and tenth Illinois Volunteers, 150 yards in rear, formed the second line. The Sixth Kentucky Volunteers was held in reserve 150 yards distant from the second line. The battery occupied the high ground upon my right near the Tenth Brigade. Upon my left was formed the Twenty-second Brigade, under command of General Cruft.

My command remained in its position with little of note transpiring save occasional shots by my skirmishers till about 1 o'clock p. m., when a party of the enemy's dismounted cavalry having advanced and taken possession of a farm-house and out-buildings and opened a brisk fire therefrom, my skirmishers of the Forty-first Ohio Regiment and a detachment of Colonel Wolford's cavalry advanced and dislodged them. A section of Captain Cockerill's battery was then brought forward and opened on the enemy's cavalry. They soon disappeared in the woods.

At sunset my brigade was moved to the right sufficiently to occupy the high ground previously occupied by the Tenth Brigade. Here my command bivouacked in line of battle.

About 9 a. m. of the following morning the Nineteenth Brigade was ordered forward in line of battle. It advanced to Walker's Springs, in the suburbs of Perryville, where we encamped, the enemy having retreated the night previous.

It is proper to express the keen disappointment of the members of the brigade at not having had an opportunity to engage the enemy at this point.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. HAZEN,

Colonel Forty-first Ohio Volunteers, Commanding Brigade.

Report of Col. George D. Wagner, Fifteenth Indiana Infantry, commanding Twenty-first Brigade, Sixth Division.

HEADQUARTERS TWENTY-FIRST BRIGADE,
In Camp near Perryville, Ky., October 11, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to orders from General Wood, at about 3 o'clock I marched to the support of General Sheridan, whose right was being turned by the enemy, at the same time engaging him in front. My advance, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Neff, Fortieth Indiana Volunteers, attacked their extreme right, while Cox's (Tenth Indiana) battery opened on them an enfilading fire with fearful effect, which brought them to right-about, march. At this time a battery, which was about one-half mile to my front, opened on us, their shell bursting with great precision within my lines. I ordered Captain Cox to concentrate his fire upon this battery, which was soon driven off to a respectful distance. I immediately advanced, the enemy falling back in the direction of Perryville, which position they held until dark. By this time Colonel Harker, of the Twentieth Brigade, had come up to my support.

The troops lay on their arms, in order of battle, without fires. This position was about one-half a mile from the town of Perryville and at least 1 mile in advance of where I first became engaged and as far in advance of the remainder of our corps (General Crittenden's).

The next morning at daylight, seeing the enemy in retreat, I ordered an advance upon the town, where they had planted a battery to protect their rear. Cox's battery soon drove them off. The troops entered the town, capturing a few prisoners. At this time a column of troops came from the left in order to gain the Danville road. This force might have been captured but for the reason that we had no support on the right, where it was said a large force of the rebels were posted, which afterward proved to be nothing but cavalry. Cox's battery was advanced so as to completely enfilade the road, causing them to scatter in every direction.

Both officers and men acted as cool as if on parade. My force consisted of the Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel Wood; Fortieth Indiana Volunteers, Colonel Blake; Fifty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, Colonel Hines; Twenty-fourth Kentucky Volunteers, Colonel Grigsby; Ninety-seventh Ohio Volunteers, Colonel Lane, and the Tenth Indiana Battery, Captain Cox, to all of whom I am much indebted for the prompt and efficient manner in which they handled their troops, as well as to my personal staff, Captain Tinney, Captain McCutcheon, Lieutenants Casterline and Tharp, and Surgeon Glick, who did their duty well.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Your obedient servant,

G. D. WAGNER,
Colonel, Commanding.

Report of Maj. Gen. Charles C. Gilbert, U. S. Army, commanding Third Army Corps.

HDQRS. THIRD CORPS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Near Crab Orchard, October 18, 1862.

SIR: Herewith I respectfully submit a report of the operations of the Third Corps pertaining to the conflict which took place near Perryville, Ky., on the 8th of this month:

On the 7th instant the Third Corps moved along the turnpike from Springfield toward Perryville. On approaching within 5 miles of the latter place it became apparent that the enemy was there in force. The head of the column at once halted, and the leading division (Mitchell's) was drawn up in line of battle across the road. The Eleventh Division (General Sheridan's) was shortly after brought up and passed to the front and established on some heights to the right of the road and not far from Doctor's Creek. The First Division (Schoepf's) was established in reserve.

By the time these dispositions were effected it was dark. During the night I directed General Sheridan to pass Doctor's Creek, take up a position, and hold it, as that stream contained the nearest water in sufficient quantity for my command. This movement brought McCook's brigade of Sheridan's division within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the place, and early in the morning the enemy testified his dissatisfaction at our presence there by an attempt to dislodge the brigade, but he was repulsed handsomely.

Toward the middle of the day the indications pointed toward a general engagement, and I ordered General Mitchell to establish himself on the right of Sheridan, and directed both commanders to call up their respective commands and establish them on the heights between Doctor's Creek and Perryville. When on that line Sheridan's left rested on the road, and Mitchell's right stretched off toward the Lebanon and Perryville turnpike, on which Crittenden's corps was hourly expected. Schoepf's division was moved along the road to the crossing of Doctor's Creek, where the leading brigade was established. Pending these movements the arrival of the First Corps (Major-General McCook's) was announced on my left, and the sound of artillery indicated that its appearance had attracted the serious attention of the enemy.

I also received an officer from Major-General Crittenden, who had been dispatched to seek out our lines that he might make the junction with me. I gave him the position, and, being near general headquarters, I repaired thither and made a report in person of the disposition of my forces and of the operations of the day and then returned to my headquarters near the crossing of Doctor's Creek. On my way thither I was met by a message from Major-General McCook to the effect that his corps was upon the point of being overpowered, the enemy having attacked him in overwhelming numbers. About the same time I received from General Sheridan a warning that he could not hold his position if not supported with re-enforcements immediately and confirming the unfavorable intelligence concerning the First Corps. I at once ordered Schoepf to close more to the left to support Sheridan, and also to cover the movement of the First Corps, which was gradually swinging around toward our rear under the strong pressure brought to bear upon it. To support Sheridan's right I ordered Mitchell to close in to the left and co-operate closely with him.

These orders given, I continued on toward the left, and shortly was met by Captain Hoblitzell with an urgent demand for support for the First Corps. He was furnished with a brigade and battery from Mitchell's division, though at the time my own lines were assailed in the most lively and vigorous manner. Shortly after Major Wright brought an order to send two brigades from Schoepf's division to support the First Corps, but as one brigade had already gone and my own lines were undergoing a dangerous assault I dispatched only one of Schoepf's brigades. That moved toward the right of the First Corps. The enemy's columns, as they followed up their success, came now to present their left flank to Sheridan's batteries, and he at once turned his guns upon them and disposed his infantry to demand their further attention if they should presume to continue their progress. This, with the movement of the brigade from Schoepf's division, brought to a stand the left of the enemy's attack. At the same time Mitchell threw forward his right upon the repulsed and broken lines which had attacked Sheridan and himself, and, with gallant Carlin in the lead, drove them beyond Perryville and occupied the town with his skirmishers. Sheridan could not venture to join in following up the successful repulse of the enemy from his front, as his entire attention was directed to the columns then threatening to continue their progress toward my left and rear. It was about one hour before sunset that the enemy was repulsed from the front of my lines.

In disposing my troops for battle I had the timely advice of the major-general commanding, whose presence in the midst of my corps inspired all, from the highest to the lowest, with complete confidence.

The Third Corps presented itself on the field in an orderly and compact style, and I am indebted to Capt. O. L. Baldwin, of the Second Kentucky Volunteers, assistant inspector general, for his energy in clearing the road of the wagons, which on the 7th had under some mistake become involved among the troops and lined the road all the way back to Lick Creek, and were materially impeding the progress of the troops, especially of the artillery.

The other members of my staff, Capt. J. Edward Stacy, acting assistant adjutant-general, my two aides-de-camp, Lieut. George K. Speed and Lieut. John Speed, and Capt. George S. Roper, commissary of subsistence, were active and efficient in transmitting my orders.

Surg. George R. Weeks was active and ready in the duties pertaining to his office as medical director.

The officers of the Signal Corps rendered ready and useful service all day on the 7th and 8th.

Brigadier-General Mitchell this day sustained fully the reputation which he won at an early period of this war for energy and daring.

Brigadier-General Sheridan I commend to notice as an officer of much gallantry and of high professional ability. He held the key of our position with tenacity and used the point to its utmost advantage.

Colonel McCook, of the Fifty-second Ohio Volunteers, was at this point, and I can bear testimony to the fine discipline and excellent fighting qualities of his brigade.

Colonel Carlin, of Mitchell's division, is spoken of in terms of high praise, which I can most safely indorse.

Inspector-General Gay, in charge of the cavalry in my front, was active and highly efficient. His thorough professional training gave me confidence in all of his reports, and enabled me to prepare in time and at a proper distance for a more cautious and methodical advance upon the point at which the enemy had taken up his position.

I feel it my duty to report Col. George Ryan, of the Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteers. He deferred reporting his regiment deficient in ammunition until the division to which he belonged was on the point of going into battle. He was arrested on the spot. Thanks to the efficiency of my ordnance officer, Lieut. Benjamin J. Horton, of the Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, the regiment was supplied, and was put in position with full cartridge boxes before the fight became general.

During the night my dispositions were completed for the general attack ordered at daylight, but the withdrawal of the enemy in the mean time brought to a termination the encounter begun the previous day.

Of the two brigades sent to re-enforce the First Corps General McCook I presume will make a report. The Thirtieth Brigade lost more than the Third. It was sent toward the left when the battle was raging the most furiously. The Third Brigade was sent toward the right of the First Corps, and had the close support of Sheridan's left and the remaining brigades of Schoepf's division still held in reserve.

Casualties of the Third Corps, as far as ascertained at this date, are as follows: Killed, 250; wounded, 800; and missing, 60. Total, 1,110.*

CAMP NEAR CRAB ORCHARD, KY., October 10, 1862.

I have the honor to report to you that on the evening of the 7th instant, according to your order, I sent my regiment on picket duty, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Carroll, and had it posted $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in advance of our camp, on the road leading to Perryville, in front of where the enemy was said to be in force.

About 12 midnight Lieutenant-Colonel Carroll sent out Companies A and E, Captains Hamilton and Johnssen, as skirmishers, to feel after and ascertain, if possible, if the enemy was in the vicinity. Captain Johnssen proceeded about a mile, when he came upon a considerable force of the enemy and engaged them. After exchanging a number of shots and finding a superior number of the enemy opposed to him he fell back, according to orders, on the regiment, Captain Hamilton taking position as outpost picket.

Nothing further occurred until 5 a. m., when the regiment was formed in line of battle and moved across an open field about one-half mile, when the skirmishers under Captain Johnssen were again fired upon by those of the enemy. I arrived on the field at 7 a. m. and took command. Soon after I relieved Captain Johnssen's company of skirmishers by sending forward Company B, Captain Goblen, to take their place, which position Captain Goblen maintained, skirmishing with the enemy occasionally until about 12 noon, when by your order I moved the regiment out of the wood across an open field under fire of shot and shell from a battery of the enemy, crossing a rail and also a stone fence, and ascending a steep hill, followed to our left, and somewhat in our rear, by the Eighty-sixth Illinois, under command of Colonel Irons.

* But see revised statement, p. 1036.

We came upon a force of the enemy outnumbering us, who at once opened a galling fire upon us, which was returned by my regiment in splendid order. Company B, Captain Goben, being the left flanking company, and near where the enemy was in heavy force, under cover of a rail fence and under the slope of a hill, sustained the brunt of the battle, suffering a loss of 4 killed and 3 wounded; but the captain, leading his men, stood up resolutely, and, after my regiment had obstinately contested the ground for twenty minutes, the enemy gave way and fled in confusion, leaving their dead and wounded on the field.

After remaining on the field of our success until 3 p. m., when a general line of battle was formed by General Sheridan's division, the Tenth Indiana being the only regiment on the field from your brigade or from the First Division, I was ordered by General Sheridan to the rear as a support, which order I promptly but reluctantly obeyed. Shortly after I received an order from you to rejoin the brigade, which I did about sunset.

My regiment lost 4 killed and 7 wounded. The list is herewith appended.

In closing this brief report I would be doing injustice to the officers and men of my command were I not to speak of the promptness with which my every order was obeyed and executed and the gallantry of officers and men of the regiment. Every line officer on the field was at his post. Lieut. Col. William B. Carroll, Maj. Marsh B. Taylor, and Adj. John W. Harden, rendered me invaluable assistance by their energy, coolness, and courage on the field.

The movements of the regiment having been made under your immediate observation, this report is respectfully submitted, hoping that the day is not far distant when the Tenth Indiana will again have an opportunity of going to battle under your generalship, to assist in crushing out a rebellion raised by ambitious men and disappointed office-seekers.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. C. KISE,

Colonel, Commanding Tenth Indiana Volunteers.

Report of Brig. Gen. James B. Steedman, U. S. Army, commanding Third Brigade.

HDQRS. THIRD BRIG., FIRST DIV., ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Camp near Crab Orchard, Ky., October 19, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to report, pursuant to Special Orders, No. 14, from corps headquarters, that late in the afternoon of the 8th instant, having been ordered with my brigade to support Major-General McCook, my command, in obedience to the orders of that officer, took position on the right of the division commanded by Brigadier-General Rousseau, where it was exposed to a quite severe fire of shot and shell and some musketry without being able to reply, except with the artillery attached (Company I, Fourth U. S. Artillery, commanded by Lieut. Frank G. Smith), which opened and fired with effect for about forty-five minutes, dismounting two guns, exploding one caisson, and effectually silencing the battery against which its fire was directed.

The casualties of this command were: Thirty-fifth Ohio Volunteers, Col. F. Van Derveer commanding—Lieut. Joseph S. Claypoole and 3 men taken prisoners (since paroled for exchange); Ninth Ohio Volunteers, Lieut. Col. Charles Joseph, commanding—1 man severely wounded and 2 men taken prisoners (since paroled); Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, Col. K. G. Shryock commanding—2 men wounded, 1 severely; Eighteenth U. S. Infantry, Maj. F. Townsend commanding—3 men wounded, 1 severely; Second Minnesota Volunteers, Col. James George commanding—1 man taken prisoner; Company I, Fourth U. S. Artillery, Lieut. F. G. Smith commanding—1 man severely wounded and 1 man taken prisoner (since paroled); Lieut. Richard Schneider, serving on my staff, captured while conveying orders on the field (since paroled for exchange).

I avail myself of this opportunity to reassure you of my entire confidence in the officers and men of my command.

With esteem, respectfully, yours,

JAMES B. STEEDMAN,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Third Brigade.

Report of Brig. Gen. Robert B. Mitchell, U. S. Army, commanding Ninth Division, including skirmish October 7.

HDQRS. NINTH DIVISION, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Goodnight Spring, 2½ miles from Perryville, Ky., October 9, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by the Ninth Division in the engagement of the 7th and 8th instant, near Perryville, Ky.:

Upon the arrival of my column, about 2 p. m. of the 7th, at a point on the Springfield and Perryville turnpike about 5 miles from Perryville, I formed my brigades, under the direction of General Buell, on the right and left of the road, with the batteries in position and the men under cover. The Eighth Kansas, Lieutenant-Colonel Martin, and the Thirty-fifth Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Chandler, were advanced to the front in rear of a section of Captain Pinney's Fifth Wisconsin Battery, which, with the cavalry advance, had come upon the rebel outposts, and was then engaging a battery of the enemy. A little before sunset these regiments were advanced to the front of the battery and engaged the enemy till dark, when they fell back to their former position. The Eighty-first Indiana Volunteers, Major Woodbury, and Twenty-fifth Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel McClelland, were thrown out as pickets upon the left and front.

At daylight on the morning of the 8th I sent forward a section of Captain Hotchkiss' Second Minnesota Battery to relieve the section of Captain Pinney's battery, which, under Lieutenant Hill, did such brilliant work the day before.

At 2 p. m. of the 8th, in obedience to orders received from Major-General Gilbert, commanding corps, I advanced my division on the road to a point designated by General Gilbert, where I formed my brigades as follows:

The Thirtieth Brigade, Colonel Gooding, Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers, commanding, composed of the Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel Keith; Fifty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, Maj. J. C. Winters; Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteers, commanded respectively by Lieutenant-Colonel Kerr and Lieutenant-Colonel Bennett, and the Fifth Wisconsin Battery, Capt. O. F. Pinney, on the left of the road.

The Thirty-first Brigade, Colonel Carlin, Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, commanding, composed of the Twenty-first and Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, commanded respectively by Colonel Alexander and Major Gilmer; the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, Colonel Heg; the One hundred and first Ohio Volunteers, Colonel Stem, and two sections of Captain Hotchkiss' Second Minnesota Battery, commanded by Lieutenant Dawley (Captain Hotchkiss, with one section, being engaged with General McCook on the left), I formed on the right of the road, on a wooded eminence, the men under cover, this brigade being in rear and within supporting distance of General Sheridan's division, which was then engaging the enemy in front.

The Thirty-second Brigade, Colonel Caldwell, Eighty-first Indiana Volunteers, commanding, was formed in rear of the Thirty-first Brigade, Colonel Caldwell's brigade comprising the following regiments and battery: Twenty-fifth and Thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteers, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonels McClelland and Chandler; the Eighth Kansas, Lieutenant-Colonel Martin; the Eighty-first Indiana Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel Timberlake, and the Eighth Wisconsin Battery, Captain Carpenter.

Almost immediately upon the formation of my lines the enemy appeared, advancing in force upon the right of Colonel Carlin's line, with the evident intention of charging upon his battery, which was upon his extreme right. I directed him to open fire upon them as soon as he could do so effectually, but they retired under cover at the advance of Colonel Carlin's skirmishers.

At this time I received a message from General Sheridan, stating that he was hardly pressed on his right and front and needed re-enforcements. I ordered Colonel Carlin to advance with his brigade rapidly to General Sheridan's right and aid his division. Colonel Carlin immediately advanced, leading his brigade through a skirt of timber to the open field on the right, and upon ascending the brow of the hill discovered the enemy rapidly advancing in great force upon General Sheridan's right. Colonel Carlin immediately formed his brigade, and at the double-quick charged upon the enemy, who after a moment's stand gave way to the impetuosity of the charge, and breaking in disorder ran precipitately to and through the town of Perryville a distance of nearly 2 miles. Colonel Carlin pressed them closely till they reached the bluff on the other side and formed under the protection of two batteries, which were in position there. The gallant Carlin charged with his brigade through the enemy's lines, completely piercing their center; but finding his ardor had outstripped all support, and having the enemy's artillery and infantry on both flanks, he fell back during the confusion of the enemy to a position immediately adjoining the town, and placed his battery in position on the west side of the town, the rebel batteries and our own firing directly over the town till darkness made further action impossible. This charge gave the officers and men of the Thirty-first Brigade a splendid opportunity to evince the intrepid, gallant, and soldierly qualities which the occasion showed they possessed. The manner in which they stood the subsequent severe artillery fire was worthy of high praise.

In Colonel Carlin's advance the Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers overtook and captured on the edge of the town a heavily loaded ammunition train of 15 wagons, 2 caissons, with their horses, belonging to the Washington Light Artillery, and the train guard of 138 men, with 3 officers. Major Gilmer, Thirty-eighth Illinois, deserves great credit for the skill and activity he displayed in this capture.

The Thirty-second Brigade, Colonel Caldwell, was advanced at different times to the positions vacated by Colonel Carlin. The officers and men of this brigade did not have the opportunity to gratify the desire for a chance at the enemy that their looks, language, and actions showed they possessed.

At the time Colonel Carlin's brigade advanced Colonel Gooding, Thirtieth Brigade, was ordered by General Gilbert to advance to the aid of General McCook, upon whom the enemy had massed a large force with the evident intention of turning his position. Colonel Gooding proceeded with his brigade to General McCook's position, and, under General McCook's direction, formed upon his left, and there remained, with some slight variations of the position of his regiments, till dark, receiving a most deadly fire from the enemy, who were possessed of great advantages of position.

The appearance of the field the next day showed, however, that the brave heroes of Pea Ridge (the Twenty-second Indiana and Fifty-ninth Illinois Volunteers) had returned the fire with terrible effect and had won new and bright laurels to add to their former fame.

The Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Bennett, were upon this line, and, having a reputation to gain as soldiers, nobly did the work before them. Their loss was heavy, including Major Kilgour, wounded severely. Colonel Gooding, during the temporary confusion produced by a heavy flank fire of the concealed enemy, became involved in the enemy's lines, was slightly wounded and taken prisoner. By his address and cool bravery, however, he succeeded in deceiving the commander of the rebel forces till his brigade had withdrawn to a position where it was less exposed to cross-fires. Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers, and Lieutenant West, acting assistant adjutant-general of the Thirtieth Brigade, both fell here; the former killed, the latter severely wounded. Both were gallant officers and fell while discharging their duties.

Captain Pinney's Fifth Wisconsin Battery was placed in position under the orders of General McCook, and for nearly three hours (almost unsupported) defended itself against the terrible numbers and charges of the enemy, piling the ground in front of his guns with their slain. This brigade continued in position till, darkness rendering their position (the enemy being concealed) too much exposed, they withdrew to their position on the road, fatigued, terribly depleted in numbers, and mourning the loss of so many brave comrades, but still preserving their organizations intact, and anxious for the next day's opportunity to go again into the fight. Colonel Gooding's brigade operated more directly under the command of General McCook, and I presume his report will contain a more detailed account of their positions and operations.

The casualties in my command were as follows: The Thirtieth Brigade: Killed, 121; wounded, 314; prisoners, 35; missing, 29; total, 499. The Thirty-first Brigade: Wounded, 10. The Thirty-second Brigade, none. Grand total, 509.

I have already spoken of the gallant conduct and skillful management of Colonel Carlin, commanding the Thirty-first Brigade, but cannot refrain from again calling your attention to the eminent services and brave actions of this modest and efficient officer in this engagement.

By his courage and skill the enemy's center, a strong position, was broken and the rebels thrown into confusion. Colonel Gooding did his whole duty as the commander of one of the best brigades in the service of the Government. Indiana may well feel proud of his conduct in that bloody conflict.

I cannot refrain from expressing my gratitude to my staff, including Lieutenant Pratt, acting assistant adjutant-general; Lieutenant Lines, aide-de-camp; Lieutenant Rankin, of the Second Kansas Regiment; Lieutenant Andrews, Forty-second Illinois Volunteers, and Lieutenant Wood, of the Signal Corps, for the able, gallant, and heroic manner in which they discharged their respective duties during the engagement, always ready and willing to take any risk or make any sacrifice for the good of their country's cause.

Surgeon Hazlett, of the Fifty-ninth Illinois Volunteers; Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, Twenty-second Indiana; Lieutenant Johnson, Fifty-ninth Illinois; Lieutenants Tolbert and Ridlen and Capt. R. K. Smith, of the Twenty-second Indiana, and Lieutenants Blean and Eels, of the Seventy-fifth Illinois, died gallantly defending the honor of their country's flag. They will never be forgotten by a grateful country.

On the morning of the 9th a force of rebel cavalry was seen winding from the enemy's left and evidently proceeding toward the Harrodsburg turnpike. I directed Hotchkiss' battery to fire upon them, which was done with good effect, the enemy rapidly retreating. I then advanced with my division to this point, seeing on every side indications of the enemy's precipitate retreat. I discovered about 1,500 small-arms, which I have turned over to Lieutenant Horton, ordnance officer, staff of Major-General Gilbert.

I am, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBT. B. MITCHELL,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Report of Col. Michael Gooding, Twenty-second Indiana Infantry, commanding Thirtieth Brigade.

HEADQUARTERS THIRTIETH BRIGADE,

NINTH DIVISION, ARMY OF THE OHIO,

Danville, Ky., October 14, 1862.

SIR: In obedience to your orders, requiring me to furnish a report of the part taken by my brigade in the late battle of Perryville, I have the honor herewith to submit the following:

As ordered, I had massed my brigade in the edge of a dense wood, joining General Rousseau's right, to await your orders. Precisely at 3.30 o'clock p. m. I received orders directly from Major-General Gilbert, commanding Third Corps d'Armée, to proceed immediately to the support of General McCook, on my left.

I then proceeded at double-quick in the direction where General McCook's forces were engaged. On reaching the field I found the forces badly cut up and retreating (they then having fallen back nearly 1 mile) and were being hotly pressed by the enemy. After receiving instructions from General McCook I ordered my brigade forward into the fight, the Twenty-second Indiana taking position on the right, the Fifty-ninth Illinois on the left, and the Seventy-fifth Illinois in the center, and the battery took position on an eminence in our rear, which was bordered by a dense wood. I again ordered the brigade to the support of the brigade fighting on my left, which, as soon as I had become engaged, retreated and fell back in confusion.

The battle now raged furiously; one after one my men were cut down, but still, with unyielding hearts, they severely pressed the enemy, and in many instances forced them to give way. Here we fought alone and unsupported for two hours and twenty minutes, opposed to the rebel General Wood's entire division, composed of fifteen regiments and a battery of ten guns. Fiercer and fiercer grew the contest and more dreadful became the onslaught. Almost hand-to-hand they fought at least five times their own number, often charging upon them with such fearlessness and impetuosity as would force them to reel and give way, but as fast as they were cut down their ranks were filled with fresh ones. At one time the Twenty-second Indiana charged on them with fixed bayonets and succeeded in completely routing and throwing them from their position on our right, but at the same time they brought in a reserve force on our left. I now ordered the Twenty-second Indiana as quickly as possible to the aid of the Fifty-ninth Illinois on the left, which order was promptly obeyed.

The impetuosity of the firing now ceased for a moment, and I advanced to ascertain if possible the position of the enemy. As I advanced down the line we were greeted with a heavy volley of musketry, which plainly enough told me the direction of the enemy. With shouts and exclamations my men again rallied to the onset. Here it was that fell the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, while at the head of his regiment and in the act of flourishing his sword and urging his men onward to victory. At this time my horse was shot from under me, and before I could escape through the darkness I was taken prisoner and conveyed from the field. Although my men fought desperately it was of no avail, for being overwhelmed by vastly superior numbers they were compelled to withdraw from the field.

Retreating under cover of a hill the brigade was again formed in line of battle by the senior officer of the brigade, when, after consultation and learning that we had no support within 1 mile distant, it was deemed advisable to withdraw from the field and fall back upon our lines, which they did.

I cannot speak too highly of the officers and men generally of my command, but they deserve the highest honor for their patriotism and courage. I would here again mention the name of Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, of the Twenty-second Indiana. Until he fell from his horse he was everywhere in the thickest of the fight. Where the battle raged hottest he was to be found animating and cheering his men by his lofty words and noble example. He was universally loved by all who knew him and his loss is much regretted. In his example there is everything worthy of imitation. Major Winters, of the Fifty-ninth Illinois, has my grateful thanks for the coolness and courage which he displayed during the entire engagement. He displayed a patriotism and courage that is highly worthy of imitation. Lieutenant West, of the Fifty-ninth Illinois, and acting assistant adjutant-general, is entitled to great credit for the timely aid he afforded me and for the energy and promptness with which he delivered my orders. During the action he was wounded in five different places, but did not quit the field until entirely disabled.

Lieutenant Adams, acting adjutant of the Twenty-second Indiana, is also a worthy young officer. He had his horse shot from under him, and though wounded himself he remained on the field, preserving great coolness and calmness of mind and constantly urging his men forward. Also much praise is due to Orderly Gray for his courage, promptness, and energy in delivering my orders. Captain Pinney, of the Fifth Wisconsin Battery, cannot be spoken of too highly in this report. He delivered his orders with great coolness and deliberation, and his battery did great execution in forcing the rebels from their position.

The following is a list of casualties:

Of the Twenty-second Indiana there were engaged 300; killed, 55; wounded, 98; missing, 19. Total loss, 172.*

Of the Fifty-ninth Illinois there were engaged 325; killed, 43; wounded, 98; missing, 12. Total loss, 153.*

Of the Seventy-fifth Illinois there were engaged 700; killed, 47; wounded, 162; missing, 12. Total loss, 221.*

Of the Fifth Wisconsin Battery there were engaged 68; killed, 1; wounded, 2. Total loss, 3.*

Of the brigade there were engaged 1,423; killed, 141; wounded, 360; missing, 43. Total loss of the brigade, 549.*

Very respectfully, I am, general, your obedient servant,

M. GOODING,

Colonel, Commanding Thirtieth Brigade.

HDQRS. ELEVENTH DIV., ARMY OF THE OHIO,
CAMP ON THE ROLLING FORK,
Six miles south of Lebanon, Ky., October 23, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to make the following report of the operations of my division in the action of the 8th instant, near Perryville, Ky.:

In accordance with the instructions of the general commanding I directed Col. Daniel McCook, with his brigade and Barnett's battery, to occupy the heights in front of Doctor's Creek, so as to secure that water for our men. This was done very handsomely after a sharp skirmish at daylight in the morning, giving us full possession of the heights.

In about two hours afterward the enemy advanced in considerable force through a line of heavy timber on the eastern slope to drive us from this position. I had however in the mean time ordered forward Colonel Laiboldt's brigade and Hescoc's battery, so that I felt myself well prepared and strong enough to receive them. I then directed Colonel Laiboldt to advance two of his old regiments and drive the enemy from the timber, at the same time putting the batteries into position. Colonel Laiboldt succeeded in driving the enemy back down the hill and across Chaplin Creek after an obstinate contest, in which the loss was severe on both sides, Captain Barnett, with one section of his battery, and Lieutenant Taliaferro, with one section of Hescoc's battery, driving the enemy from every position he took. About this time General McCook, with his corps, made his appearance on my left, the enemy opening on him. I then advanced Captain Hescoc's battery to a very good position in front of this belt of timber, where he had an enfilading fire on the enemy's batteries on the opposite side of the valley of Chaplin Creek, advancing at the same time six regiments to support him. The fire of Captain Hescoc was here very severely felt by the enemy, who attempted to dislodge him by establishing a battery at short range. But the firing of Hescoc's battery was still so severe and his shots so well directed and effective as to force the enemy's battery from its new position in ten minutes.

The enemy then placed two batteries on my right flank and commenced massing troops behind them, with the apparent intention of making an attack on that point. I then, by direction of Major-General Gilbert, reoccupied the crest of the hill. I had no sooner got into position than the enemy attacked me fiercely, advancing with great determination almost to my very line, notwithstanding a large portion of the ground over which they were advancing was exposed to a heavy fire of canister from both of my batteries. I then directed a general advance of my whole line, bringing up the reserve regiments to occupy the crest of the hill.

On our advance the enemy commenced retiring rapidly but in good order. I could not follow up this advantage to any great extent, as the enemy were advancing on our left, General McCook's right having been driven back some distance. I then directed the fire of my artillery across the valley on this advance of the enemy, forcing them to retire, thus very much relieving General McCook. This ended the operations of the day, it being then dark and the enemy having retired from the field.

I cannot speak with too much praise of the good conduct of the officers and men of my whole division, all of whom were engaged. The new troops vied with the old troops of the division in their coolness and steadiness. My brigade commanders, Colonel Greusel, Col. Daniel McCook, and Lieutenant-Colonel Laiboldt, behaved with great gallantry, leading their troops at all times. Neither can I speak too highly of Captains Hescoc and Barnett and the officers and men of their batteries.

I respectfully bring to the notice of the general commanding the excellent conduct of Surgeon Griffiths, medical director of this division, who was untiring in his care for the wounded on all parts of the field; also the following officers of my staff: Captain Beck, aide-de-camp; Lieut. George Lee, acting assistant adjutant-general; Lieut. Van Pelt, division commissary, and Lieutenants Denning and Burton, for their alacrity in bearing orders and other valuable assistance rendered me during the day.

The total casualties in my division were as follows: Killed, 44; wounded, 274, and missing, 12—total, 330.* I inclose herewith a list of same, giving names, rank, company, and regiment.

This report is also accompanied by the reports of brigade and battery commanders.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. H. SHERIDAN,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Report of Col. Daniel McCook, Fifty-second Ohio Infantry, commanding Thirty-sixth Brigade.

HDQRS. THIRTY-SIXTH BRIG., ELEVENTH DIV.,
THIRD ARMY CORPS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Battle-field Chaplin Hills, October 9, 1862.

SIR: In obedience to the orders of General Buell, conveyed through you, at 2 a. m. of the 8th instant I moved three regiments of my brigade, viz, the Eighty-fifth Illinois, the Fifty-second Ohio, and the One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois, to the foot of Peters' Hill, the position I was ordered to carry. At this point, discovering the enemy's force upon the hill above, I deployed the Eighty-fifth Regiment Illinois upon the right of the Perryville road and the Fifty-second Regiment upon the left, throwing skirmishers to the front, enveloping my flanks. The skirmishers had scarcely taken intervals when a severe and galling fire was opened on them. As soon as sufficient ground was gained to the front I deployed the One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiment Illinois upon both sides of the road as a reserve. Although all my regiments were fresh from their homes they moved steadily up the hill driving the enemy, who contested warmly every step, and occupied the crest of the heights, which gave us a commanding position over the surrounding country and one of vast importance at a subsequent part of the day. There I halted my battalions in a favorable position, keeping the One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiment well in reserve under the crest of the hill and throwing skirmishers at such a distance from my line as to keep the enemy's sharpshooters, who still occupied a skirt of woods on the slope of the hill to the front, from annoying my regiments lying in position. About this time Captain Barnett's battery arrived and was put into position upon the left of the road. Two of his pieces he could not use on account of the inexperience of the men detailed to man them. With the remaining four he did good service during the day. The enemy, knowing the importance of the position he had lost, being re-enforced, advanced to retake it. He opened a battery upon the Eighty-fifth Illinois and began using spherical case. I ordered a section of Captain Barnett's battery upon the extreme right of the position to reply to this and ordered the right wing of the One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois to take position to the right of the battery to support it. The enemy's fire for about fifty minutes was very severe, but Captain Barnett, after compelling him to change position three times, finally drove him off. The steadiness with which the Eighty-fifth and One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois withstood the fire was admirable, as they were unable to reply and had during it a considerable number wounded. After this the firing almost ceased, with here and there a straggling shot aimed at mounted men. At this juncture General Sheridan arrived upon the field.

The enemy under Buckner soon began massing troops in the skirt of woods into the edge of which I had thrown my skirmishers. General Gay, commanding cavalry, came up and attempted to go toward Perryville, when his further advance was checked by the enemy in the woods. He dismounted a portion of his cavalry, and, supported by the skirmishers of the Fifty-second Ohio Regiment, advanced into the woods, where we afterward learned there were two rebel brigades.

The action quickly became sharp, when the Second Missouri Infantry, and soon the Forty-fourth Illinois to support it, were ordered into the woods. They drove the enemy from there across the open fields in front and took possession of a wooded hill beyond the Bottom House, upon which the rebels afterward planted their batteries, most destructive to the right of General McCook's corps. In the mean time we had observed the head of General Rousseau's division debouching into the field to our left from the Mackville road. At about the same time the Second Missouri attacked the woods. The Eighty-sixth Regiment Illinois, belonging to my brigade but being upon picket, was ordered to advance over the open fields to the left and seize the extreme left of the wood. This they did in gallant style at a double-quick, driving the enemy before them, and in doing which 1 private was killed and 11 wounded. General Sheridan then ordered that the Fifty-second Ohio go forward to relieve the Second Missouri. I met this regiment coming back, having been ordered to leave the advanced position it occupied.

The Fifty-second was halted in the woods so hotly contested. You soon ordered my brigade forward to form line of battle on the farther edge of the woods so often mentioned. Captain Hescoc's battery, supported by the Eighty-sixth Illinois, had been here doing good service for some time by enfilading a battery planted upon the hill abandoned by the Second Missouri, and playing upon General Rousseau's division, just getting in position. The line General Sheridan selected was an admirable one, and General Rousseau formed his division upon a continuation of it, his right being separated from General Sheridan's left by the dry rocky bed of a stream which wound off toward Perryville.

The last regiment of my brigade was getting into position and the enemy's batteries had begun to play upon General Rousseau's division upon our left when we were ordered to fall back at least half a mile and assume the position carried in the morning, leaving General Rousseau without support on the right, exposing his flank. The enemy was not disturbed any longer by the batteries of our division — began to tell with effect upon General Rousseau. The enemy, assured by our retrograde movement, began to show themselves upon our right. A portion of Colonel Greusel's brigade got out of position, and the line, as formed with respect to my brigade, was as follows: The Thirty-sixth Illinois was on my left; the Fifty-second Ohio immediately upon its right, supporting a part of Captain Barnett's and Hescoc's batteries. The Eighty-fifth Regiment was upon the right of these batteries. The One hundred and twenty-fifth acted under your orders in the last action. I am happy to learn it behaved finely, and I must trust to your report to do it full justice. The Eighty-sixth Regiment was held in reserve upon the pike, with orders to watch the woods to our left and resist any attempt to turn our flank. The enemy made two determined attacks to carry the position, and at one time was repelled by the bayonet, in which charge the Eighty-fifth and One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois Regiments gallantly took part. The enemy reformed and advanced again. The Thirty-sixth Illinois being out of ammunitions I ordered the Fifty-second Regiment into line, and after an engagement of thirty minutes the enemy was driven from the field.

Too much praise cannot be given to the coolness, bravery, and steadiness of the troops of the brigade. To Col. R. S. Moore, of the Eighty-fifth Regiment Illinois, I call your special attention for his coolness, experience, and bravery on the field. Colonels Irons, Harmon, and Lieutenant-Colonel Cowen all deserve honorable mention for conspicuous bravery and judgment in action. Lieutenant-Colonels Dilworth, Magee, and Langley ably assisted their respective colonels, and were everywhere present where duty called them. Majors Cummings, Bean, and Lee, and Captain Clark, acting major of the Fifty-second Regiment, all performed well and ably their respective duties. A very large share of the honor of the day is due the respective regimental officers. Many instances of gallantry in line officers came under my notice, but regimental reports must suffice for these. With great pleasure I can call your attention to the conduct of my staff. Dr. Moore, brigade surgeon, coolly dressed wounds under the hottest fire and personally superintended the removal of the wounded. Captain Viemont was conspicuous through the day for his cool daring and assistance he offered me. Lieut. J. A. Mallory, acting assistant adjutant-general; Lieut. E. L. Anderson, Lieut. J. J. McCook, and Lieutenant Ashley all bore themselves with commendable gallantry and distinguished themselves by the intelligent manner in which they conveyed and executed my orders.

With the sincerest pleasure imaginable I call your attention to the signal bravery and daring heroism of Charles Common and Samuel J. Marsh, privates of Company A, Fifty-second Ohio. Their conduct was the admiration of all who saw them.

The casualties in my brigade are as follows: Six killed, 43 wounded, 6 missing.*

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL MCCOOK,

Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

Report of Lieut. Col. Daniel D. T. Cowen, Fifty-second Ohio Infantry.

HDQRS. 52D REGT. OHIO VOLS., 36TH BRIG.,
11TH DIV., ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Battle-field near Perryville, Ky., October 9, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by the Fifty-second Regiment in the battle of yesterday:

In pursuance of the order of Col. Daniel McCook, commanding the brigade, the Fifty-second, Regiment on the left of the brigade, moved forward at 3.30 o'clock yesterday morning from its position 3 miles west of Perryville toward that village. After advancing about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles and crossing a bridge spanning a small stream the regiment was formed in line of battle, and being ordered to advance to and hold the crest of the hill some 500 yards in front, Company A, in command of Lieutenant Bucke, and Company H, under command of Lieutenant Summers, both companies under command of Captain Clark, acting major, were deployed as skirmishers and our line advanced to the position named.

Some 300 yards from the run, at five minutes past 4 o'clock a. m., the skirmishers were fired upon by the rebel pickets. They promptly returned the fire and drove the pickets over the crest of the hill into and through the field and wood beyond and took their position some 400 yards in front of the regiment.

I am thus particular in detailing these items because to the Thirty-sixth Brigade and to the Fifty-second Regiment thus attaches the honor of opening the great and decisive battle of Perryville.

* But see revised statement, p. 1036.

Our skirmishers were almost constantly exchanging shots with the rebel skirmishers, and the regiment retained its position on the crest of the hill till 10.30 o'clock, when, in pursuance of Colonel McCook's order, it moved forward about one-half of a mile, where we remained without material change of position until 4 o'clock p. m., when the regiment moved forward a short distance with Company D, under command of Captain Morrow, and Company I, under command of Captain Schneider, deployed as skirmishers. While thus advancing the regiment was ordered by Colonel McCook to move to the right some 500 yards to assist in supporting Captain Barnett's Second Illinois Battery, which was being threatened by a heavy force.

The regiment moved rapidly to its position immediately on the left of the battery and in the rear of the Thirty-sixth Illinois, and remained in line behind the crest of the hill until the ammunition of the regiment in our front was exhausted, when the Fifty-second, at 5 p. m., moved forward over the crest of the hill in fine order and became immediately engaged with the enemy. The regiment continued to fire steadily and effectively about thirty minutes, when at sundown the rebel line with which we were engaged broke and fled in confusion.

I cannot speak in too high terms of praise of the conduct of the officers and men under my command during the whole of this memorable day. When all did their whole duty it would seem unjust to make any apparent discrimination by specially naming any. Yet circumstances and the varied incidents of the day brought under my special observation the conduct of some whom I therefore name. Capt. I. D. Clark, of Company A, acting major, from the time the first shot was fired on the skirmishers under his command in the early morning until the battle was over and the victory won, discharged his varied and arduous duties with skill, courage, and promptness. Adjutant Blackburn and the officers of the skirmishing companies also attracted my special notice while the regiment was in its position behind the crest of the hill on the left of Barnett's battery, and before it relieved the Thirty-sixth Illinois and became actually engaged with the enemy at that point.

Sergeant Rudolph, of Company H, was conspicuous among others of the regiment in assisting at the battery. At 10 a. m. the Second Missouri Regiment charged past the right of our line of skirmishers upon a force of rebel infantry, and Private Samuel J. Marsh, of Company A, joined them in the pursuit. Charley Common, a little drummer-boy, having lost his drum, took a musket and fought manfully in the line.

The following is a list of our losses, and it seems impossible to credit our apparent miraculous escape. I take the liberty to say that I ascribe it to a very great extent to the consummate skill with which the regiment was handled by our brigade and division commanders.

Killed: None.

Wounded: Private James Moneysmith, Company I, shoulder, dangerously; Private Edward Grimes, Company H, arm, severely; Private George Wilson, Company E, shoulder, slightly. Total wounded, 3; missing, none.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

D. D. T. COWEN,

Lieut. Col., Comdg. Fifty-second Regiment Ohio Vol. Infantry.

Reports of General Braxton Bragg, C. S. Army, commanding Department No. 2, with orders and correspondence, and including operations August 28–October 24.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 2,
Bryantsville, Ky., October 12, 1862.

SIR: By a great pressure of active engagements I have been unable to communicate since my last dispatch until now. My rapid tour of inspection was suddenly terminated at Frankfort just at the close of the ceremony of installing the Provisional Governor into office, a heavy advance of the enemy on that point rendering it necessary for me to concentrate my forces. General Polk was about the same time heavily pressed at Bardstown, and he, in accordance with previous orders, fell back toward Harrodsburg.

Not having succeeded in getting my supplies from Lexington to my new depot near Bryantsville, it was necessary to hold a large portion of General Smith's forces in that direction. Finding the enemy pressing heavily in his rear near Perryville, Major-General Hardee, of Polk's command, was obliged to halt and check him at that point. Having arrived at Harrodsburg from Frankfort I determined to give him battle there, and accordingly concentrated three divisions of my old command (the Army of the Mississippi, now under Major-General Polk)—Cheatham's, Buckner's, and Anderson's—and directed General Polk to take the command on the 7th and attack the enemy next morning. Withers' division had gone the day before to support Smith.

Having on the night of the 7th learned that the force in front of Smith had rapidly retreated, I moved early next morning to be present at the operations of Polk's forces. The two armies were formed confronting each other on opposite sides of the town of Perryville. After consulting with the general and reconnoitering the ground and examining his dispositions I declined to assume the command, but suggested some changes and modifications of his arrangements, which he promptly adopted.

The action opened at 12.30 p. m. between the skirmishers and artillery on both sides. Finding the enemy indisposed to advance upon us, and knowing he was receiving heavy re-enforcements, I deemed it best to assail him vigorously and so directed. The engagement became general soon thereafter, and was continued furiously from that time until dark, our troops never faltering and never failing in their efforts.

For the time engaged it was the severest and most desperately contested engagement within my knowledge. Fearfully outnumbered, our troops did not hesitate to engage at any odds, and though checked at times, they eventually carried every position and drove the enemy about 2 miles. But for the intervention of night we should have completed the work. We had captured 15 pieces of artillery by the most daring charges, killed 1 and wounded 2 brigadier-generals and a very large number of inferior officers and men, estimated at no less than 4,000, and captured 400 prisoners, including 3 staff officers, with servants, carriage, and baggage of Major-General McCook. The ground was literally covered with his dead and wounded.

In such a contest our own loss was necessarily severe, probably not less than 2,500 killed, wounded, and missing. Included in the wounded are Brigadier-Generals Wood, Cleburne, and Brown, gallant and noble soldiers, whose loss will be severely felt by their commands.

To Major-General Polk, commanding the forces; Major-General Hardee, commanding the left wing (two divisions), and Major-Generals Cheatham, Buckner, and Anderson, commanding divisions, is mainly due the brilliant achievements on this memorable field. Nobler troops were never more gallantly led. The country owes them a debt of gratitude which I am sure will be acknowledged.

Ascertaining that the enemy was heavily re-enforced during the night, I withdrew my force early the next morning to Harrodsburg and thence to this point. Major-General Smith arrived at Harrodsburg with most of his forces and Withers' division the next day (10th), and yesterday I withdrew the whole to this point, the enemy following slowly but not pressing us. My future movements cannot be indicated, as they will depend in a great measure on those of the enemy.

The campaign here was predicated on a belief and the most positive assurances that the people of this country would rise in mass to assert their independence. No people ever had so favorable an opportunity, but I am distressed to add there is little or no disposition to avail of it. Willing perhaps to accept their independence, they are neither disposed nor willing to risk their lives or their property in its achievement. With ample means to arm 20,000 men and a force with that to fully redeem the State we have not yet issued half the arms left us by casualties incident to the campaign.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BRAXTON BRAGG,

General, Commanding.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF TENNESSEE,
No. 1. } Tullahoma, Tenn., November 23, 1862.

I. The several regiments, battalions, and independent companies engaged in the ever-memorable battle at Perryville, Ky., on October 8, in which they achieved a signal victory over the enemy, numbering three to their one, and drove him from the field with terrible slaughter and the loss of his artillery, will inscribe the name of that field on their colors. The corps of Cheatham's division which made the gallant and desperate charge resulting in the capture of three of the enemy's batteries will, in addition to the name, place the cross cannon inverted.

By command of General Bragg:

GEORGE WM. BRENT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF TENNESSEE,
May 20, 1863.

SIR: Constant occupation and the absence of my records during the active service in this quarter have prevented until now a full narrative of the events incident to the campaign of this army last autumn in Tennessee and Kentucky.

Early in July, 1862, under instructions, a division of troops under Major-General McCown was sent from my headquarters, at Tupelo, Miss., to the Department of East Tennessee. In the latter part of that month it became evident we were being pressed there by a heavy corps of the enemy sent from Corinth under Major-General Buell. This movement threatened the very heart of our country, and was destined, unless checked immediately, to sever our main line of connection between the East and West. At this time the army in Mississippi had much improved in health and strength, and had progressed rapidly in discipline, organization, and instruction. Leaving a sufficient force, I determined to move to Chattanooga, oppose this dangerous combination of the enemy, and, if practicable, drive him from our important provision country in Western Alabama, Middle Tennessee, and Kentucky.

Early in August the infantry force for this purpose (four divisions) was concentrated near Chattanooga and awaited the arrival of the artillery, cavalry, and baggage train, which necessarily moved across the country by land. Maj. Gen. E. Kirby Smith, commanding the Department of East Tennessee, met me by invitation in Chattanooga, and most generously placed his whole command at my disposal. It was soon determined, upon his suggestion, that all his force should be used to operate upon the enemy's left at Cumberland Gap, and he was requested to confer with Brig. Gen. Humphrey Marshall, commanding in Southwestern Virginia, with whom he was already in correspondence, to secure his co-operation also in the movement. After returning to Knoxville General Smith asked for further assistance, and two fine brigades, under Brig. Gen. P. R. Cleburne and Col. Preston Smith, were sent to him in addition to the division which had gone from Tupelo. The balance of my immediate command, the Army of the Mississippi, divided between Major-Generals Polk and Hardee, made every preparation and awaited only its baggage train and artillery to cross the Tennessee River and enter upon its arduous and perilous campaign over the mountains dividing East and Middle Tennessee. The movement of the artillery and wagons across the mountain region of North Alabama having been successfully accomplished, late in August we commenced crossing the river at Chattanooga with very limited means. The enemy with a largely superior force occupied the lines of the railroads from Decatur to Bridgeport, Ala., from Decatur to Nashville, and from Nashville to Stevenson, with large detached commands at McMinnville and Cumberland Gap.

Having crossed the river at Chattanooga the column took up its march on August 28 over Walden's Ridge and the Cumberland Mountains for Middle Tennessee. Major-General Smith had already successfully passed through Northeastern Tennessee and gained the rear of Cumberland Gap, held by the enemy in strong force, well fortified. Leaving a sufficient force to hold the enemy in observation, his dislodgment being considered impracticable, he moved, as authorized, with the balance of his command on Lexington, Ky. This rich country, full of supplies so necessary to us, was represented to be occupied by a force which could make but feeble resistance. How well and successfully that duty was performed has already been reported by General Smith. His complete victory over the enemy at Richmond, Ky., and his occupation of Lexington rendered it necessary for me to intercept General Buell, now rapidly moving toward Nashville, or to move toward the right, so as to secure a junction with General Smith when necessary.

On reaching Middle Tennessee it was found that the enemy's main force, by use of railroads and good turnpikes, had concentrated in Nashville and was strongly fortified. With a heavy demonstration against this position my force was thrown rapidly to Glasgow, Ky., and to my great satisfaction reached that point September 13, before any portion of the enemy passed Bowling Green. As soon as my object was discovered they moved in haste by railroad and turnpike, but reached Bowling Green only in time to find we had seized and now held both roads near Cave City. An assault on the enemy's superior force, well fortified at Nashville, gave no promise of success, while any movement for that purpose would have enabled him to throw his whole force to his rear rapidly, thus rendering certain the capture or destruction of General Smith's small command at Lexington, whereas by the flank movement adopted the enemy's communications were severed and his forces separated, while my own communications were secured. Without firing a gun we had also compelled the evacuation of Northern Alabama and Middle Tennessee south of the Cumberland. Prepared to assail Buell's forces should he attempt to pass north, I determined to rest my jaded troops at Glasgow, where some subsistence was to be had. While thus engaged I learned that the commander of my outpost brigade at Cave City had advanced upon and assailed the enemy's fortified position at Munfordville (the railroad and pike crossing the Green River), and after a gallant fight against largely superior numbers had been repulsed with considerable loss. Unwilling to allow the impression of a disaster to rest on the minds of my men, the force was rapidly prepared and our march renewed on the evening of the 15th, with a very scanty supply of provisions. Hardee's wing moved by Cave City direct upon Munfordville, and Polk, by the Bear Wallow road, crossed the river some miles to the right and gained the enemy's rear in the afternoon of the 16th. An immediate demand for the surrender of the garrison was made, and after a few hours' negotiation an unconditional submission was obtained. We secured 4,267 prisoners, 10 pieces of artillery, 5,000 small-arms, and a proportional quantity of ammunition, horses, mules, and military stores.

This surrender having been received and completed on September 17, dispositions were made for an attack from General Buell's main force, supposed to be advancing on our rear from Bowling Green. Efforts were made to draw him to an attack by maneuvering a division in his front, while our main force held position south of the intrenchments on Green River. I failed to accomplish this object. With my effective force present, reduced by sickness, exhaustion, and the recent affair before the intrenchments at Munfordville, to half that of the enemy, I could not prudently afford to attack him there in his selected position. Should I pursue him farther toward Bowling Green he might fall back to that place and behind his fortifications. Reduced at the end of four days to three days' rations, and in a hostile country, utterly destitute of supplies, a serious engagement brought on anywhere in that direction could not fail (whatever its results) to materially cripple me. The loss of a battle would be eminently disastrous. I was well aware also that he had a practicable route by way of Morgantown or Brownsville to the Ohio River and thence to Louisville. We were therefore compelled to give up the object and seek for subsistence. Orders were sent for a supply train from our depot at Lexington to meet us in Bardstown, and the march was commenced for the latter place. Instructions had been given General Smith for a simultaneous movement of the column at Lexington to Shelbyville, that combined operations might be immediately undertaken against Louisville. Orders had also been given for a close observation on the enemy at Cumberland Gap, and that he should be intercepted in any attempt to escape.

On my arrival at Bardstown I learned from Major-General Smith, then at Lexington, that the enemy was moving from Cumberland Gap, endeavoring to escape by the valley of Sandy River, in Eastern Kentucky, and that he had sent his whole available force in pursuit. A sufficient force to prevent this escape and to hold the enemy in check there and compel his surrender had been ordered and was confidently expected from another quarter to have followed General Smith's movement in time for this purpose. Circumstances unknown to me in our then isolated position, and over which I could not exercise control, had prevented this consummation so confidently relied on and so necessary to our success. The delay necessarily resulting from this pursuit of the enemy by General Smith prevented a junction of our forces, and enabled General Buell to reach Louisville before the assault could be made upon that city.

The troops at Bardstown, much jaded and foot-sore from the long and arduous march, were placed in position for rest and recuperation during the absence of the column from Lexington. Having made all needful arrangements for them, ordered our supplies at Lexington transferred to a position selected as a general depot near Bryantsville, and provided for opening a line of communication through Cumberland Gap, I left Bardstown on the 28th for Lexington to confer with General Smith and inform myself fully as to our condition and the resources of the country. Major-General Polk, left at Bardstown in command, was directed, if pressed by a force too large to justify his giving battle, to fall back in the direction of the new depot near Bryantsville, in front of which I propose to concentrate for action.

Arriving in Lexington on October 1, I met the Provisional Governor of the State, who had previously been invited to accompany me, and arranged for his installation at the capital on the 4th. The available forces of General Smith, just returned to Lexington, were ordered immediately to Frankfort.

Finding but little progress had been made in the transfer of our accumulated stores from Lexington, and learning of a heavy movement of the enemy from Louisville, I ordered Major-General Polk in writing, dated Lexington, 1 p. m., October 2, and sent it by two routes, to move from Bardstown with his whole available force by way of Bloomfield toward Frankfort, to strike the enemy in flank and rear, and informed him that Major-General Smith would attack in front. When received at Bardstown on the 3d the general submitted this order, which is not mentioned in his report (see Exhibit No. 1), to a council of wing and division commanders, and determined to move as originally instructed by me on leaving Bardstown. Fortunately notice of this determination reached me at Frankfort in time to prevent the movement against the enemy's front by General Smith, but it necessitated an entire change in my plans, the abandonment of the capital, and the partial uncovering and ultimate loss of our stores at Lexington. Not doubting but that some imperative necessity unknown to me existed with the general for this departure from instructions I conformed at once to his movements, and put General Smith's command in motion to form the junction farther south, still covering the supplies at Lexington as far as practicable.

Proceeding rapidly to Harrodsburg myself, I was met there by Major-General Polk on October 6, with the head of the column, which had marched from Bardstown on the 3d. After a full and free conference with the general my first views remained unchanged, and as he reported to me at midnight of October 6, when inclosing a written report from Major-General Hardee that he did not regard the enemy in large strength near there (see Exhibit No. 2), I renewed early on the morning of the 7th the orders to concentrate all the forces in front of the depot at Lexington. (See Exhibit No. 3.) But before this order was put in full operation information was received that the enemy in limited force was pressing upon General Hardee at Perryville; that he was nowhere concentrated against us, but was moving by separate columns; his right (see map herewith, marked A*) was near Lebanon, a corps in front of Perryville, and his left (two entire corps) extending by way of Mackville to Frankfort, a line of at least 60 miles. This presented an opportunity which I promptly seized of striking him in detail. Accordingly written orders were given to Major-General Polk, dated Harrodsburg, October 7, 5.40 p. m. (see Exhibit No. 4), to move Cheatham's division, now at Harrodsburg, back to Perryville, and to proceed to that point himself, attack the enemy immediately, rout him, and then move rapidly to join Major-General Smith, as before ordered, and, it was added, "no time should be lost in this movement."

Meanwhile, during the same day, I had received repeated and urgent applications from General Smith (near Frankfort) by express, representing the enemy to be in strong force in his immediate front and earnestly asking for re-enforcements. Accordingly Withers' division had been detached and sent to him (before receipt by me of the information from Perryville), and was already far on the way thither at the time when the movement to Perryville was ordered, and this will account for my being without the benefit of this division in the battle which ensued next day at the latter place. Major-General Polk arrived at Perryville with Cheatham's division before midnight of the 7th and the troops were placed by General Hardee in the line of battle previously established.

Our forces now in this position consisted of three divisions of infantry (about 14,500) and two small brigades of cavalry (about 1,500). To this the enemy opposed one corps (Gilbert's), about 18,000 strong. Information reached me during the evening and night of the 7th at Harrodsburg which indicated that no attack could be made on General Smith's command the next day, and I immediately changed my purpose to join him and determined to go to Perryville. From unofficial sources I was led to fear the existence of serious misapprehension in regard to the position and strength of the enemy's forces near Perryville, as well as to the location of our supplies, supposed to be at Bryantsville, when in truth but two days' rations for the army had yet reached that point.

Having ordered the attack and that no time should be lost, I was concerned at not hearing the commencement of the engagement early in the morning, but was much relieved for the time by receiving from General Polk a note, dated Perryville, 6 a. m., October 8, informing me that the enemy's pickets commenced firing at daybreak and that he should bring on the engagement vigorously. (See Exhibit No. 5.) To my surprise, however, no gun was heard, and on my arrival, about 10 a. m., I was informed that it was determined not to attack, but to assume the "defensive-offensive." After a hasty reconnaissance and consultation orders were given for some changes deemed necessary in the line of battle; a portion of it being withdrawn was restored, and Major-General Polk was ordered to bring on the engagement. Impatient at the delay after this order I dispatched a staff officer to repeat it to the general, and soon thereafter I followed in person and put the troops in motion.

Major-General Buell, commanding the forces there in our immediate front, in his official report says, "I had somewhat expected an attack early in the morning on Gilbert's corps while it was isolated." These delays had postponed the action until it was now past noon and a second corps of the enemy (18,000) had reached the field. The general officers at the meeting about daylight (see General Polk's report) who resolved on this delay must have acted without correct information and in ignorance that my orders were urgent and imperative for the attack; moreover I was within one hour's ride and was not consulted or informed.

The action, having at length commenced, was fought by our troops with a gallantry and persistent determination to conquer which the enemy could not resist; and though he was largely more than two to our one he was driven from the field with terrible loss. Night closed the operations just as a third corps of the enemy threw the head of its column against our left flank. We had entire possession of the battle-field, with thousands of the enemy's killed and wounded, several batteries of artillery, and 600 prisoners. For the details of this action, so creditable to our arms, I refer to the reports of subordinate commanders, herewith forwarded. In the progress of the engagement we had advanced so far as to expose our left flank to the third corps, just arrived from the direction of Lebanon. I therefore caused our line, which rested upon the field until midnight, to fall back to its original position. Assured that the enemy had concentrated his three corps against us, and finding that our loss had already been quite heavy in the unequal contest against two, I gave the orders to fall back at daylight on Harrodsburg, and sent instructions to Major-General Smith to move his command to form a junction with me at that place. There I again offered the enemy battle, which he declined, and moved to possess himself of my line toward Cumberland Gap.

My whole force was accordingly retired on the 11th upon Bryantsville. Here the enemy again declined to advance upon me, but occupied himself in the destruction of the numerous mills and other sources from which we drew our only supply of breadstuffs. There was no accumulation of this essential article at any point except Lexington which had been now lost, though the country afforded an immensity of grain. The necessary concentration of my forces rendered accumulation from the small country mills impracticable, and our supply was reduced to only four days' rations. To attack and rout an enemy largely superior in numbers (for simply to cripple him would not suffice) or to evacuate the country in which we could no longer subsist became now an imperative necessity. Moreover I was informed that still another force was moving on my right flank from Cincinnati in addition to the overwhelming one with which I was already contending. The season of autumnal rains was approaching; the rough and uneven roads leading over the stupendous mountains of Eastern Tennessee and Kentucky to and through Cumberland Gap would then become utterly impassable to an army. Should I remain till then and meet with a reverse the army would be lost. Had the foregoing considerations permitted a doubt to remain in my mind as to the course of duty it would have been entirely removed upon receipt of the intelligence of our disasters in North Mississippi, by which the whole country in our rear was left open to the enemy's victorious forces there.

Accordingly all necessary arrangements were made and the troops put in motion by two columns, under Major-Generals Polk and Smith, on October 13, for Cumberland Gap. After a rapid march, with some privations in the absence of baggage trains, which had been sent ahead, we passed the Gap with immaterial loss from October 19 to 24. The column of Major-General Polk was vigorously pursued by the enemy for several days, but was so successfully protected by the cavalry, under the admirable management of Colonels Wheeler and Wharton, that but little annoyance was felt.

Though compelled to yield to largely superior numbers and fortuitous circumstances a portion of the valuable territory from which we had driven the enemy the fruits of the campaign were very large and have had a most important bearing upon our subsequent military operations here and elsewhere. With a force enabling us at no time to put more than 40,000 men of all arms and in all places in battle we had redeemed North Alabama and Middle Tennessee and recovered possession of Cumberland Gap, the gate-way to the heart of the Confederacy. We had killed, wounded, and captured no less than 25,000 of the enemy; taken over 30 pieces of artillery, 17,000 small-arms, some 2,000,000 cartridges for the same; destroyed some hundreds of wagons and brought off several hundreds more with their teams and harness complete; replaced our jaded horses by a fine mount; lived two months upon supplies wrested from the enemy's possession; secured material to clothe the army, and finally secured subsistence from the redeemed country to support not only the army but also a large force of the Confederacy to the present time.

In four weeks after passing Cumberland Gap on this memorable and arduous campaign, jaded, hungry, and ragged (as necessarily incidental to that service), this noble army was found with serried ranks in front of the enemy at Nashville better organized, better disciplined, better clothed and fed, in better health and tone, and in larger numbers than when it entered on the campaign, though it had made a march at least three times as long as that of the enemy in reaching the same point, and was moreover entirely self-sustained. Too high an estimate cannot be placed upon officers and men capable of such fortitude, resolution, courage, and self-denial. Nothing short of the patriotism which pervaded our ranks, and the intelligence, zeal, and gallantry displayed on all occasions and by all grades, can account for such results.

BRAXTON BRAGG,

General, Commanding.

The last twenty-four hours have developed a condition of things on my front and left flank which I shadowed forth in my last note to you, which makes compliance with this order not only eminently inexpedient, but impracticable. I have called a council of wing and division commanders, to whom I have submitted the matter, and find that they unanimously indorse my views. General BRAGG:

GENERAL: I send you some dispatches just received. I have ordered General Anderson to move at 3 a. m. to-morrow morning to join General Hardee at Perryville and General Cleburne to follow him at 4 a. m. I have ordered both to have two days' cooked rations in the haversacks. Wood's rations will be sent him in the morning. I have ordered Wharton to report to General Hardee with his own and Wade's cavalry and the regiment of infantry now at Lebanon. This force, I think, will be sufficient for the general's purposes. I have directed General Cheatham not to leave his present camp near town for that under General Withers, 4 miles out, until further orders. I have directed General Hardee to ascertain, if possible, the strength of the enemy which may be covered by his advance. I cannot think it large.

I am, general, respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. POLK,

Major-General, Commanding Army of the Mississippi.

P. S.—I have had two companies of cavalry posted on the road leading to Mackville.

II. General E. Kirby Smith's command will move to-morrow to Versailles, throwing a division toward Frankfort. Allston's cavalry, now at Salvisa, will cover Cheatham's movement, reporting to Major-General Cheatham.

III. Major-General Hardee, commanding left wing, Army of the Mississippi, will follow these movements as circumstances allow, notifying these headquarters of his move. Colonel Wade's infantry will join the guard at the depot at Bryantsville, reporting to the commanding officer there, and his cavalry will report to Colonel Wheeler, commanding cavalry of Hardee's wing.

By command of General Bragg:

GEORGE WM. BRENT,
Chief of Staff and Assistant Adjutant-General.

Harrodsburg, Ky., October 7, 1862—5.40 p. m.

General POLK:

GENERAL: In view of the news from Hardee you had better move with Cheatham's division to his support and give the enemy battle immediately; rout him, and then move to our support at Versailles. Smith moves forward to-day in that direction, and I wish Withers to march to-night toward Lawrenceburg, crossing thence to-morrow to Versailles, and follow up Smith and report to him. His wagon train, except the ammunition and ordnance, had better cross at McCown's, turning off at Salvisa. No time should be lost in these movements. I shall follow Smith.

Respectfully and truly, yours,

BRAXTON BRAGG,
General, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Perryville, Ky., October 8, 1862—6 a. m.

General BRAGG, Commanding Department No. 2:

GENERAL: The enemy seem disposed to press this morning. Their pickets commenced firing at daylight. Understanding it to be your wish to give them battle we shall do so vigorously. Should we succeed we will pass to the right, with the view of joining General Kirby Smith. If it should become necessary to fall back we will do so on Danville and Bryantsville, with a view of uniting with General Smith at that point. I have directed General Preston Smith to have all the trains belonging to this army now at Harrodsburg collected and moved out on the road to Bryantsville, and to be ready to move, when it should become expedient, on that place.

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

L. POLK,
Major-General, Commanding Army of the Mississippi.

P. S.—General Smith should cover and protect these wagons should it become necessary.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO THE BATTLE OF PERRYVILLE, OR CHAPLIN HILLS.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF TENNESSEE,
Tullahoma, Tenn., April 13, 1863.

Lieut. Gen. W. J. HARDEE, Commanding Corps : *

GENERAL: In a communication from Major-General Polk, commanding Army of the Mississippi, dated Bardstown, October 3, 1862, addressed to me, he says:

*This seems to have been a circular-letter to the several division and other commanders. Copies are on file addressed to Patton Anderson, Donelson, B. R. Johnson, and A. P. Stewart, and Buckner's letter of April 26, 1863, indicates receipt of copy by him.

I am in receipt of your note of the 2d, 1 p. m., directing me to move with all my available force via Bloomfield to Frankfort to strike the enemy on his flank and rear. * * * I have called a council of wing and division commanders, to whom I have submitted the matter, and find that they unanimously indorse my views. I shall therefore pursue a different course assured that when the facts are submitted to you you will justify my decision.

In the official report of the battle of Perryville by the general, after stating that he was ordered to attack the enemy early in the morning, he says :

At a meeting of general officers held about daylight it was resolved, in view of the great disparity of our forces, to adopt the "defensive-offensive;" to await the movements of the enemy, and to be guided by events as they were developed.

As these councils (usually regarded as sacred among military men) are now publicly disclosed, and in a manner compromising you as advising a disobedience to my orders, the facts are laid before you, and I beg, if consistent with your sense of duty, you will inform me to what extent you sustained the general in his acknowledged disobedience. For your information I inclose a copy of my order directing him to give the enemy battle at Perryville "immediately," and request to be informed whether, in asking your advice, he informed you of the existence of this order.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BRAXTON BRAGG,
General, Commanding.

[Indorsement.]

General POLK, Commanding, &c. :

DEAR GENERAL : I send you this paper, received yesterday, as I fear you may not have received it from headquarters, and I think it right you should have it. My impression now is to decline answering it. First, because your "acknowledged disobedience" may lead to a court-martial, and, second, because I cannot well do so without opening up the Kentucky campaign, which would lead to controversy, which at this time ought to be avoided. These are my present convictions. The paper has been sent to Cleburne and Wood, and I suppose to all the general officers who were under your command. If you choose to rip up the Kentucky campaign you can tear Bragg into tatters.

Truly, yours,

W. J. HARDEE,
Lieutenant-General.

PERRYVILLE, KY., October 7, 1862—7.30 p. m.

General BRAGG, Commanding Army :

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am receipt of your "confidential circular" of this date, also your letter of instructions to General Polk. From the tenor of the letter of instructions to General Polk I presume that this is later than the confidential circular. Both are in the same inclosure and of the same date. Permit me, from the friendly relations so long existing between us, to write you plainly. Do not scatter your forces. There is one rule in our profession which should never be forgotten; it is to throw the masses of your troops on the fractions of the enemy. The movement last proposed will divide your army and each may be defeated, whereas by keeping them united success is certain. If it be your policy to strike the enemy at Versailles, take your whole force with you and make the blow effective; if, on the contrary, you should decide to strike the army in front of me, first let that be done with a force which will make success certain. Strike with your whole strength first to the right then to the left. I could not sleep quietly to-night without giving expression to these views. Whatever you decide to do will meet my hearty co-operation.

Your sincere friend,

W. J. HARDEE,
Major-General.

N. B.—If you wish my opinion, it is that in view of the position of your depots you ought to strike this force first.

I have no envelope, but I send this by an officer.

SHELBYVILLE, TENN., April 15, 1863.

General BRAXTON BRAGG, Commanding Department No. 2 :

GENERAL: I am this day in receipt of yours of the 13th instant,* in which reference is made to action had in council of wing and division commanders held at Bardstown, Ky., on the 3d and at Perryville on October 8, 1862. After quoting extracts from General Polk's reports of these deliberations you remark that—

As these councils (usually regarded as sacred among military men) are now publicly disclosed, and in a manner compromising you as advising a disobedience of my orders, the facts are laid before you, and I beg, if consistent with your sense of duty, you will inform me to what extent you sustained the general in his acknowledged disobedience.

As I can see no way in which detriment to the public interest might now arise from such a course I do not hesitate to comply with your request.

On October 3, 1862, I was present at General Polk's headquarters in Bardstown at a council composed, as well as I now remember, of Major-Generals Polk, Hardee, and Cheatham, and Brig. Gen. S. A. M. Wood and myself. Your dispatch from Frankfort, of date 1 p. m. October 2, was read, and after an interchange of views in regard to our military condition, as junior officer present I was called upon by General Polk to give my views as to what was best to be done. I hesitated to do so, whereupon General Polk inquired as to the cause of my reluctance to advise a course which seemed to be so clear, and I replied that your order just read did not seem to admit of any other course than that of compliance, and that if any other alternative than that of obedience to the order was adopted it might involve you and the forces with you near Frankfort in embarrassment, if not defeat; that in your dispatch you definitely stated that General Kirby Smith would attack the enemy then in your front, and that we must move through Bloomfield upon him and "strike him in flank and rear;" that in your contemplated attack you evidently relied upon co-operation, and that if we failed in that co-operation disaster might be the consequence. After other conversations, not now remembered, General Polk, again addressing me as the junior present, inquired what would be my advice in case there was no such order as the one referred to, remarking at the same time that you could not have had the lights before you at the time you issued the order which we had at that time, and that therefore the order should not be taken into consideration in making up our judgment as to what should be done. I replied promptly:

* See Bragg to Hardee of that date, p. 1097.

In that case, were there no order to the contrary, I should unhesitatingly recommend that we fall back to a more favorable position, to cover our depots at Danville and Bryantsville.

I understood that all of the other officers present concurred in that opinion. General Polk at once announced his intention to move in the direction of Danville. It is proper that I should state that he subsequently told me that he had received a dispatch from you the purport of which indicated the wisdom of the move he had determined on; remarked that it was fortunate that he had not obeyed the letter of your order. Of course at this late day, speaking from memory only, I cannot give more than the substance of conversations.

In regard to the action that was had at a meeting of general officers held about daylight near Perryville, on October 8, in which the "defensive-offensive" was adopted, I have no recollection at all. I cannot remember that I was present at any council at or near Perryville, except an informal one, composed of Major-General Hardee, Brigadier-General Wood, and myself, improvised on the evening of October 7, at which General Hardee, of his own motion, addressed you the note which I suppose is referred to in your communication to General Polk, dated Harrodsburg, October 7, 5.40 p. m. In that note General Hardee advised the policy of concentrating our forces before we made an attack. He read me the note after it was written and I fully concurred in the policy it advised. Your note just referred to I did not see nor was I made acquainted with its contents. Had I been present at a council on the occasion referred to, in the absence of orders to the contrary I think it quite probable I should have advised the "defensive-offensive" policy; but at this lapse of time I would not undertake to censure a different course.

Believing that throughout the Kentucky campaign, with the lights then before us, the best was done which could have been done under the circumstances, and having no disposition to cast censure now upon those whom I failed to find fault with at the time, I can only hope that the same army under its tried leaders may soon be permitted to repeat the experiments with better facilities and under more favorable circumstances.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 PATTON ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General.

HEADQUARTERS HARDEE'S CORPS,
Tullahoma, Tenn., April 16, 1863.

General BRAXTON BRAGG:

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, containing extracts from official communications made by Lieutenant-General Polk to you in regard to the operations in Kentucky in October last. You refer to an order issued by you on October 2, directing Lieutenant-General Polk to move his forces to Frankfort and strike the enemy on his flank and rear, which order you say was disobeyed by the general after a council of war and at which I was present. You also refer to the official report of Lieutenant-General Polk of the battle of Perryville, and state that after another meeting of general officers he disobeyed your orders of October 7, a copy of which you inclose. After referring to these topics you censure the disclosure of these facts, which you assert are in a manner compromising to me [and begged me], if consistent with my sense of duty, to inform you to what extent I sustained the general in his acknowledged disobedience.

In answer I have the honor to say that while I do not desire to shrink from any responsibility incurred by me in the part I took in the councils of war called by Lieutenant-General Polk, I do not consider it proper, in answer to a communication such as you have addressed, to enter into details of what occurred on the occasions referred to.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. J. HARDEE,
Lieutenant-General.

HDQRS. POLK'S CORPS, ARMY OF TENNESSEE,
April 17, 1863.

Lieutenant-General HARDEE, C. S. Army:

DEAR GENERAL: I am in receipt of the letter addressed you on the subject of the alleged disobedience of orders, and thank you for the prompt indication of what was brewing. I am compelled to say it does not at all surprise me; so that when I said to you I felt it to be quite as necessary to watch Tullahoma as Murfreesborough you will see I was not mistaken in my estimate of the necessities of my position or of the character of others. As to the specific acts for which the arrest and trial are to be had (for I am satisfied that an arrest and trial are deliberately determined upon), I have to say I feel quite easy. There was certainly no disobedience of orders in either case. In that of Bardstown I was ordered to take all my available force and move, &c. As to what portion of my force was in that condition the general did not undertake to judge himself nor did he require me to be guided by the judgment of others. By the terms of the order I was to be the judge myself. I did judge, and, in view of the fact that I knew I had the largest part of Buell's army in my immediate front on the Elizabethtown, Shepherdsville, Mount Washington, and Taylorsville roads, and that if I moved from my position at Bardstown to strike the column moving upon Shelbyville in flank and rear I should not only cease to hold four columns in check but would expose my own flank to be assailed by them all while I was moving to assault one, I thought it quite plain I had no troops at my command which were available for the execution of such an order. That was the precise point submitted by me to the council of officers I summoned for consultation, to wit: Whether I had any force which in the circumstances before me might be regarded as available for the purpose indicated. I thought not, and every officer in the council approved the soundness of my decision. We were all clearly satisfied as to the position of the troops of the enemy, which information we were sure the general commanding the forces could not have, or he would not have issued such an order. It was this view of the case that caused General Anderson, as he admits and as all may remember, to see his way to vote for declining the movement indicated and to counsel the retreat on Harrodsburg.

As to the Perryville affair, if I am to be tried for disobedience of orders there the question arises, What orders? Surely not what purports to be orders in the paper sent you and by you to me. That paper is not mandatory, but simply suggestive and advisory:

In view of the news from Hardee you had better move with Cheatham's division to his support and give the enemy battle immediately, &c. No time should be lost in these movements.

The order was not "you will move upon Perryville and attack the enemy early the next morning," as the paper sent you charges. The writing sent me was not an order at all, but counsel or advice to do a certain thing in view of information received from Hardee. It does not help the matter to say that I was advised to do it immediately and that it was added that no time should be lost in profiting by the advice to rout him, &c. The language was clearly not peremptory, but suggestive and advisory, and left me the use of my discretion as to the details of the attack, it being understood that I accepted the advice and proceeded to carry the operations into execution as judiciously and promptly as a willing mind and sound discretion would allow. It will be observed also that I was advised to act in view of the news from Hardee. If that remark meant anything to an officer who was counseled to move to the support of Hardee it was that he should put himself in communication with Hardee and to take that news into his account in any movement to be made. This was done, as you know, in the council held, and the result was a confirmation of what I already knew—that four-fifths of Buell's army was before me, and consequently with my small force great caution must be observed.

I am said to have acknowledged a disobedience of orders. I have done no such thing. In regard to the paper sent me for my guidance I quoted from memory. I said I was ordered to attack the enemy in the morning, and on looking at the language of the paper it appears that the word "morning" was not used at all nor is the word "attack" used, but I was to give him "battle immediately." But supposing it to have been mandatory instead of advisory, which the face of the paper denies, what is understood by immediately? I could have attacked him the night of my arrival and before I had the benefit of daylight. Would I have been justified in this? Certainly not. Why? Because in the nature of things and in view of the news from Hardee, to which I was referred as the inspiration prompting the order or counsel, it would not have been judicious. I was, I conceived, left at liberty to exercise such discretion as sound sense and the facts before me demanded, and I felt that I was acting on the inside of the instructions given me, and under the deep and painful conviction that the force at my disposal was totally inadequate to perform the duty assigned it; and while I must attempt that duty I should do it in such a way as to prevent the wreck and destruction of the little army with whose conduct and safety I was charged. I took counsel of the general officers with me, frankly stating the whole case as I understood it. I expressed my opinion as to what my duty required me to do in view of all the facts. They unanimously agreed with me, so far as I remember, and I proceeded to execute the suggestions, or orders, if you will, of the general as promptly and yet as wisely as the condition of affairs before me would allow.

While I was thus engaged the general came upon the field. I was engaging the enemy with my skirmishers, but thus far on the defensive-offensive. This was about the middle of the morning. Shortly after he gave me positive orders to attack the enemy and it was done. As to my being held responsible for disobedience of orders in this matter, it never entered my head until the reception of your note; however, I shall endeavor to bear the matter with becoming moderation, and although I cannot claim to have "a talent for quarreling," I trust I shall not be found wanting either in a capacity or willingness to take care of my reputation so far as it can be vindicated by the truth. The passage in reference to the sacred character of military councils in the connection in which it is introduced is unfortunate. What transpires in council is sacred, truly; that is, not to be disclosed so long as there is a military necessity or expediency for its being kept secret. When that necessity or expediency which affects the public welfare only has passed there can be no reason why the opinion or language of any officer upon any topic should not be the subject of remark. It is to be supposed that every officer, when expressing his opinion in a council, does so independently and honestly in the face of the facts before him and for patriotic objects only; that he has no by-ends to answer, nothing to conceal of which he might be ashamed, and therefore that, so far as his opinions or counsel are concerned, the only measure of concealment of importance to him is the extent to which the public interests would be affected by the disclosure. The implied censure therefore lacks a foundation and fails. Besides, if the general would reflect he would see that in that passage itself he is committing the very offense which he has unsuccessfully charged upon me. The report of the battle of Perryville which I sent to him, and through him to the Senate beyond him, it is not allowable for him or any other person to use for public purposes until its contents have been "publicly disclosed" by order of the Senate to print. This is a trifle, but it belongs to the same family with that to which he invites attention. How far you may feel obliged for the protection he is affording you against the indiscretion or treachery by which you have been exposed, or whether that piece of service has won his way into your confidence far enough to lay you under obligations to join me in acknowledging disobedience to your duty, is a matter I am not competent to determine.

I note what you say of the campaign. There is a time for all things, and I agree with you the time for dealing with that has not arrived.

I am, general, very truly, yours,

L. POLK,
Lieutenant-General.

Lieut. Gen. LEONIDAS POLK, Shelbyville, Tenn.:

GENERAL: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a note I have this day addressed to General Bragg, which will explain why I have not sooner complied with my promise to furnish you with a copy of my former communication touching the same subject.

Hoping I may soon have it in my power to do so and that you may suffer no inconvenience by the delay, I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

[Inclosure.]

SHELBYVILLE, TENN., *April 17, 1863.*General BRAXTON BRAGG, Tullahoma, Tenn. :

GENERAL: On yesterday Lieutenant-General Polk requested an interview with me, for the purpose of comparing our recollections of the councils at Bardstown and Perryville, referred to in his official report of the battle of Perryville and of which you had inquired in your communication of the 13th instant. In that interview I promised to furnish the lieutenant-general with a copy of my reply to your communication just alluded to; but on returning to my quarters I find that I did not preserve a fair copy, but instead only rough notes, in which verbal corrections and interlineations occur so frequently that I must beg you will supply me with a copy to enable me to comply with my promise. In talking over with General Polk what transpired at the Bardstown council each was enabled to refresh the memory of the other to some extent, and in this way I now recollect that in combating my scruples in regard to any other movement than that indicated in your dispatch from Frankfort the general called my attention to the word "available," made use of in that dispatch, and proceeded to show that he had no available forces at Bardstown for a move of the kind. Again, my impression was that in that Frankfort dispatch you had expressed a purpose of attacking the enemy in your front at an early moment, if not the next day. The general's recollection is that such intention on your part was expressed in a different communication. I have not spoken with any of the other officers composing that council in regard to its deliberations, but the result of my interview with Lieutenant-General Polk discloses no discrepancy between our recollections of what transpired, at least on material points. The point upon which I was embarrassed was this: I feared you would move out with the forces at and near Frankfort and give the enemy battle, relying upon our co-operation upon his flank and rear, and of this trouble I felt entirely relieved when I found that you had not done so.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 PATTON ANDERSON,

GENERAL: Your communication of 13th instant, inclosing a copy of your order to General Polk, dated Headquarters Department No. 2, Harrodsburg, October 7, 1862, 5.40 p. m., has just been received. In reply I have to state that I was not present at either of the councils alluded to in your communication, and was not aware until informed of the fact by your letter that a council or meeting of general officers was held by General Polk on the morning of October 8, 1862, nor that he had received orders from you to attack the enemy early that morning. When the council was held at Bardstown I was on outpost some 9 miles from Bardstown, on the Louisville road. In short, the only council called by General Polk to which I was ever summoned or ever attended was held in Columbus, Ky., in November or December, 1861. I have been present at one or two other assemblages of officers called by him, but they were not of the nature of advisory councils nor was I called upon to express an opinion.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Brigadier-General, C. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
Mobile, Ala., April 26, 1863.

General BRAXTON BRAGG,
Commanding Army of Tennessee, Tullahoma, Tenn.:

GENERAL: Your letter of the 13th instant has been received. You ask me, if I deem it consistent with my sense of duty, to inform you how far I may have sustained Lieutenant-General Polk in his acknowledged disobedience of orders in his conduct at Bardstown and Perryville, Ky., as based upon the opinions of certain councils assembled by his orders at those points. At the first council alluded to in your note I was not present, but was with you at Lexington and Frankfort. My views of that portion of the campaign you can probably recall, as in interviews at each of those cities I gave my opinion, when sought by you, with the candor I have ever used toward my superiors. I was present at the consultation of general officers at Perryville, and at the request of Lieutenant-General Polk, who was my commander, gave my views of what, in my opinion, was the proper course to be adopted under the circumstances in which that portion of the army found itself at the time, without obtruding my opinion upon him more than I had done at other times upon yourself. I expressed it when called upon to do so with the same sincerity I have ever shown toward you.

With a desire to act in accordance with my duty and with proper deference to yourself I have considered for several days the course I should pursue in replying to your letter. While I have never sought responsibility I have certainly never shrunk from any which appropriately belonged to me, and I desire to avoid none which may now attach to any opinions held or expressed by me on the occasion to which you direct my attention; but I cannot, consistently with my sense of propriety and self-respect and my regard for the public interests, reply to your questions. My regard for you personally induces me to assign a few reasons for my action :

1st. It is improper for me to reply categorically to your questions, because my views were given as a matter of duty on the requirement of Lieutenant-General Polk. They were used or rejected by him at the time on his own responsibility, and therefore any official demand for information in regard to them should be sought through that channel.

2d. It is inconsistent with my feelings of self-respect to reply, because the subject may become one of legal investigation, and I consider it unworthy the commission I hold to make myself in advance a party either to aid the prosecution of an officer on the one hand or to defend a subordinate against the legitimate authority of his superior on the other. All the facts within my knowledge can be elicited before the proper tribunal.

3d. It would be hurtful to the public interests for me to reply, because whatever statements I may make to you in reference to the action of Lieutenant-General Polk I must, as an officer and a gentleman, make equally to him, together with the occasion which calls upon me to respond. Such a result would not tend to promote that degree of harmony which should always exist between the first and second in command, and in my opinion the public interest has suffered sufficiently in consequence of the unfortunate differences which have prevailed in the Army of Tennessee.

Such are the chief reasons which have influenced the character of my reply. It has been made in no unkind spirit, but with a sense of what I think is due to you, to myself, and to the public interests.

I cannot close this letter, general, without incurring the risk of appearing perhaps obtrusive. Our acquaintance has been brief, and neither my military position nor personal relations justify me in advising you ; but the latter, though they have never been intimate, have not been unkind ; and as your military subordinate, even when I may have differed with you officially, I have received every consideration at your hands and have ever found you sensitive to the public good. It is therefore with a confidence that you will review what I say in the kind spirit in which it is urged when I venture upon giving unsought advice. It was the remark of Turenne, when acknowledging a military fault, that " He must have made war but a short time indeed who had not committed errors." The remark is applicable now as it was then, and every officer in his distinct sphere of duty must expect the legitimate criticism of the public and of military men. It is true that these criticisms may sometimes be urged with intemperance, but that should not the less prevent us from awaiting the matured verdict of public opinion and of history.

As to what may have occurred since the Kentucky campaign I am not fully advised, but from my associations with the general officers of your army in Kentucky I feel warranted in stating that while there were essential differences of opinion in regard to the general conduct of the campaign you were sustained in your authority by the whole weight of their character. There was a disposition among all with whom I was thrown to lend their ability and their zeal to carry out successfully the determinations at which you arrived. I think they were alive to the difficulties which surrounded you, and did not view your actions in a critical or censorious spirit even when their views may have differed from yours. From my knowledge of these gentlemen as soldiers of ability and distinction I think I do not hazard too much in saying that you can without difficulty still secure their earnest co-operation and support.

In this view I would consider it most unfortunate if I should take any step which might tend to aggravate the feeling which public rumor imputes as existing between you and some of your subordinate commanders. I think the public interests, which with every patriot should be superior to individual preferences or favor, are deeply concerned in harmonious action between you and them. You have been sustained in your position, I understand, by the Government. You therefore better than any one else can afford to abide the judgment which history may pronounce on your actions. Whatever may be the asperities of feeling existing between you and your generals, I feel assured from my personal knowledge of them that they are as little disposed as you are to set their own interests above the good of the country. I believe that a frank personal explanation with them will be the means of removing any cause of dissatisfaction which may naturally exist, will harmonize the discordant elements which may now be present in your army, and at the expense of little personal pride on either part result in great public good.

Though I have no claims to your intimacy I profess to be sufficiently a patriot and sufficiently your friend to advise a course which would in my opinion, without any sacrifice of your personal dignity, redound so much to the advantage of the Republic.

Believing that you will appreciate the motives which have induced me reluctantly to urge upon you these views and that you will justify me in the candid manner in which I have conveyed them, I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. BUCKNER.

Report of Maj. Gen. Leonidas Polk, C. S. Army, commanding Army of the Mississippi.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Knoxville, Tenn., November —, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following as my official report of the battle of Perryville:

At Bardstown, on September 28, the Army of the Mississippi, by order from General Bragg, was placed under my command. Up to that time I had command of the right wing only, General Hardee having command of the left. My orders from the general commanding, who was called on public duty to the capital at Frankfort, were to press in the enemy's pickets upon Louisville and to maintain my position. If the enemy advanced upon me in moderate force, to attack him; if in large force, I was to fall back upon Harrodsburg, marching in two columns via Perryville and Mackville respectively. The enemy having made a general advance, I moved upon Harrodsburg, and in consequence of the state of the roads marched the whole column by the Springfield and Perryville pike. The object of this movement was to form a junction with the Army of the Kentucky under General Kirby Smith, who was to move for that purpose upon Harrodsburg also from the north side of the Kentucky River. Another object was to cover our base, which after the evacuation of Cumberland Gap by the enemy was established at Camp Dick Robinson, in the forks of the Dick and Kentucky Rivers. On arriving at Perryville I communicated with the general commanding the forces then at Harrodsburg, informing him that the right wing, under command of General Cheatham, had been ordered forward to take a position on the farther side of that town, and as there was a scarcity of water I had ordered General Hardee to halt Buckner's division near Perryville and to post Anderson's on Salt River between the two towns. These dispositions were carried into effect and I reported to the general commanding in person.

The enemy had been held in check along the whole line of march from in front of Louisville up to our present position by those gallant cavalry commanders Colonels Wharton and Wheeler, and we were constantly advised of his position and movements. He left Louisville in five columns on as many different routes, extending from the road to Elizabethtown around to that to Shelbyville, and we had reason to believe that much the larger portion of this force was concentrated upon Bardstown and followed our retiring army in the march to Perryville. The rest of his force pursued a route farther north to threaten General Kirby Smith.

Information having been received through General Hardee that the enemy was pressing with heavy force upon his position it was resolved by the general commanding the forces to attack him at that point. He accordingly directed me on the evening of the 7th to order Anderson's division, of Hardee's wing, to return to Perryville and also to order General Cheatham, with Donelson's division of his wing, to follow it immediately, and to return myself to that place, to take charge of the forces and attack the enemy next morning. I urged the strong expediency of concentrating all our forces upon the point to be attacked, and at all events the necessity of having the remaining division of the Army of the Mississippi (Withers') placed at my disposal. To this the general objected, upon the ground that General Kirby Smith had informed him that the enemy was in force in his front and that his troops could not be spared from that part of the field, nor could the division of Withers be spared, as he thought the force in front of Smith made it necessary for him to be re-enforced. He therefore proposed to order Withers to the support of Smith and to take charge of those combined forces himself in person. Generals Anderson and Cheatham proceeded to Perryville and reported to General Hardee as ordered, and on arriving were posted by that officer in a line of battle which he had selected. I followed as soon as practicable, arrived during the night, and reconnoitered the line of battle early on the following morning.

At a meeting of the general officers, held about daylight, it was resolved, in view of the great disparity of our forces, to adopt the defensive-offensive, to await the movements of the enemy, and to be guided by events as they were developed. The line of battle selected was that indicated by the course of Chaplin Fork of Salt River, on the banks of which our troops were posted. The division of General Buckner, of the left wing, occupied the extreme right; that of General Anderson the center; that of General Donelson, of the right wing, under General Cheatham, the left. General Wharton's brigade of cavalry covered the right wing, General Wheeler the left. General McCown, who reached the field by a forced march with a cavalry force at an early hour, was directed, by order of General Bragg, to turn over his command to Colonel Wheeler and to report to him for orders. The whole of our force, including all arms, did not exceed 15,000. We have good reason to believe that the force of General Buell immediately in front of us, consisting of the corps of Generals McCook and Gilbert, each about 18,000 strong, and that General Crittenden, with a corps of about the same number, was within 8 miles of the field at the opening of the attack. General Liddell's brigade of General Buckner's division was thrown forward in observation about one mile in front of Perryville between the Springfield and Mackville roads. Light skirmishing opened the operation of the morning, which grew heavier as the day advanced.

About 10 o'clock Liddell became hotly engaged and it became evident that the enemy was disposed to press upon our right. I directed General Buckner to retire Liddell's brigade and let it fall back upon our general line, and ordered General Cheatham to move the whole of his command from the left to the right of our line. These orders were promptly executed and Cheatham's command was held in column of brigades. It was now near 1 o'clock and the movements of the enemy were not continued. It was then determined by General Bragg, commander of the forces, who had arrived on the field some hours before, to assume the offensive, and by his direction orders were given for a general movement throughout our whole line. General Cheatham's column of brigades was deployed into line and ordered, with Wharton's cavalry still upon its right, to attack. At this juncture I was informed by Colonel Wharton that a column of the enemy's infantry was seen approaching by the Mackville road in a direction to support the enemy's left. This column I discovered was still quite distant, but concluding that our chances of success were greater against the line in my front even when re-enforced than it would be by attacking it as it stood and exposing my flank to the approaching force, I awaited until the re-enforcements got into position. The attack was then ordered. Wharton charged the enemy's extreme left with great fury, passing on over stone walls and ravines and driving back the enemy's infantry several hundred yards. This movement placed in our possession a skirt of woods and an eminence of great importance to our success on our right. It was quickly followed by the brigades of General Cheatham, under Brigadier-Generals Donelson, Stewart, and Maney. These mounted the steep and difficult cliffs of Chaplin River in gallant style and moved forward upon the enemy's position with a most determined courage. Their approach was met by a storm of shot, shell, and musketry from several batteries strongly posted and supported by heavy masses of infantry. Their progress was nevertheless steadily onward, and although mowed down by well-directed volleys of musketry and well-served artillery the gaps thus produced in our lines were promptly filled and our troops pressed forward with resistless energy, driving the enemy before them and capturing three of his batteries. In this movement the enemy's left was forced back about a mile until his three lines were pressed into one. Here, being heavily re-enforced, he recovered one of his batteries, but did not attempt to regain any of the ground he had lost. This charge of these brigades was one of the most heroic and brilliant movements of the war. Considering the disparity of the numbers of the troops engaged, the strength of the enemy's position, the murderous character of the fire under which they had to advance, the steadiness with which they endured the havoc which was being made in their ranks, their knowledge that they were without any supporting force, the firmness with which they moved upon the enemy's masses of infantry and artillery, it will compare favorably with the most brilliant achievements of historic valor. In this charge General James S. Jackson, who commanded a division of the enemy, was killed amid the guns of one of the batteries that was taken.

While directing the operations in this part of the field I received a message from General Bragg, informing me that the right center, occupied by a portion of the troops of General Hardee, was hard pressed, and suggesting the sending re-enforcements to its relief. This was done at the earliest moment, the brigades of Generals Stewart and Donelson being detached for that purpose. These generals advanced their brigades in gallant style on the right of that of General Cleburne, and in conjunction with that efficient officer drove the enemy with great slaughter from his successive positions a full mile and a half.

As the enemy was yielding toward the close of the day the brigade of Brigadier-General Liddell approached from my left and rear and halted on the crest of a hill to determine the point at which to offer its support. It was directed to the place where it was most wanted and moved upon it with deafening cheers. Here, owing to the fading twilight, it was for a few moments difficult to determine whether the firing in our front was from our own or the enemy's troops. This difficulty, however, was speedily removed; it was the enemy, and in obedience to orders that veteran brigade, under its gallant commander, closed the operations of the day in that part of the field with a succession of the most deadly volleys I have witnessed. The enemy's command in their immediate front was well-nigh annihilated.

At this point a number of prisoners were taken, and among them several corps, division, and brigade staff officers; and, darkness closing in, I ordered the troops to cease firing and to bivouac for the night.

The operations of the left wing, which were under the immediate superintendence of Major-General Hardee, were not less satisfactory or successful. His combinations for the attack were judiciously made, and immediately after the onset of the right wing, under Major-General Cheatham, had been fully developed, he ordered General Buckner to move forward his division and unite in the assault. This order was executed with promptness and vigor. The position assailed—one of great strength and the key of that part of the field—was carried, and by a combined movement with two of the brigades of General Anderson's division and a skillful handling of his artillery, the whole of the enemy's line, reaching to Cheatham's left, was driven in confusion near a mile to the rear, and night put an end to farther pursuit. The gallantry of these troops and of their able and skillful commanders in that desperate struggle was in keeping with that of their comrades of the right wing, and the part they bore in the bloody conflict of the field of Perryville entitles them to a distinguished place in the records of that eventful day.

For further details I beg leave to refer to the reports of wing, division, brigade, and regimental commanders, herewith transmitted.

To Major-Generals Hardee and Cheatham I feel under obligations for the judgment and skill manifested in conducting the operations of their respective commands and for the energy and vigor with which they directed their movements. Few instances are on record where such successes have been obtained against such disparity of numbers.

My thanks are due also to the division and brigade commanders and their subordinates for the fidelity and gallantry with which they supervised and directed the operations of their commands; also to the soldiers for the zeal and alacrity with which they obeyed the orders of their several commanders and the active energy and dauntless courage with which they moved to the performance of the most difficult and perilous enterprises. No troops on any field have ever exhibited higher qualities of the soldier, as no troops at any time have ever had higher motives to inspire them with a contempt for danger and of death.

I am indebted likewise to Colonels Wheeler and Wharton, commanding the cavalry brigades, for their vigilance and activity in protecting our flanks and for the vigorous assaults made by them upon the enemy's lines. Of Colonel Wharton's charge on the enemy's left flank I have already spoken. Colonel Wheeler and the brave officers and men under his command exhibited the same dauntless energy and courage for which they have become distinguished. He kept a very large force of the enemy at bay and made a most brilliant charge, driving the enemy before him and capturing a battery. For particulars of the operations of the commands of these deservedly distinguished officers I beg leave to refer you to their reports, herewith transmitted.

To my staff, general and personal, I am under obligations for the promptitude and zeal with which they discharged the duties of their several offices.

I desire to return thanks to Almighty God for the persistent energy, determination, and courage with which He has inspired the hearts of our troops in the prosecution of this unrighteous war and for shielding our heads in the day of battle.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. POLK,

Major-General, Commanding.

Col. GEORGE WILLIAM BRENT, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Maj. John Knight, Forty-first Georgia Infantry, Maney's Brigade, Cheatham's Division, Right Wing.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., October —, 1862.

On the 8th instant this regiment participated in a battle with the Federals at Perryville, Ky. Being on the right of General Maney's brigade, was led into the battle by a flank movement across a creek in the direction of the battle guided by the sound, and brought into line of battle by filing to the right through a brush-wood under heavy cannonading, being protected by an eminence in front where the line was formed, composed of the Forty-first Georgia, Sixth and Ninth Tennessee Regiments, and moved forward. As it emerged from the woods it came in view of the enemy's battery, situated on an eminence in a cleared field, supported by a heavy force, where it instinctively halted. In an instant the brigade was ordered forward by the brigade commander, and as it moved forward, owing to the situation of the enemy, the Forty-first Regiment was first exposed to the fire, and as soon as it was in view the enemy opened upon them a most terrific and deadly fire, when our regiment responded and halted for several minutes. It was a fearful time. At this critical moment General Maney passed down our line, encouraging the men by his personal presence and urging them forward. Just at this place our regiment sustained one-half, if not two-thirds, of their entire loss during the battle. Finally this suspense was relieved by the enemy's lines giving way, which was closely followed up by our troops, who seemed to vie with each other in seeing who could do the most to drive the enemy from the field. Never perhaps did troops fight more desperately than did these on this occasion.

Our regiment lost 6 men bearing aloft the colors (2 killed and 4 wounded). Our colors had six holes shot through them. Our noble colonel (Charles A. McDaniel) fell late in the evening, severely wounded, in the corn field beyond the belt of woods we passed through after going out of the old field.

We feel proud to be associated with the Tennesseans who composed General Maney's brigade, and feel assured should danger threaten none would more readily come to our assistance and rescue.

I am, sir, yours, truly, &c.,

JNO. KNIGHT,

Major, Comdg. Forty-first Regiment Georgia Volunteers.

Capt. THOMAS H. MALONE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Col. H. R. Feild, First Tennessee Infantry.

CAMP NEAR BRYANTSVILLE, KY.,

October 12, 1862.

My regiment went into the action of the 8th instant in rear and on the left of the brigade at the field where we captured the eight-gun battery. I lost only some 3 or 4 men killed and wounded at that place. The brigade was ordered immediately forward to take another battery about a half mile in advance, planted on a very steep hill, commanding a large corn field, through which we had to advance. This battery and its support was making terrible havoc with the right wing of the brigade, so reported by the field officers of the Forty-first Georgia to me, whereupon I sent Captain Malone to General Maney asking for my regiment to be sent to the right, which request was granted. After deploying the regiment to the extreme right it was ordered to charge, which it did in splendid style, with close, compact ranks, killing all the horses and men of the battery and driving its support away. In this charge the brigade became very much disorganized, and after taking the battery by some mistake fell back in confusion. My regiment lost in that charge its gallant lieutenant-colonel (John Patterson) and some 40 or 50 men and officers. I rallied the regiment at the foot of the hill, no other regiment forming but mine, some 30 or 40 men of the other regiments falling into the ranks. In the mean time the enemy came back to the guns behind the battery, and also marched two regiments on our left on a wooded hill which lay at right angles with the hill that we charged up. I led the regiment up the hill alone, without any support, under a heavy fire of musketry, driving the enemy back and taking his guns again. The regiments on our left then opened their fire upon us, killing and wounding a dozen officers and men at each discharge. Just then I discovered Hardee's battle-flag coming up on our left about 500 yards in rear. Expecting that the regiment that carried the flag would engage the enemy that were cross-firing upon us I determined to hold the hill at every cost, thinking they would drive the enemy before them; they failed to do so and fell back before they had arrived in 200 yards of my position; whereupon I ordered my regiment to retire, which it did in much better order than could have been expected, leaving half their number dead and wounded on the top of the hill.

My whole loss amounts to 181 killed, wounded, and missing.
Respectfully submitted.

H. R. FEILD,

Colonel, Commanding First Tennessee Regiment.

Report of Col. George C. Porter, Sixth Tennessee Infantry.

OCTOBER 16, 1862.

SIR: According to instructions I beg leave to submit this my report of the Sixth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers in the action of the 8th ultimo at Perryville, Ky.:

About 1 p. m. the brigade, under the command of Brig. Gen. George Maney, was in line of battle immediately in rear of General Stewart's brigade. The position of this regiment was second from the right, between the Forty-first Georgia and Ninth Tennessee Regiments. Having proceeded in this manner for about half a mile the right of the brigade rested upon the bank of a creek, the opposite of which was rocky and precipitous. It was ordered by the flank farther to the right across said creek, under the cover of a bluff about 200 yards in front. Having moved in this new direction several hundred yards around this impassable ascent sufficiently far for three regiments (the Forty-first Georgia, Sixth Tennessee, and Ninth Tennessee) to be fronted and to move in its old direction a forward movement was again ordered. The nature of the ground was badly suited for this maneuver, the topography of which you are well acquainted with, hence it is not necessary for me to describe it minutely. It was a thick wood, covered with brush and undergrowth. These regiments were then ordered to move forward in line of battle. They had gone but a short distance when one of the most deadly and destructive fires that can possibly be imagined was poured in their whole line by the enemy, who occupied a strong and well-chosen position on an eminence in an open field about 300 yards to the front. Here had a battery of eight guns, strongly supported by infantry. This command still pressing steadily forward, all the time having the contents of this battery, consisting of grape, canister, and shell, together with the small-arms of the strong supporting force, it came to a high fence at the edge of the wood, at which time it seemed impossible for humanity to go farther, such was the havoc and destruction that had taken place in their ranks. A temporary halt was the inevitable result. Here, at this critical juncture, General Maney passed along the line from the right of the Georgia regiment to the left of the Ninth Tennessee, ordering and encouraging us to still press forward, as it was our last and only chance of safety and success. His presence and manner having imparted fresh vigor and courage among the troops the fence was crossed, the ascent gained, the battery taken, and the infantry, with terrible slaughter, driven from the field. It was here at the fence and between the fence and the point where this battery was in position that this regiment sustained its greatest loss. Here was the hottest part of the engagement. It was near the fence on entering the field that Capt. Thomas B. Rains, Company C, and First Lieut. Ed. Seabrook were killed, while acting nobly at the head of their respective companies. No truer and braver men fell that day. The color-bearer, John Andrews, was here too badly wounded to proceed farther and had to be carried to the rear. They were then seized by John Ayeres, one of the color guard, who carried them gallantly for a short distance and was killed. A. M. Pegues then carried them to the summit where the first battery was placed, where he was badly wounded, being shot in three places. They were then seized by Ed. Quin, private, Company H, who bore them in advance of the regiment across the field into the wood, where he was killed. At a lane about 200 yards in rear of the battery Lieut. N. A. Butler, Company C, was killed while nobly discharging his duty.

The brigade still continued to press forward across the woods into an adjoining field of corn, when part of Stewart's command came up. We, together with a portion of the Fourth Tennessee, were driven from the summit of this hill in the corn field, but were again rallied in a ravine near a stone fence and ordered back by General Maney to dislodge, if possible, certain sharpshooters and to fire upon a battery that was engaged with one of ours a short distance to the front. The order was again obeyed and the summit was again reached, but owing to a strong and destructive cross-fire it was deemed useless to endeavor to hold it. The rest of the day was consumed in gathering together the scattering ones that remained, and a line of battle was formed in this ravine near the edge of the corn field. What followed is not necessary for me to make special mention of.

In this fight there were so many instances of individual prowess and bravery that I find it no easy task to make proper discrimination in the matter. As far as I could judge they all did their duty well and deserve the highest praise; but, as ordered by the general, I beg leave to make special mention of Thomas Estes, private, Company A; Orderly Sergt. B. F. Collinsworth, Company I; John Lanier, private, Company E;

R. S. Cole, private, Company H; Lieut. [S. A.] Mason, Company B, and Capt. E. [C.] Harbert, Company K, who were certainly not remiss in any part of their duty. I should not fail to make special note of Lieut. C. M. Carter, who throughout the whole fight was most conspicuous in the extraordinary gallantry and courage displayed in front of his company and regiment. He unfortunately, however, fell in the last charge in the corn field so badly wounded that he died the next day. Maj. J. L. Harris and Adj. T. H. Henderson conducted themselves with credit and gallantry during the whole action.

It may be necessary to mention that the center of the Sixth Regiment passed over the right gun of the battery on the hill.

Hoping that this will in part subserve the purpose for which it is intended, I beg leave to subscribe myself, your obedient, humble servant,

GEO. C. PORTER,

Colonel, Commanding Sixth Regiment Tennessee Vols.

Capt. THOMAS H. MALONE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Maj. George W. Kelsoe, Ninth Tennessee Infantry.

CAMP NEAR DICK'S RIVER, KY.,

October 12, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the conduct of my regiment in the action of the 8th instant:

When drawn up in line near the hospital established for our brigade my command was harassed by the cannonading of the enemy, and here 1 private was killed and several wounded by the explosion of a bomb-shell. We were ordered forward, passing up a steep declivity by the flank, and took our position under a most galling fire. Immediately after getting under fire we were ordered to charge a battery of seven guns immediately in our front, the three left guns of the enemy covering our right wing. It was carried at once, the men all seemingly determined not to halt for any obstacle.

Here the color-bearer, Robert Gibbs, of Company C, fell while gallantly rushing on, and Corpl. M. C. Hooks, of the color guard, seized the flag and kept in front of the lines throughout the entire action, although severely bruised. At this point Lieut. [P. J.] Fitzpatrick, commanding Company K, and Lieut. [W. T.] Lawler, commanding Company G, were both killed while gallantly leading their companies. They did their duty nobly to the last. Lieut. Col. [John W.] Buford was wounded here, and the command devolved on me.

After the enemy abandoned these guns they formed a new line in rear of a lane fence, having the additional protection of being on the opposite side of the lane from us. From this fence they poured into our ranks such a destructive fire as to momentarily check our advance, but my men, determined to die rather than to waver, pressed on, in many cases bayoneting the more dogged of our opponents. The few who escaped fell behind a second line of the enemy drawn up behind the brink of a hill on which were planted four guns. Here every company had its commander struck down. The bravery of these officers had so far carried everything before us. Capt. [J. W.] McDonald, First Lieuts. [James I.] Hall, [J. M.] Matthews, and [D. M.] Bell were mortally wounded, and Capts. [J. W.] Hubbard, [C. B.] Simonton, [H. C.] Irby, [J. L.] Hall, and [H. A.] Rogers left the field severely wounded, Captain Rogers, however, returning and doing good service throughout the action. The conduct of all these officers cannot be too highly mentioned.

My horse being shot at this point I was compelled to leave the lines for a few minutes. In the mean time the regiment carried this four-gun battery, and advancing through the open wood lot in which it was planted, under a fire of grape and canister which our oldest veterans had never seen equaled, they pressed on all unmindful of the carnage surrounding them, and gained the crest of an elevation in a corn field, where, in addition to the musketry fire in our front and the grape and canister shots that fell like hail from a third battery to our right, planted on a hill in an old stubble field, a most murderous fire was poured into our flank from a thicket on our left. Our line pressed on, being within 50 yards of the last-named battery, when we were ordered to fall back, being relieved by General Stewart's (Second) brigade, which then advanced. It was impossible to communicate the order to all of my men, and a large majority continued to fight with the relieving brigade, remaining in the advanced line until the fire on the right wing entirely ceased.

Throughout the action the men behaved themselves as became the heroes of Shiloh, ever advancing, ever cheering, and the command forward was entirely unnecessary, as at all times the men in the line repeated the command without orders. It was an exception to see any of the men taking advantage of trees or other kind of shelter; the majority never lying down, but erect, advanced with the determination to carry the field or never leave it. Their conduct and that of the officers of my command was most gallant, and it would be invidious to make distinctions where credit justly belongs to so many.

We lost, killed dead on the field, 30; wounded, 120 (10 or 12 of whom have since died), and 8 missing.

Respectfully submitted.

GEO. W. KELSOE,

Major, Commanding Ninth Tennessee Regiment.

Capt. THOMAS H. MALONE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 36.

Report of Lieut. Col. W. Frierson, Twenty-seventh Tennessee Infantry.

OCTOBER 26, 1862.

SIR: In accordance with orders from Brigadier-General Maney I hereby beg leave to submit the following report of the part taken by the regiment (Twenty-seventh Tennessee) under my command during the late engagement with the enemy near Perryville, Ky.:

I regret that it was not my fortune to observe in person the movement of the regiment and conduct of the men during the entire engagement, but the effects of the explosion of a shell near my head incapacitated me entirely for duty after the expulsion of the enemy from the open field in which the first battery was planted and the lane beyond. I will therefore complete the report with information received from Major Allen, in command.

About 11 a. m., it becoming apparent that the enemy were endeavoring to turn our extreme right, this regiment was ordered, together with the remainder of General Cheatham's division, to leave the position it then occupied on the extreme left and to hasten by the right flank to the point where the enemy had commenced to concentrate his forces. The distance marched was near 2 miles, under a very hot sun, and a portion of the time at a double-quick, and for a mile before the engagement commenced the men were continually exposed to the fire of the enemy's batteries. Tired and heated, the men were ordered to load and prepare for battle. The enemy's batteries had been planted upon a high bluff which it was impossible to ascend save in a few places, and in point of position the enemy had every advantage; but notwithstanding all these odds my men moved eagerly forward at the command. In ascending the bluff I was compelled, for want of room to preserve my position (second to the left) in line of battle, to move by the right flank, until coming in rear of the Sixth Tennessee Regiment I again moved by the left flank. Upon reaching the top of the bluff we found a strip of woods to pass through before coming to the field in which the battery was planted and separated from the field by a fence. During the whole time of passing through the woods the battery was playing upon us with terrible effect; but as soon as the fence was reached, in full view of the battery, such a storm of shell, grape, canister, and Minie balls was turned loose upon us as no troops scarcely ever before encountered. Large boughs were torn from the trees, the trees themselves shattered as if by lightning, and the ground plowed in deep furrows. Still my men hesitated but a moment. Although many had fallen, and almost certain death seemed to be the fate of the remainder if they advanced, I had only to command "Forward," when they as one man leaped the fence and most gallantly charged at a double-quick, firing at every opportunity. Upon arriving within a few feet of the battery the enemy opened a most murderous fire with their small-arms, which caused the men to hesitate for a moment, when they commenced to return the fire with effect. After witnessing the gallant example set by yourself, sir, the men awaited no second command to charge, but continued to move forward until the enemy was driven entirely from the field, leaving the battery, seven guns, I believe, in our possession. It was a complete triumph of resolute courage and determined fighting over every odds. The enemy had every advantage of position, and were superior to us in point of numbers by at least two, and probably three, to one. His battery was composed of large Napoleon guns, and still the Third Brigade, tired and alone, with a bright sun shining in their eyes to bewilder them, overcame all these obstacles and took the battery; but the battle is not yet closed. Upon reaching the fence on the opposite side of the field we met with stout resistance while crossing the lane that separated the battery field from a second battery and a largely superior force of infantry; but even these odds were overcome by the determined spirit of our troops, the Twenty-seventh Tennessee always holding her position in line, and the enemy driven through the woods and an adjoining corn field in the direction of their battery. At this second battery the enemy made a desperate and successful stand. Our men, after charging it most bravely twice, were finally drawn off on account of very heavy cross-firing on the left, which, owing to our fewness of numbers, we were unable to prevent. My regiment was then reformed and moved in the vicinity of the first battery and afterward to the Harrodsburg pike. Such, sir, as well as I can remember and learn, were the principal movements made by the Twenty-seventh Regiment during the bloody battle near Perryville.

The long list of killed and wounded speaks in language more powerful than aught I can say of the gallant part taken by the men under my command in that engagement. We had out of 210 men carried into action 16 killed dead on the field, 84 wounded, and 12 missing, several of whom are supposed to be dead or wounded. We had 2 color-bearers killed and a third fell mortally wounded, but held on to the colors until told it would fall into the hands of the enemy, when he agreed to give it up. The flag-staff was shot off near the flag. Still another one of the color guard was wounded. At no time did the men or officers under me hesitate to obey most cheerfully every command they might receive, and none can be condemned for improper conduct. Please assure the general that if the regiment did not deport itself so well as he expected it was the fault of their commander and not of the company officers and men.

Although all did their duty so well, yet I feel that it is due a few others who exhibited more than ordinary coolness and daring to mention their names with this report: Capt. John M. Taylor, Company K; Lieut. [E. E.] Pate, Company H; Capt. John W. Carroll, Company I, and Lieut. [James] Stinnett, of Company B, were always foremost to lead their men to the charge and rendered me much assistance by their ready commands and brave examples. The first two named I fear were mortally wounded.

I desire also to mention the name of John Olive, private, Company B, who, though under military age, displayed the coolness and courage of a veteran. He carried the colors for some time, never ceasing to use his rifle all the while.

I am much indebted to Maj. [A. C.] Allen and Adj. [S. M.] Howard for gallant services rendered me while in command and for still more gallant and efficient services when the command devolved upon them. The horses of both were shot under them, nor did they leave their posts until the engagement closed.

The regiment, sir, is not forgetful of the skill and gallantry of their chief of brigade and his efficient staff.

Respectfully,

W. FRIERSON,

Lieutenant-Colonel, Comdg. Twenty-seventh Tennessee Regt.

Capt. THOMAS H. MALONE, Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 37.

Report of Maj. Gen. William J. Hardee, C. S. Army, commanding Left Wing.

HEADQUARTERS HARDEE'S CORPS,
Shelbyville, Tenn., December 1, 1862.

MAJOR: I have the honor to transmit the following report of the operations of my command on October 8 last against the forces of the United States in the battle of Perryville:

For several days before the engagement the enemy had advanced strong columns from Bardstown in the direction of Perryville and Danville. My troops occupied the village of Perryville, and on October 6 and 7 some skirmishing occurred between my cavalry under Colonel Wheeler and the advanced forces of the Federal army, which were brilliantly managed by that brave and able officer.

On the 7th I informed General Bragg, who was at Harrodsburg, that the enemy was moving in heavy force against my position. With the view of inflicting a decisive defeat, or at least of pressing him back from any farther advance against our line of communications in the direction of Danville and Cumberland Gap, I urged the concentration of our whole army at Perryville.

On the evening of the 7th, my wing of the army having been re-enforced by the division of Cheatham and orders having been issued to engage the enemy on the following morning, I again earnestly urged upon General Bragg the necessity of massing his forces on that important point. That night Major-General Polk arrived and assumed command.

The country near Perryville is boldly undulating and varied with farm-houses, corn fields, and plantations, bordered by native forests. A creek called Chaplin Fork flows northwardly through the village and unites 4 or 5 miles beyond it with another little stream called Doctor's Fork. The space between the two from east to west is about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. A good road running a little south of east from Mackville to Perryville crosses this stream, and a turnpike from Springfield running nearly east and west passes through Perryville to Danville. Another fine macadamized highway traverses the village from the south in a northwardly direction toward Harrodsburg and Lexington and another southwardly in the direction of Lebanon. The position at Perryville is strong, and offered many tactical and strategical advantages. The key of the enemy's position was at a point where the Mackville road crosses Doctor's Fork, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the village, near a barn and white farm-house on the hill west of the creek. The autumnal drought left the streams almost dry, only pools of water being found here and there along their channels.

The forces under my command were two divisions, constituting the left wing of the army, commanded respectively by Major-General Buckner and Brig. Gen. J. Patton Anderson. Each consisted of four brigades, with a battery attached to each brigade. Thinned by battle and reduced by long and arduous service, my effective force did not exceed 10,000 men. No means exist for ascertaining accurately the strength of the Federal forces, but from information derived from prisoners captured from five of their divisions it is believed that the enemy displayed not less than 35,000 men, under the command of Major-Generals McCook, Rousseau, Jackson, and other generals.

My line of battle was originally established between the Harrodsburg turnpike and Chaplin's, its general direction being nearly north and south, with the left resting near the village and the right extending down the stream. The line was subsequently advanced about noon, by order of General Bragg, who arrived about 10 o'clock in the morning, westwardly, so as to take position on the space between the two streams on the west of the town, extending across the Mackville road, with its left toward the Springfield turnpike. An interval between the left and the Springfield road was swept and protected by a fine battery of 12-pounders, under Captain Semple, posted on the Seminary Hill, near the eastern side of the village. Brigadier-General Anderson, with two brigades, under command of Brigadier-General Adams and Colonel Powell, covered the extreme left on the Springfield road to protect our communications with Danville and Harrodsburg. The enemy occupied the western or left bank of Doctor's Fork, extending across both sides of the Mackville road and across the Springfield road: The left of the enemy north of the Mackville road was thrown back in a northwesterly direction, forming an obtuse angle deflected about 30° along broken heights from their center and right, the angle being near the point where the Mackville road crosses Doctor's Fork. About 1 o'clock in the afternoon General Cheatham's division crossed Doctor's Fork on our extreme right and engaged the enemy's left on the heights with great vigor. Immediately I ordered General Buckner to advance his division and attack the salient angle of the enemy's line where the Mackville road crosses Doctor's Fork. The position was a strong one. The enemy was posted behind a natural parapet afforded by the character of the ground and some stone fences, which were enfiladed by their batteries on their right and swept by another strong battery posted in their rear.

The brigade of Brigadier-General Johnson gallantly led the advance, with Brigadier-General Cleburne's as a support, while the brigade of General St. John R. Liddell was held as a reserve. The brigades of [John C.] Brown and Jones, of Anderson's, and [S. A. M.] Wood, of Buckner's division, had been detached to occupy the interval between the right of Buckner and the left of Cheatham, and the two remaining brigades of Anderson's division, under command of General [D. W.] Adams and Col. [Sam.] Powell, [Twenty-ninth Tennessee], covered the extreme left of our line. By this time, Cheatham being hotly engaged, the brigades of Johnson and Cleburne attacked the angle of the enemy's line with great impetuosity near the burnt barn, while those of Wood, Brown, and Jones dashed against their line more to the right, on the left of Cheatham. Simultaneously the brigades of Adams and Powell, on the left of Cleburne and Johnson, assailed the enemy in front, while Adams', diverging to the right, united with Buckner's left. The whole force thus united then advanced, aided by a crushing fire from the artillery, which partially enfiladed their lines. This combined attack was irresistible, and drove the enemy in wild disorder from the position nearly a mile to the rear. Cheatham and Wood captured the enemy's battery in front of Wood, and among the pieces and amid the dead and dying was found the body of General James S. Jackson, who commanded a division of the enemy at that point.

As evening closed in I ordered forward Liddell's brigade to re-enforce Cheatham. Arriving near twilight, it was difficult in the mêlée to distinguish friend from foe. Major-General Polk first discovered the enemy, in whose ranks he found himself by chance, and escaped by his coolness and address. Returning rapidly he gave Liddell the order to fire, and a deadly volley was poured in that completed the rout. By this brigade; so gallantly led and directed by General Liddell, arms, prisoners, and colors were captured, together with the papers and baggage of Major-General McCook. Night closing in our camp-fires were lighted upon the ground so obstinately contested by the enemy, so bravely won by the valor of our troops.

The loss sustained in the battle was severe—242 killed and 1,504 wounded from my command—attest the severity of the conflict. Brigadier-General Cleburne, who led his brigade with his usual courage and judgment, was wounded, but remained in command until the close of the day. Brigadier-General Wood was severely wounded in the head by the fragment of a shell; his quartermaster, commissary, and assistant adjutant-general were killed, and the three colonels next in rank, on whom the command successively devolved, were wounded. Brigadier-

General Brown was severely wounded while rendering efficient service on the right with his command. Many other valuable officers were killed or wounded in the battle.

To Major-General Buckner I am indebted for the skillful management of his troops, the judicious use of his artillery, and for the opportune services of himself and the veteran division under his command.

To Brigadier-General Anderson the defense of the extreme left in the direction of Danville was intrusted. His operations were not under my immediate supervision. Two of his brigades were detached and advanced boldly, but one brigade was compelled by greatly superior numbers to resume its original ground, from which, under the cool direction of General Anderson, it subsequently withdrew in good order. Both brigades were gallantly conducted by General Adams and Colonel Powell, the latter having suffered severely in the unequal contest.

To my staff I am under obligations for promptitude displayed by them in the execution of my orders and for the intelligence and zeal shown in the discharge of their respective duties. I refer to the reports of division and brigade commanders for details of the operations of their commands.

To the officers and men I tender my thanks for the daring courage and fine discipline exhibited by them on the field of Perryville. When advancing none shrank nor lingered in the attack; when engaged no Southern standard was abandoned. Our path was marked by the crushed lines and disorderly battalions of the enemy. Our troops displayed higher qualities than mere discipline can confer. The fervor of freemen and the enthusiasm of patriots animated their valor. Whenever they advanced the enemy recoiled before the shock; when they retired he dare not venture to pursue.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. J. HARDEE,
Lieutenant-General.

Maj. GEORGE WILLIAMSON, Chief of Staff.

Reports of Brig. Gen. Daniel W. Adams, C. S. Army, commanding Second Brigade, Second Division.

HDQRS. SECOND BRIGADE, SECOND DIVISION, A. MISS.,
Bryantsville, Ky., October 12, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor respectfully to report that on the 8th instant, about 11 o'clock a. m., in obedience to orders received through Brigadier-General Anderson, I formed the brigade under my command, composed of the Thirteenth, Sixteenth, Twentieth, and Twenty-fifth Louisiana Regiments, with the Battalion of Sharpshooters, and Fifth Company Washington Artillery, under Capt. C. H. Slocumb, in line of battle, and moved from our position near Perryville, Ky., obliquing to the right to attack the enemy.

At about 11.30 a. m., when advancing, I received an order from Brigadier-General Anderson, commanding the division, to halt or move slowly until the Third Brigade, commanded by Colonel Powell, arrived opposite my line. In obedience to this order I halted the brigade several times and moved very slowly until I came near the enemy at the foot of a hill on Beech Fork Creek. Before reaching this point I sent several messengers to Colonel Powell to move up as rapidly as possible. On reaching the point above designated I halted the command, had the artillery put in position so as to command that of the enemy, and again sent a messenger to Colonel Powell by my aide-de-camp, Lieut. E. M. Scott. Receiving no answer, and as it was then getting late in the day, I ordered the artillery to open fire, and after a very brisk, well-directed, and effective fire for a half or three-quarters of an hour, by direction of General Buckner I moved the infantry forward on the enemy's right at and near a very strong position on a hill. After a short but spirited contest we dislodged and drove them before us. They fled in great disorder, panic, and confusion, throwing their arms and equipments away as they fled. We followed them about a mile, the Washington Artillery coming up and halting at two positions, as directed, where they again opened fire with great accuracy and effect.

Finding my brigade in the advance and entirely unsupported on the right or left except by General Cleburne's brigade, which was in our rear to the right, and inactive from being out of ammunition, as I was informed, I halted my command under a very heavy and rapid fire from this point, when I was soon opened upon from the left and rather to the rear by a well-directed battery of artillery. Using my glass, I discerned the enemy moving their forces and forming line of battle at a distance of 600 or 800 yards to my left. Deeming this position untenable I ordered the brigade to fall back, which they did in perfect order. I communicated this intention to General Cleburne, with my reasons for doing it. After passing the first hill which we drove the enemy from I met General Hardee, who ordered the command to return and take position on that hill. This was promptly executed, and the Washington Artillery again opened fire with great force and effect and continued it until 7.30 o'clock p. m. My brigade remained at this position until 2 o'clock a. m. of the 9th instant, when, the balance of the command having moved in obedience to General Buckner's orders, I moved in, bringing up the rear, and reached our position near Perryville about 3.30 o'clock a. m.

The killed, wounded, and missing from my brigade amounted to 152, of whom 6 are known to be killed, 78 wounded, and 68 missing. Fortunately we had no officers killed that I am aware of. Lieut. Philip Sayne, whilst coming up in the rear in charge of the ammunition train, was captured by the enemy, with the train and its guard, consisting of 12 or 15 men, and at the same time and place Lieut. Thomas M. Blair, of the Washington Artillery, with 14 men and 2 caissons, returning for ammunition, were captured by the enemy.

My aide-de-camp, Lieut. Edward M. Scott, whom I sent with a message to Colonel Powell, commanding the Third Brigade, is missing; supposed to be captured by the enemy.

All the officers and men of my command behaved with coolness and gallantry, and whilst it would be invidious to make special mention of any names, yet I feel that it is due to mention Maj. J. E. Austin, of the Battalion of Sharpshooters; Maj. Charles Guillet, Twentieth; Capt. H. Brummerstadt, Lieut. E. P. Guillet, adjutant; Lieutenant Schaedel, of the Twentieth Louisiana; Capt. M. O. Tracy, of the Thirteenth Louisiana, and Lieutenant McCall, of the C. S. Army, and Maj. R. G. Higgins, volunteer aide-de-camp, as having been conspicuous for their gallantry and courage. Lieutenant Eichholz and Lieutenant Stewart, of the Twentieth Louisiana, were both severely wounded.

The Washington Artillery did most essential and valuable service and deserve particular notice of praise, and I would especially recommend that they be allowed to have Perryville inscribed on their banner.

Very respectfully,

DANL. W. ADAMS,

Brig. Gen., Comdg. 2d Brig., 2d Div., Left Wing, A. Miss.

Capt. W. G. BARTH, A. A. G., Second Division, A. Miss.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., October 25, 1862.

SIR: In making up yesterday hurriedly the report of the part taken by the Second Brigade under my command in the battle of Perryville, Ky., I omitted to mention the names of the officers in command of the different regiments, which I desire now to state.

The Thirteenth Louisiana was commanded by its colonel, Col. R. L. Gibson; the Sixteenth by its commanding officer, Col. D. C. Gober; the Twentieth, in the forefront of the action, by its commanding officer, Col. Aug. Reichard, who for some time previous had been suffering from bronchitis, and during the engagement, from loss of voice, and having his horse severely wounded, had to relinquish the command to Lieut. Col. Leon von Zinken; the Twenty-fifth Louisiana by Col. S. W. Fisk, its commanding officer, and the Battalion of Sharpshooters by Major Austin. The praises bestowed in my report for gallant service on the field fell under my immediate observation in the cases of Col. R. L. Gibson, Major Austin, and Captain Tracy, and the staff officers named, that is, Major Higgins and Captain McCall. The report of the others named was derived from the regimental reports. The regimental commanders named deserve credit for the manner in which they moved and kept their commands together, the Thirteenth Louisiana, Colonel Gibson, deserve special [mention] for the promptness with which they moved forward, the alacrity and rapidity with which they pressed the enemy until halted by my command. I will recommend Colonel Gibson for skill and valor to be brigadier-general in a separate communication.

Hoping that this may be received as a part of the report forwarded on yesterday, I remain, very respectfully,

DANL. W. ADAMS.

Capt. W. G. BARTH, Assistant-Adjutant General.

No. 39.

Report of Brig. Gen. Bushrod R. Johnson, C. S. Army, commanding Third Brigade, Third Division.

HDQRS. THIRD BRIG., THIRD DIV., ARMY OF THE MISS.,
Camp near Knoxville, Tenn., October 23, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by the Third Brigade, Third Division, Army of the Mississippi, under my command, at the battle near Perryville, Ky., on the 8th instant:

The Third Brigade on that day consisted of the Fifth Confederate Regiment, commanded by Col. [J. A.] Smith; Seventeenth Tennessee, commanded by Colonel Marks; Twenty-third Tennessee, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Keeble; Twenty-fifth Tennessee, commanded by Colonel Hughs; Thirty-seventh Tennessee, commanded by Colonel White; Forty-fourth Tennessee, commanded by Colonel Fulton.

Under orders from the major-general commanding the division I moved the brigade at about 11 a. m. to a position east of Perryville, on the brow of a hill which slopes westwardly for about 600 yards down to the Doctor's Fork. The two sections of Capt. [P.] Darden's battery (the Jefferson Artillery) were placed in position on spurs of this hill, the one supported by the right and the other by the left wing of my brigade. The brigade of Brig. Gen. John C. Brown (Brigadier-General Cleburne?) followed up the movements of my command with a view to support it.

The position which the Third Brigade occupied commanded a fine view of the cleared land on both slopes on the margins of the Doctor's Fork and of the open fields beyond, which were partly occupied by the enemy. The slope in front of my brigade was broken by slight spurs and by an undulation running nearly parallel with the general direction of the brow of the hill. In front of the right wing of the brigade and just below the crest of the undulation was a farm-house, with out-houses, orchard, and inclosed grounds. A rail fence ran nearly parallel with the crest of the undulation and to the left of the farm-house. Below this fence about 200 yards was the east bank of the Doctor's Fork, along a portion of which in front of my brigade was a stone fence, and the bank itself was nearly vertical, of solid rock, and from 3 to 5 feet high. Behind this bank the enemy were in position, with skirmishers advanced to the rail fence and farm-house on the undulation above. On the opposite or west bank and running parallel to the general direction of the stream was another stone fence, inclosing in part the yard of a farm-house, and a fence on the west side of this yard was also of stone. Beyond this last fence was the house or barn which was burned during the conflict of my brigade with the enemy. The Mackville and Perryville road descended the slope on the north side of the farm-house, leaving a yard in its front partly inclosed on that side by a stone fence and partly by a rail one. On the north side of the Mackville road and to the right of the farm-house last referred to was an elevation commanding the open fields and grounds on the west, south, and north, and much of the slope on the east of the creek. This height, the three stone walls (each commanding the one more advanced toward our position), and the crest of the hill above them all were occupied by the enemy or held within their lines. The position was a very strong one. There was perhaps none stronger in the enemy's lines.

While the Third Brigade was in position, as just described, the right section of Captain Darden's battery kept up a fire on the enemy in front, and Capt. [W. W.] Carnes' battery on our right, posted on a spur of the same hill, and a battery of the enemy on our left, kept a very brisk fire on each other and on the infantry within their reach. Their shots passed immediately in front of the Third Brigade in a direction very nearly parallel to its line of battle, so that an advance from our position upon the enemy in front seemed likely to expose the brigade to an enfilading fire from the enemy's battery on our left. Some of the enemy's shots fell among the men of the Thirty-seventh Tennessee Regiment without injury to the men.

Between the hours of 1 and 2 p. m., when the troops of the right wing of our army were seen advancing to the attack on my right and in a line of battle approaching a perpendicular to that on which we were formed, I was ordered to move my brigade in conjunction with the right wing by changing my front obliquely to the left. By this means the enfilading fire of the enemy's battery was avoided and my right moved forward until it came under the fire of the enemy's skirmishers near the first farm-house. It was at the same time under the fire of two of the enemy's batteries, one enfilading from the right, the other on the left, which was throwing balls and spherical-case shot. The Thirty-seventh Tennessee Regiment responded to the fire of the enemy's skirmishers and drove them beyond the creek. The Forty-fourth Regiment here suffered from these batteries and from sharpshooters behind the stone wall at the creek.

The first casualties in the brigade occurred here in the Thirty-seventh and Forty-fourth Tennessee Regiments. The Forty-fourth Regiment lost several men by shells from the enemy's batteries on our left. Under the conviction that the change of front first ordered in my brigade was for the object of moving on this battery, three of my regiments, the Fifth Confederate, Twenty-fifth and Forty-fourth Tennessee Regiments, continued to wheel rapidly to the left and speedily advanced to the height the enemy appeared to occupy, fixing their bayonets for a charge. Upon reaching that height it was found that General Adams had occupied that position. The Fifth Confederate Regiment was then promptly moved by Col. J. A. Smith upon the enemy behind the stone fences. The Twenty-fifth and Forty-fourth Regiments took a position, at the request of General Adams, in support of the battery placed in position on the height to which they advanced. Colonel Fulton, of the Forty-fourth, reports to me that when he moved with a view to unite his regiment with the brigade which had been advanced and driven the enemy from the stone fence beyond the creek, General Adams found his position so threatened by a column of the enemy that he thought it necessary to detain these regiments. He also reports that they were afterward put in position under cover of woods and in support of a battery by the major-general commanding the division. The remaining four regiments, the Thirty-seventh, Seventeenth, Twenty-third, and Fifth Confederate Regiments, advanced down the slope of the hill and under fire from artillery and infantry, driving the enemy from their strong defensive positions behind the stone walls and into the open field beyond the farm-houses on the north of the Doctor's Fork. These regiments then occupied the stone wall above the farm-house. A portion of the Thirty-seventh Regiment took position along the Mackville road, partly flanking the position of the enemy in the field and protected by the side slope of rock. The Twenty-third Regiment moved to a position to the left of the farm-house and in the open field.

The conflict continued here for about two hours, and was maintained with remarkable vigor and stubbornness on both sides and with heavy loss on the part of the enemy, who for a long time maintained their position in the open field exposed to the deadly aim of the regiment behind the stone fence. Early in this part of the conflict the houses in advance of the upper stone fence took fire and were consumed. The fire of the Fifth Confederate Regiment was particularly destructive, plainly thinning the enemy's ranks at every volley. Three times the flag of the enemy was cut down, and finally they were beaten back, utterly whipped.

The command of the enemy opposed to my brigade was that of Colonel Lytle, of the Tenth Ohio Regiment, commanding the Seventeenth Brigade, which consisted of the Tenth Ohio, the Fifteenth Kentucky, the Thirty-second Indiana, and perhaps the Third Ohio.

Two of the four regiments of my command opposed to the enemy at this point (the Twenty-third and Thirty-seventh Tennessee Regiments) were very small, averaging only about 230 effective strength. Three of these regiments now, at about 5 p. m., reported their ammunition exhausted, and not knowing what fresh troops we might encounter by advancing beyond the stone wall and seeing Brigadier-General Cleburne advancing to our support, I directed them to wait until their cartridges could be replenished and reported to General Cleburne the condition of my command, suggesting the propriety of an advance upon the enemy. I immediately sent to the rear to have some ammunition brought up. About this time Colonel Lytle, the commander of the enemy's forces opposed to my brigade, was reported to me as prisoner by a soldier in charge of him and by whom Colonel Lytle was brought back from the field. The colonel was wounded in the head, and I sent him to my brigade surgeon, under charge of Private Perkins, a clerk in the office of my assistant adjutant-general.

My attention was now called to the fire of the left section of Captain Darden's battery, which had twice changed its position, advancing both times and opening from each position upon the enemy in front of the brigade. I now found it posted to the right of the Perryville and Mackville road, still on the western slope of the hill and supported by the Forty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Tennessee Regiments. Finding the fire of this section likely to damage my own men I caused its fire to cease, and an order having arrived to move this artillery to the height beyond the Doctor's Fork, to the right of the Mackville road, I ordered these regiments to move forward and to advance up the hill to the west of Doctor's Fork and on the left of the farm-house. Returning immediately to the four regiments in advance I found the Seventeenth and Thirty-seventh Tennessee Regiments had been ordered to advance up to the eminence above and to the right of the farm-house and support the artillery just ordered to that position. I also was directed by Major-General Buckner to go to that eminence in order to give my personal attention to the action at that point. On this eminence was now posted the whole of Captains Darden's and [C. H.] Slocomb's batteries, each four pieces, and one section of Calvert's battery, all of which were actively engaged, while they were exposed to a direct and enfilading fire from the enemy's batteries. Balls and shells here continued to fall thick and fast from the enemy's guns, while our own batteries replied with great rapidity until after dark and the ammunition of our batteries was exhausted, when they were withdrawn, and the Thirty-seventh and Forty-fourth Tennessee Regiments rested on the eminence until ordered to withdraw, at about 12 o'clock at night.

The Forty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Tennessee Regiments, which I had ordered to advance and pass the Doctor's Creek on the left of the farm-house, report to me that they advanced about 250 yards to the left and front of the burnt house to the foot of a small hill, where they remained under a heavy fire of the enemy's artillery and small-arms until General Adams' brigade fell back behind them and suggested that they had better fall back also. They then took post at a rail fence, where they received orders from General Hardee to advance and hold their former position, which they did, supported for a time by General Adams' command. They remained in this position until the firing ceased, at 12 o'clock. They fell back with the brigade.

Report of Col. A. S. Marks, Seventeenth Tennessee Infantry.

CAMP NEAR BRYANTSVILLE, Ky.,
October 12, 1862.

GENERAL: In compliance with your order I have the honor to submit the following report relative to the part taken by my command in the battle of Perryville on the 8th instant:

By your order I moved forward from the position occupied by your brigade in rear of the White House, and advanced cautiously, with skirmishers thrown forward, to the crest of the hill overlooking the Doctor's Branch. At this point a section of Darden's battery was placed in battery, and I was ordered by Major-General Buckner to support it, and in a short time after the pieces were placed in battery the enemy directed his fire upon it from a battery in front and one from the left. The shelling from the enemy's batteries was well directed, but having my command behind the crest of the hill no casualties occurred. In the mean time you had moved all of your command forward save my regiment and the Twenty-third Tennessee. When the engagement became general upon the right I was ordered to move forward and join my brigade. I immediately began my advance, and not knowing the position occupied by you I directed my march toward the hill immediately beyond the Doctor's Branch. From a battery in my front the enemy kept up a continual shelling during my advance, but I found no difficulty in preserving perfect order and coolness. Our line upon the right had already forced the enemy to retire from his position, and it was my purpose in the absence of orders to move up the hill upon the right of the house beyond the Doctor's Branch and assail the enemy upon his right, but when I reached the branch I found the Fifth Confederate moving out from under the bluff by the left flank, and finding the bluff difficult of ascension I determined to move farther up the branch by the left flank, where the ascent would be easier, and also where I could act in conjunction with the Fifth Confederate. The Fifth Confederate had passed the house referred to when the enemy opened fire from beyond the house. There was a stone fence running parallel with the branch which gave entire protection to my command, and I did not suffer from the first fire of the enemy. There was a second stone fence about 40 paces beyond and parallel with the one upon the branch and also beyond the house. I immediately threw six companies forward and occupied it. I then ordered a company to move around to the right and turn the enemy's left, but at that conjuncture Colonel White came up with his command and took position upon my right, which prevented the move upon my part. The enemy's fire upon my regiment was heavy and incessant, but being well protected it suffered but little, while it delivered its fire with coolness and precision. The engagement was thus continued until the enemy abandoned his position and our ammunition was exhausted. By your order I then detached a company and sent it back for ammunition, but before its return I was ordered by a staff officer, unknown to me, to move forward over the hill upon which one of our batteries was afterward placed. I had bayonets fixed and moved forward. When I had arrived near the crest of the hill the same officer ordered me to have my bayonets taken off. I protested against this, as I had no ammunition. When he ascertained that fact he ordered me to retire, but immediately Major-General Buckner came up at that time and ordered me to hold the hill at all hazards.

In a short time several pieces were placed in battery upon the crest of the hill and General Buckner ordered me to remain and support them. The shelling upon us was terrific and continued until night closed the conflict. By your order I advanced skirmishers about half a mile in front of my position and held the field until midnight, at which time we were withdrawn and retired to our original position.

My whole command, both officers and men, displayed great coolness and courage and obeyed every order with alacrity during the entire engagement. I sent out details and collected 150 stand of arms, which I had carried off the field and deposited at our encampment upon this side of the creek.

Below you will find a statement* of killed and wounded: Killed, 4; wounded, 19. Total, 23.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Report of Lieut. Col. R. H. Keeble, Twenty-third Tennessee Infantry.

OCTOBER 12, 1862.

The following report of the action at Perryville on the 8th instant is respectfully submitted:

The Twenty-third Tennessee, having advanced under orders from its original position, took a new position in a field upon the brow of a hill, with orders to hold it at all hazards. At this place it remained about two hours under fire of the enemy's batteries, without however any casualties, until orders were given to unite with the brigade and advance upon the enemy. We accordingly did so, marching over rough ground and having several fences to pull down and climb. Having advanced down the hill and across the ravine we marched by the left flank into another field and orchard for the purpose of being unmasked by the Fifth Confederate, which had moved by the left flank in front of us. Being thus unmasked we again marched to the front, and here we received the first heavy fire from the enemy, who were concealed within an inclosure to our right and behind a stone wall. It was during this fire that Capt. [W. A.] Ott, of Company H, fell mortally wounded. The regiment remained here for a while under shelter of the fence and stone wall until I ordered it to move forward to the next fence, to gain which it had to march across an open field under a heavy and galling fire from the enemy. Having gained the latter position we came upon the enemy, and now commenced a heavy and terrific fire on both sides, we engaging at the same time a regiment of the enemy in our front and another to our right behind a fence forming a right angle to the one occupied by us. The engagement lasted from one and a half to two hours, the enemy in the mean time having been twice beaten from the field. The enemy it seems had heavy reserves to bring upon the field as soon as one line would give way. Having driven the enemy from the field and exhausted our ammunition, acting in concert with the Fifth Confederate, I ordered the regiment to fall back under the brow of the hill for a new supply. Our position was soon occupied by the Forty-fourth Tennessee, under command of Maj. [H. C.] Ewin, who advanced beyond the position occupied by the Twenty-third, the enemy having retired from the field. Having received our ammunition we again advanced.

*Nominal list omitted.

Night had, however, set in, the enemy yielded the field, and the firing all ceased. We took our position upon and occupied the field, threw forward skirmishers beyond where the enemy's lines were in the evening, and there remained until late at night, when we were ordered to change our position.

I carried into action 201 men, officers and privates. Lost in killed, wounded, and missing 52, 7 of the number being killed upon the field. The loss of the enemy upon the portion of the field where we were engaged was much heavier, all who visited the spot concurring that there was not less than 100 killed left upon the field.

It would be doing injustice in such a small regiment as I had, where all, both officers and men, were so prompt to obey any order and eager to do their whole duty, to make any discrimination. The company officers were of great assistance to me in cheering and encouraging their men and the men of great assistance in encouraging and cheering each other.

Most respectfully submitted.

R. H. KEEBLE,

Lieut. Col., Comdg. Twenty-third Tennessee Regiment.

Brigadier-General JOHNSON,

Commanding Third Division, Army of the Mississippi.

No. 42.

Report of Col. John M. Hughs, Twenty-fifth Tennessee Infantry.

BRYANTSVILLE, KY., October 12, 1862.

My regiment was ordered to move from Lebanon, Ky., on the evening of the 6th instant, but after marching 5 miles we were ordered back to Lebanon. As soon as rations were cooked orders were received to move again in the direction of Perryville, at which place we arrived about 4 o'clock on the morning of the 7th. For the day we took a position in rear of the brigade, being much fatigued by our lengthy march of the previous evening and night, and also hungry and without rations.

Early on the morning of the 8th we took our place in line of battle and advanced between the Forty-fourth Tennessee on the right and the Fifth Confederate on the left. When the brigade moved forward the second time my line of skirmishers, commanded by Lieutenant Walker, moved forward half a mile to the front and took position on the hill in sight of the enemy. After a time the brigade advanced to the position occupied by my skirmishers and waited for the attack to begin on the right. In a short time the battery on our left, supported by this regiment and the Fifth Confederate, opened upon the enemy's main position. This caused the enemy to open fire upon our position. When the fight became general on the right the whole brigade was ordered forward to the attack. As soon as we advanced from under cover of the hill and timber a charge was ordered. I never witnessed a more gallant charge than that made by my regiment. I did not see any man flinch from duty, and although we crossed several fences a good line was kept. The enemy retired before us and many were shot as they went up the hill after leaving their place behind the rock fences in the creek bottom. Having orders to move in concert with the regiments on my right and left I was compelled to change my course more to the left than I thought we ought to go. However, the enemy had retired over the hill out of sight and ceased firing upon us. The Forty-fourth having passed entirely around us and the Fifth Confederate having disappeared, I do not know where, I was left on the extreme left of the brigade, and meeting General Adams, was advised by him to advance by the left flank and take position on the left of his batteries, then firing upon the enemy. This I did, and had just formed when I discovered the enemy advancing toward the battery, but discovering us between him and the battery he retired, except the pickets, which were seen all the time we held this position. In a short time the batteries advanced and I supported them, keeping just in rear, and forming in a little hollow just below where a house was burned, according to your own instructions. This position I held until the batteries ceased firing. I then marched by the left flank, unmasking the other regiment, and, leaving the low ground, again sent out skirmishers. Not finding the enemy on the left and seeing the batteries retire I marched back on the hill and took position on the hill. Nearly at night I again advanced and took position behind a rock-fence and sent out pickets to the left. They soon reported that the enemy was placing batteries on the hill above us and sent a report of the same to you. The regiment was next ordered toward Perryville on picket. Two companies were sent to the woods 300 or 400 yards to the front. I then rested until ordered to take the position occupied by my command the day before.

My command only lost 8 men wounded and 1 missing, who was sent to the hospital in charge of a prisoner picked up by him, said prisoner being slightly wounded.

I am gratified to be able to report to you that not an officer or soldier of my regiment failed to do his whole duty. I think the men deserve great applause for the spirit with which they obeyed orders, being as they were very sore and tired from the effects of our late march from Sparta via Gainesborough, Livingston, and Burkesville without stopping a day and marching several nights.

Respectfully,

J. M. HUGHS,

Colonel, Commanding Twenty-fifth Tennessee Regiment.

Brig. Gen. B. R. JOHNSON.

Report of Col. Moses White, Thirty-seventh Tennessee Infantry.

OCTOBER 18, 1862.

SIR: On the 7th instant the Thirty-seventh Tennessee was in position near a creek in the vicinity of Perryville. We slept there that night. On the morning of the 8th, after considerable maneuvering, the regiment was advanced to a hill several hundred yards to the front and remained there until about 1 o'clock in support of [C.] Swett's and some other battery. Between the hours of 1 and 2 p. m. we were ordered to advance in line with General Cheatham's command, which was moving upon the enemy on our right. We advanced about 200 yards, when from the brow of a hill we had reached we saw the enemy in line below and received a heavy volley from them; simultaneously my men fired upon the enemy, who immediately fell back. Several of my men were wounded on the first fire by the small-arms of the enemy, shells and grape from their batteries, which swept around us in perfect showers. I commanded my men to reload immediately, and they continued to load and fire until we discovered that we were separated from the brigade, which was to us a matter of no little surprise, as we had received no command but forward. A house, outhouses, and orchard were situated immediately to our right, which obstructed the view and prevented us from observing the movements of the left of the brigade. Ascertaining that it had moved in the direction of the woods to the left, I commanded my men to march by the left flank in that direction. After passing the orchard we discovered a regiment emerging from the woods in the rear in the direction from which the brigade first moved; we wheeled into line on the right of what turned out to be the Seventeenth Tennessee and advanced to a stone wall in the hollow below, which inclosed a house, &c., several hundred yards to the left of the house first alluded to. Colonel Marks took his position behind a wall running parallel with the hollow. I filed right and took my position behind a post-and-rail fence running diagonally to the wall; here we were met with an almost overwhelming storm of lead from a corn or cane field near by. I commanded my men to mount the fence and take position behind a stone wall which separated the yard from the field, running parallel with and about 50 yards distant from the wall behind which the Seventeenth was stationed. They promptly and cheerfully obeyed the order and immediately opened upon the enemy, I hope with some effect. The fire raged with unabated fury for about one hour and a half, when, our ammunition being exhausted, we were compelled to cease firing, but were soon relieved by General Cleburne, but not until the enemy had almost ceased to fire. I had several officers and men wounded in the fight at the wall. After the regiment was withdrawn a sufficient detail was dispatched for ammunition and we were soon supplied. Meanwhile we had moved to the right and advanced near the brow of the hill on which Calvert's battery was planted. Late in the afternoon (the Seventeenth Tennessee was again on my left) General Buckner ordered us to advance, when I gave the command "Fix bayonets," and advanced to the summit. The Seventeenth did not advance, as I afterward learned the order was countermanded so far as that regiment was concerned. A battalion from the Sixteenth Alabama was soon after ordered to form on my left and we advanced about half a mile in the field, but took no further part in the battle, as night soon set in and the firing gradually ceased.

Maj. [J. T.] McReynolds and most of my company officers acted with great gallantry. Individual instances of both officers and men might be mentioned of the exhibition of the most gallant and desperate conduct.

I had 27 men wounded and some killed in the action. Their names have been furnished by the adjutant.

Respectfully submitted.

MOSES WHITE,

Colonel Thirty-seventh Tennessee Regiment.

Brigadier-General JOHNSON.

Report of Col. John S. Fulton, Forty-fourth Tennessee Infantry.

OCTOBER 11, 1862.

I have to report that the Forty-fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers was placed in position on the bluff of the creek on the morning of the 7th instant; that they remained there during the day and night, and on the next day the regiment was advanced toward a skirt of woods along our front about 11.30 a. m. After remaining there an hour we were advanced into the woods in front. Here we remained an hour. The enemy engaged in the mean time one of our batteries immediately on our right.

We were again ordered forward and occupied a ravine, and there remained until General Cheatham's division on our right made a charge, when we were ordered to advance upon the enemy and oblique to the left of our then present position.

The regiment was promptly in motion and charged rapidly over the hill and forward through a corn field and over a large meadow, where we were exposed to an enfilading fire coming from the enemy on our right and a battery upon our left. Obliquing to the left here we suffered terribly from the fire of the batteries right and left of us and the sharpshooters of the enemy posted in the orchard and behind the rock fence on our right. We charged rapidly up the hill with fixed bayonets to silence and take the battery on our left, and having gained the top of the hill we found it to be the Washington Artillery, and immediately reported to them that they had been playing upon their own men, when the firing ceased. This battery was supported by Brigadier-General Adams' brigade, who ordered the Forty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Tennessee Regiments to remain there to assist him, as the enemy was reported to be advancing on him to the left in heavy force.

We remained there some twenty minutes and then moved in direction of our brigade and were met by General Buckner, who ordered us to advance to the woods and form line of battle and wait further orders. This done, we remained there some twenty-five minutes and we again received orders to advance. We advanced up to the left of the burning house and occupied position there for some time, and again advanced some 250 yards to a gully at the foot of a small hill. Here we remained under a heavy fire of the enemy's small-arms and artillery.

General Adams' entire brigade fell back behind us with a battery, leaving no one in front of us or any other support. He suggested that we had better fall back. We fell back to a rail fence, where we received orders from General Hardee to advance and hold our former position so long as possible. This was done immediately. Shortly after General Adams' command (or a portion) returned to our support in our rear. They suffered from the fire of the enemy and again retired, leaving us in our position, where we remained until the musketry firing ceased. We then retired a few hundred yards to a rail fence running nearly north and south.

At 12 m. we received orders to fall back from this position and occupy the same position occupied two nights previously.

I am glad to be able to report that both officers and men of this regiment stood well under the heaviest fire of the enemy, evincing courage equal to the occasion.

Herewith you have a list* of the killed [14], and I refer you to the surgeon's report for other casualties.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JNO. S. FULTON,

Colonel Forty-fourth Tennessee Regiment.

Report of Brig. Gen. Joshua W. Sill, U. S. Army, commanding Second Division, First Corps, Army of the Ohio, including skirmish, October 8, at Lawrenceburg.

THREE MILES NORTHEAST OF CHAPLINTOWN,
October 9, 1862—6 p. m.

GENERAL: Left Frankfort 1 a. m. yesterday. By arriving at Lawrenceburg the rebel cavalry appeared in front and a smart skirmish ensued, owing to an imprudent advance of Jacob's cavalry. The leading company lost 3 killed, 12 wounded, 13 missing. Several of the enemy killed and wounded I doubt not.

Our march from Lawrenceburg was closely watched by the enemy's cavalry, and at daybreak of to-day they appeared in force and attempted to drive in the pickets. They exhibited three regiments of infantry and one of cavalry. Our pickets were re-enforced and a sharp firing was kept up for three or four hours. On our side the Thirty-second Indiana, First Ohio, Fifteenth and Nineteenth Regulars were engaged, and a section of Guenther's battery. Their loss respectively was: Thirty-second Indiana, 1 killed; First Ohio, 3 killed and 8 wounded; Sixteenth[?] Regiment, 1 killed. The enemy must have suffered very severely. Many of their men were seen to fall.

I presume they picked up some of our stragglers, and I fear they have captured a train of sixteen wagons sent after me unadvisedly, and which contained articles for the Fifth Brigade. I know nothing of General Dumont's column, but I suppose he has moved on Frankfort.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. SILL,

Report of Col. Edwin A. Parrott, First Ohio Infantry.

HDQRS. FIRST REGT. OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY,
In Camp, October 9, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the skirmish had with the enemy this morning by the troops under my command at Dog Walk:

As my regiment left camp the general commanding apprised me that our rear was threatened by the enemy and ordered me to march back on the road until I overtook the Nineteenth U. S. Infantry, previously sent out. About half a mile from camp I came up with our troops on the road to Lawrenceburg. Major King, Fifteenth U. S. Infantry, had his battalion drawn up in an open field, where he commanded the road; Major Carpenter, Nineteenth U. S. Infantry, was to his left and in the road, which at that point makes an abrupt turn. Being the ranking officer present, I posted the First Ohio behind the crest of a ridge in the skirt of woods to the rear of the open ground and ordered the battalions of regulars to fall back across the field and form on the same line and to the right of the First Ohio. In the mean time Lieutenant Guenther had come up with a section of Battery H, Fifth U. S. Artillery.

Just as our line was formed the enemy appeared, marching by the flank up the hill in front of where I had found Major King's command. Lieutenant Guenther, having got one of his pieces in position, opened with such effect as to check the progress of the enemy and cause him to fall back under cover of the hill. From this position the enemy advanced a strong line of skirmishers. To oppose these I deployed forward a company from each battalion of the regulars; Company C, Captain Thruston, and part of Company B, Lieutenant Kuhlmann, First Ohio. The skirmishers became engaged at once and very warmly.

Major Drake at this time reported to me with the Forty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, and was sent to a position on the right and deflected at nearly a right angle to Major King, and was ordered to cover his front and right flank with skirmishers. I have no report from him, but believe there was no firing on his part of the line.

The guns of Lieutenant Guenther commanded the road in front of our center so as to check any advance along it, and the enemy's main attack was directed against our left.

The skirmish line in front of the First Ohio was strongly attacked and at one time driven a short distance from the hill on which it was posted, but being re-enforced, rallied and in turn drove the enemy back. For nearly four hours the firing here was strong and steady, and when the enemy had been driven from here he appears to have fallen back altogether and to have given up the attack, as the firing was not resumed until our troops had again taken up the march toward Mackville.

The section of Lieutenant Guenther's battery was handled with the usual vigor and skill of that accomplished officer, and was very effective in checking the advance of the enemy and in driving him from a dwelling-house, under cover of which he was making the most severe fire on our line of skirmishers.

I must particularly commend Captain Thruston and Lieutenant Kuhlmann, of the First Ohio, who bore the brunt of the enemy's attack.

The firing began a little after 8 a. m. and the enemy was finally repulsed about 1 p. m. I did not attempt to do more than hold our position and keep the enemy at bay, because I had been ordered to act strictly on the defensive.

The attacking force, I have learned from citizens and others who saw the enemy marching up, was about 2,500 to 3,000 strong, mixed infantry and cavalry, with two howitzers, which latter were not used on us. Eleven of his dead and 2 mortally wounded were found on the field, but many other bodies were seen to be carried off by him. We got from him three Springfield muskets and one Harper's Ferry rifle.*

Report of Col. William B. Hazen, Forty-first Ohio Infantry, commanding Nineteenth Brigade, Army of the Ohio.

COLUMBIA, KY., November 1, 1862.

SIR: In compliance with orders received from Headquarters Fourth Division, Army of the Ohio, I have the honor to submit the following report of the part taken by my brigade in the advance of the army from Perryville to London, at which point the van-guard retraced its steps:

On the 10th of October the brigade, consisting of the Ninth Indiana Volunteers, Col. W. H. Blake; the Forty-first Ohio Volunteers, Lieut. Col. George S. Mygatt; the Sixth Kentucky Volunteers, Col. Walter C. Whitaker; the Twenty-seventh Kentucky Volunteers, Col. C. D. Pennebaker; the One hundred and tenth Illinois Volunteers, Col. T. S. Casey, and Captain Cockerill's battery of the First Ohio Artillery, in all 2,530 effective men, was put en route with the division in the direction of Danville, encamping 3 miles from that place in line of battle.

On the morning of the 11th, agreeably with orders, I moved forward to Danville to reconnoiter the position of the enemy. I was accompanied by Wolford's cavalry and Throckmorton's battery of artillery. My orders were explicit and prevented my moving in any manner that would bring on a general engagement. The Ninth Indiana Volunteers was deployed as skirmishers and supported by the Sixth Kentucky and Forty-first Ohio, marching through the fields in double column, with the cavalry disposed on the flanks as effectively as their limited acquaintance with military maneuvers would admit.

The enemy was found drawn up in line of battle at the Fair Grounds, 1 mile from Danville, with cavalry and artillery. The latter opened without effect upon the skirmishers, who, pushing forward persistently, had no difficulty in driving the enemy through the town. My artillery and cavalry were both used in the skirmish, which at times was quite brisk, the enemy dismounting his cavalry and posting them as infantry. The Ninth Indiana pushed through the town and about 2 miles beyond, skirmishing with cavalry and artillery all the way, when they were recalled, and the brigade in obedience to orders returned to the encampment of the division.

I would mention the universal good conduct of all the troops of the command, except the cavalry companies of Captains Coppage and Fishback, of Wolford's regiment, who at the first discharge of the enemy retreated in disorder some half mile to a piece of wood and were with difficulty found by one of my staff officers. The entire regiment seemed greatly deficient in anything approaching military drill, and it was with difficulty that my orders, given in the simplest military language, were understood.

We found nearly 400 rebels sick in hospitals and captured 30 able-bodied. The enthusiasm of the people upon our entrance was beyond anything I ever before witnessed. Several of the enemy were killed and wounded. Our own casualties were 4 slightly wounded.

On the 12th the brigade, with the division, was moved forward near Camp Dick Robinson, returning to the Harrodsburg pike 3 miles from Danville, where it bivouacked until the morning of the 14th, when it took up its march on the Stanford road, bivouacking near that place until 12 o'clock at night, when it was again put in march in the direction of Crab Orchard, reaching that place about midday of the 15th, and passing to within 2 miles of Mount Vernon. On the morning of the 16th the brigade was put in march at daybreak at the head of the division, which had the advance of the Second Army Corps. On passing about 2 miles beyond that place the rear of the enemy was seen drawn up in line of battle. The Sixth Kentucky was advanced rapidly as skirmishers, which, with a few shots from Cockerill's battery, soon dispersed them.

On moving forward some 4 miles farther the enemy was found strongly posted, with his cavalry dismounted and acting as infantry and artillery. A brisk fire was opened by them upon a company of the Second Indiana Cavalry, commanded by Lieutenant ———, which was reconnoitering on foot. They met the fire gallantly, and were immediately relieved by the Sixth Kentucky, which moved forward splendidly, and after a brisk skirmish of thirty minutes the enemy retired precipitately. In this skirmish the Sixth Kentucky lost 1 killed and 2 slightly wounded. The enemy lost 11 killed and several wounded.

The Ninth Indiana now relieved the Sixth Kentucky as skirmishers, and pushing forward about 2 miles found the enemy again posted, with dismounted cavalry and artillery, in their favorite position, being upon the hill-sides opposite an open valley. One wing of this regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Suman, by a rapid movement succeeded in flanking the enemy and came near capturing his artillery, which was lost only by the rapidity of its retreat. A sharp skirmish was kept up during this movement, resulting in the killing and wounding of several of the enemy and the capture of several more, including a captain.

In moving forward the remainder of the day an almost uninterrupted skirmish was kept up, the enemy impeding our progress by felling timber. The brigade bivouacked at Big Rockcastle Creek. The prisoners of this day amounted to between 30 and 40.

On the 17th the command moved only to Camp Wild Cat, a distance of 4 miles, the Nineteenth Brigade being in rear of the division.

On the 18th, it being reported that the enemy were posted in strong force a few miles in our front, I was ordered forward to drive him from his position. This was effected after a sharp skirmish, in which the Ninth Indiana and the Forty-first Ohio took part, the enemy losing several officers and men, without casualty to our own arms. In obedience with orders the command was marched back to Camp Wild Cat and bivouacked for the night.

On the 19th I received orders to march to Pitman's Cross-Roads, but no farther without orders. The Forty-first Ohio was deployed as skirmishers, and the command moved forward without coming upon the enemy until within 5 miles of Pitman's. The roads had been blocked with fallen timber almost continuously, but by the hard labor of the pioneer party we were enabled to reach within one-half mile of Pitman's by night-fall, a sharp skirmish taking place about sundown, in which Lieutenant Hardy, adjutant of the Forty-first Ohio, had his horse shot and one man of the same regiment was slightly wounded.

The enemy posted himself with artillery at the cross-roads, throwing shot over my lines, but doing no damage. The Forty-first Ohio was pushed forward under cover of the darkness to examine their position, the people of the country reporting that a strong force of all arms was strongly posted there for an engagement. The women and children of the neighborhood had been sent away, which gave color to the report. The reconnaissance was pushed within 50 yards of the artillery, when the regiment was withdrawn some 400 yards and posted for the night behind a spur of the hill. Disposition was then made for an attack at dawn. At 10 p. m. the artillery of the enemy took up its march, followed by his other troops, the rear getting under way at 4 o'clock a. m.

On the morning of the 20th a patrol was sent through the town of London. On returning they brought some 25 prisoners, reporting the enemy 6 miles from that place.

On the 22d the command in obedience to orders marched back to Camp Wild Cat, carrying with it 75 prisoners.

In summing up this advance it appears that in eight days the brigade engaged in six skirmishes, killing some 20 of the enemy, wounding many more, and capturing, including many sick, between 500 and 600 prisoners. Our own loss was 1 killed and 5 or 6 wounded.

The conduct of the entire brigade could not have been better. Lieutenant Colonel Suman, of the Ninth Indiana Volunteers, deserves the warm thanks of his commander. I was an eye-witness to all that occurred on the entire march. The course of the road over which we passed after leaving Mount Vernon was through narrow gorges, occasionally debouching into narrow valleys, and of such a character as to render our movements necessarily cautious and affording opportunities for an energetic foe to have stopped our progress at almost any point. It is doubtful if the rear of the army proper was ever reached, but merely a light force of from 1,500 to 3,000 held back against our advance to feel our progress. It always yielded when closely pressed.

It is proper to add that during the entire campaign, although destitute of many of the comforts even of life on the march, without tents, often with an insufficiency of food, through inclemencies of weather, and marches of almost unprecedented length, I have never heard a murmur, and have now to report a good condition of health never before known in the brigade and a state of thorough discipline of which the command has reason to be proud.

My staff, as follows: Capt. R. L. Kimberly, Forty-first Ohio, acting assistant adjutant-general; Capt. H. W. Johnson, Forty-first Ohio, acting assistant quartermaster; Capt. James McCleery, Forty-first Ohio, assistant inspector-general; Dr. M. G. Sherman, Ninth Indiana, brigade surgeon; Lieut. C. D. Gaylord, Forty-first Ohio, aide-de-camp; Lieut. William M. Beebe, Forty-first Ohio, aide-de-camp, permitted no opportunity to escape of renewing the constant evidence since being in the service of brigade headquarters of ability, efficiency, and a desire to do their duty properly. They, with my entire command, have my warmest thanks.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. HAZEN,

Colonel, Commanding Nineteenth Brigade.

Capt. H. ATKINSON, A. A. G., Fourth Division.

No. 2.

Reports of Brig. Gen. William Sooy Smith, U. S. Army, commanding Fourth Division, of skirmishes about Camp Wild Cat, October 17.

ROCKCASTLE RIVER, October 17, 1862—9 a. m.

SIR: I have pressed a reconnaissance nearly up to Camp Wild Cat this morning. The enemy has passed on, leaving the road badly blocked in his rear. There is no forage whatever in this neighborhood and none ahead. Our animals are now suffering, and it will virtually sacrifice our train to move it any farther to the front. The same may be said of our artillery. Our infantry can go as far as rations will last which they can carry on their persons.

Kirby Smith encamped on the Madison road, 16 miles back from Pitman's, last night. If Gay could have crossed over this morning into that road he might have intercepted stragglers, &c., but his horses were suffering to an extent that would not permit such movement, and there is no forage in that direction.

We have 50 prisoners, which I have paroled, and I send them to the rear this morning. Many of them are deserters and beg that they may not be exchanged. Shall I press forward with my infantry, leaving trains and artillery?

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. SMITH,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Fourth Division.

Maj. Gen. THOMAS L. CRITTENDEN, Commanding Second Corps.

ONE MILE FROM WILD CAT, October 17, 1862—12 m.

SIR: My advanced brigade has passed Camp Wild Cat. We are pressing the rebel cavalry back, skirmishing with them at every turn of the road; have killed one of their men and wounded several. Three of our men wounded. They have so obstructed the road by felling timber that our progress is very slow. A cavalry force could prevent this, but our infantry cannot get ahead fast enough. They fell trees until we come up to them, then fall back rapidly and chop away again. We push them as closely as possible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. SMITH,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Fourth Division.

Major-General CRITTENDEN.

CAMP WILD CAT, October 17, 1862—8 p. m.

SIR: A colored man whom I sent over to the Madison road this forenoon has returned, bringing me information to the effect that a rebel brigade encamped at the cross-roads skedaddled precipitately, leaving their rations cooking behind them, on Cruft's approach. He says they did not retire toward London, but proceeded on the prolongation of the Winding Glade road (the one taken from this point by General Cruft) toward Goose Creek. He says they left a drove of mules and some 20 cattle behind them. He came back by a very circuitous route and missed our forces. I have sent him with all haste, well mounted, to General Cruft's, to give him this information and to serve him as guide. We have just heard a cannon-shot in that direction, and hope Cruft has intercepted some of them. I informed him in a note sent by the colored man that you had sent two brigades over to the Madison road—one from Van Cleve's division and one from Wood's. I think I have reliable information that there is but one brigade of infantry and one of cavalry between this point and London on our road.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. SMITH,

Brigadier-General, Commanding Fourth Division.

GENERAL: Lieutenant Beeler, Cruft's quartermaster, has just returned from his command, which he left at the cross-roads at 6.30 this evening, shortly after it reached that point. He says Cruft had a pretty sharp skirmish with the rebels, in which he wounded several of them and took them prisoners; one officer. Only 2 of our men hurt. He has taken 11 prisoners. Cruft holds the road, and if there is anything back it will have to fight its way through.

Yours, truly,

W. S. SMITH,
Brigadier-General, Commanding Fourth Division.

CAMP WILD CAT, October 18, 1862—8 a. m.

SIR: Captain Wheeler, of our First Kentucky Infantry, captured near Crab Orchard, has just returned, bringing a citizen with him. They inform me that the accounts received yesterday with reference to the enemy's force in my front are correct. A force of one or two divisions has taken a strong position near Little Rockcastle River, to cover the retirement of their main army trains, artillery, &c. They report a very heavy force on the Madison road, and say that it is moving off toward Manchester. There is a practicable road leading over from the Madison road into the one upon which we are located, intersecting it 3 miles to my rear. Please have it closely watched.

We have no forage at all and our poor animals are suffering terribly.

Please inform me of the disposition of our forces to my rear and upon my flanks, that I may know what scouting is necessary. I should have some cavalry for scouting purposes.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

W. S. SMITH,
Brigadier-General, Commanding Fourth Division.

Major-General CRITTENDEN.

P. S.—A colored man from Widow Baugh's, 1 mile from the point of intersection of the Winding Glade road with the Madison road and 10 miles from London, has just come in, stating that the rear of the rebel forces on the Madison road is stated by the rebels to be at Big Hill. Their troops are passing toward Manchester. He says that he heard one of their officers ordered to Goose Creek headquarters, and heard them say that that was the headquarters of their army. I send this for what it is worth.

[Indorsement.]

OCTOBER 18, 1862—9.20 a. m.

I was within 3 miles of General Smith's position when I received this. Will let General Van Cleve move up to the intersection of the Winding Glade road with this. General Van Cleve is now on the road and within 2 miles of me. Unless I get further information I will let General Wood come up to the place General Thomas and myself stopped at yesterday, which will be to within 3 miles of General Van Cleve.

By order of General Crittenden:

R. LODER,
Captain and Aide-de-Camp.

No. 3.

Report of Col. Stanley Matthews, Fifty-first Ohio Infantry, commanding Twenty-third Brigade, of reconnaissance on the Madison road.

HDQRS. TWENTY-THIRD BRIGADE, October 19, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that in obedience to your orders I marched the Twenty-third Brigade from the Crab Orchard road to the Madison road by the old road along Roundstone Creek, reaching the designated point about 4 p. m. The advance, consisting of two companies of the Eighth Kentucky Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel May, on reaching the road captured several small squads of straggling rebel soldiers, belonging principally, as they stated, to Leadbetter's brigade, some to Gillespie's, and two or three to Chenault's cavalry regiment, recently organized in Madison County, Ky.

I sent a party on the road across Rockcastle River to Cruesis', where 6 prisoners were captured. I ascertained that Chenault's cavalry had passed the same day, some hours before my arrival, and a portion at least had remained at Cruesis' until about an hour before sunset, engaged in slaughtering beef, when on receipt of a dispatch from Scovill's Cross-Roads they left in haste, without cooking their meat. A negro captured there stated that he had come from Scovill's; that the last of the troops encamped there had left at 3 o'clock that afternoon for Manchester, he escaping in the hurry of their departure. The cavalry at Chenault's could take the same direction, without going as far as Scovill's. The Madison road was covered with tracks of cattle and sheep, which had obliterated all other, and seemed to be the last made. From the best information I could gather from prisoners and citizens I believe all the trains and cattle of the enemy had passed.

I was told by one of the prisoners that 500 of Morgan's cavalry left Richmond on the night of the 17th instant, going toward Lexington, but the understanding was that on their return they were to go out by the way of Irvine, though it was also stated that Morgan had sent word to Major Coffee, residing on the Madison road near the foot of the Big Hill, that he would be with him last night and exchange him.

About dusk a party of 4 horsemen, riding toward us from the north, were hailed by the pickets, and not answering the challenge, were fired upon. One was taken prisoner (his horse being shot), but the rest escaped. The prisoner is a citizen; the others it is likely belonged to Morgan's cavalry.

The result of the reconnaissance, besides the information just detailed, was the capture of between 25 and 30 prisoners and 10 or 12 horses, a particular account of which will be hereafter furnished.

Respectfully,

STANLEY MATTHEWS,

Colonel, Commanding Twenty-third Brigade.

Brig. Gen. H. P. VAN CLEVE, Commanding Fifth Division.

No. 4.

Report of Col. Edward M. McCook, Second Indiana Cavalry, commanding First Cavalry Brigade, of expedition from Crab Orchard to Big Hill and Richmond, October 21.

LEBANON, KY., October 24, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that in pursuance to your order I left

Crab Orchard on the morning of the 21st and arrived at Paint Lick Bridge that afternoon. On my arrival, finding no enemy there, I divided my forces, and sent one portion to Big Hill, where I was informed some of the enemy still remained, and another to Richmond, leaving a third portion at Paint Lick Bridge, to which point I had been notified in writing support would march.

The detachment under Captain Crosby sent to Big Hill found a wagon loaded with telegraph wires and a battery, which they destroyed, pouring acid on the wires and breaking up the battery. They also found 60 rounds of 10-pounder spherical-case and a caisson, which was turned over to the commander of the Home Guards to bury, as we had no wagons.

The Richmond detachment found some 200 or 300 sick and wounded rebels there, which they did not parole, not having time or facilities for paroling so large a number.

I have the honor to inclose a list of prisoners captured and paroled by me during the march, and also to report the capture of 11 horses, which were turned over to the Third Kentucky, Colonel Murray, and Seventh Pennsylvania, Major Wynkoop, the only troops of my brigade accompanying me.

The infantry supports arrived twenty-eight hours after we reached Paint Lick Bridge. I feel satisfied that none of the enemy except unarmed stragglers, sick and wounded, are in that part of Kentucky.

EDWARD M. MCCOOK,
Colonel, Commanding Brigade.

Maj. GEORGE E. FLYNT.

No. 5.

Report of Col. James R. Howard, Third Confederate Cavalry, of skirmishes near Mountain Gap, October 14-16.

JAMESTOWN, TENN.,
October 17, 1862—8 a. m.

GENERAL: Your dispatch under the caption of 13th instant was received last evening. Wolford's brigade (Federal) has been skirmishing with me for three days and nights. I have engaged him to the best of my ability every time. It was his purpose to cut me off. I outmanaged him, and have secured all my wagons as far as this point. In a short skirmish yesterday with about 500 of his cavalry I lost 2 men killed and 4 missing. His whole force is still after me. His force is about 5,000 strong, and are now in ambush at the old cattle trail up the mountain. As I had led the citizens to believe I was going, I started up the mountain by the way of Poplar Cove at night and I got to this point at 4 a. m. There was not a particle of subsistence or forage near here. Will make my headquarters, according to instructions, as near here as practicable where I can subsist.

At crossing of Cumberland the enemy routed Colonels Scott's and Starnes' cavalry. My pickets heard the firing, and I took my command to the rear to assist him, but they had gone and the enemy in full pursuit. I made a very narrow escape from being cut off. Olift's forces, or rather a portion of his command, are acting with this Federal force, as are all the bushwhackers that are left. I have thinned them in Fentress, Clinton, and Wayne Counties, and trust soon to exterminate them all.

I have the honor, general, with much regard, to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

JAMES R. HOWARD,
Colonel, Commanding Cavalry, C. S. Army.

General E. KIRBY SMITH.

OCTOBER 15-20, 1862.—Operations against guerrillas in the counties of Henry, Owen, and Gallatin, Ky.

No. 1.

Report of Col. Orlando H. Moore, Twenty-fifth Michigan Infantry.

HEADQUARTERS TWENTY-FIFTH MICHIGAN INFANTRY,
Louisville, October 22, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to report that in compliance with orders I moved with seven companies of my command on the morning of the 15th instant, and in consequence of railroad detention did not arrive at Eminence until 10 o'clock a. m. Captain Gore furnished a detachment of 8 men, under command of Lieutenant Armstrong, to act as scouts, and we proceeded to Bethlehem; were re-enforced by Captain Sewell with 8 or 10 men, and then marched to Gratz, on the Kentucky River, in the night, where we expected to attack a force of the enemy by daybreak reported in that vicinity. When we arrived the enemy had fled, and we proceeded to Owenton; found a guerrilla force, which fled on the first appearance of our advance guard. In the night I sent a detachment of soldiers mounted to Monterey, where they surprised and took prisoners 5 rebel soldiers of the First Florida Cavalry, together with their horses and equipments. Three of them were paroled in consequence of ill-health. On Saturday, 18th instant, I proceeded with two companies of infantry and 15 infantry soldiers mounted to attack a band of guerrillas in the hills, who proved as ambitious to get out of our way as we were to pursue and attack. That same night we captured a rebel soldier in the hills and took into custody 5 rebel soldiers. We arrested and paroled many rebels in and about Owenton.

On Monday, the 20th instant, we marched to Warsaw, on the Ohio River, where steamboat transportation was in waiting for the command; but owing to a report of a large rebel force having arrived in that vicinity to attack us, we waited until the next morning before embarking on board the boat. We kept the towns we occupied under strong guard and dispersed or arrested all parties after 10 o'clock at night. Our efforts in dispersing rebels in the counties of Henry, Owen, and Gallatin were successful, but the Union inhabitants are apprehensive of future depredations and annoyance from rebels and guerrilla parties in the absence of troops.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ORLANDO H. MOORE,
Colonel Twenty-fifth Michigan Infantry.

Capt. N. C. SEMPLE, A. A. G., Louisville, Ky.

OCTOBER 16-25, 1862.—Operations in Bath, Powell, Estill, Clark, Montgomery, and Bourbon Counties, Kentucky.

Report of W. H. Wadsworth.

MAYSVILLE, KY., October 29, 1862.

GENERAL: I arrived here yesterday evening from Mount Sterling, having left there Monday night last at 9 o'clock.

On Thursday, the 16th of this month, I left this place with 381 men, recruited for the Fourteenth Kentucky Cavalry, all but 70 unmounted, and one piece of artillery, an iron 6-pounder, the property of citizens of this place, and in charge of a volunteer squad of citizens under Mr. Gilmore.

We reached Sharpsburg, 11 miles from Mount Sterling, Friday evening, and there learned that Humphrey Marshall, with 6,000 men, fifteen pieces of artillery, and a train of 200 wagons, was at Ticktown, 7 miles from Mount Sterling, on the Hazle Green road, in full retreat. He had come from Camp Dick Robinson through Richmond, Red River Iron Works, &c., to that place.

Saturday morning early I marched to Mount Sterling and captured 17 of Marshall's men in the town. I immediately pushed out my small squad of horsemen with some mounted Lewis County and Fleming County Home Guards, under Jeff. Walker and Isaac Keely, and a few citizens of Montgomery, Bath, and Clark, on the Ticktown road. These brave men drove up Marshall's stragglers and captured altogether 49 almost in sight of his headquarters.

Learning Saturday night that 900 rebel horsemen, under Trigg and Camron, were at Owingsville, 15 miles on my left, and that John H. Morgan had captured Lexington that morning, and having received a letter from Major Bracht from Paris, dated Friday, saying he had but 125 men there and could not help me harass the retreat of Marshall, I fell back with my command and prisoners to Paris; there I telegraphed you Monday for help. You ordered Colonel Wisner, of the Twenty-second Michigan, to go with me at once to Mount Sterling, and we started off that night, our forces consisting of that regiment and one section of artillery, my lads, and one piece and two companies of the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry, under Major Doniphan. We reached Mount Sterling Tuesday evening. Next morning, under orders from Colonel Wisner, I took all the mounted men in camp that could be spared, 210 in number, and scouted the country for 80 miles through Bath, Powell, Estill, and Clark, capturing a number of prisoners, horses, and arms.

As I was returning from Winchester on Friday afternoon to Mount Sterling I met Colonel Wisner, with all his forces, marching toward Winchester and thence to Lexington. He was ordered to proceed cautiously by General G. C. Smith, as he had learned there was a large body of rebels there. These rebels (7 white men and 1 negro) had captured a picket of some 140 horsemen, sent to Winchester by General Smith the Tuesday before; whereupon the horsemen went back to Paris and made that report, I presume. These 7 whites and 1 negro I came on at Red River; captured 5 and shot 1, and that was all the rebel force in 30 miles of Winchester.

I went on to Mount Sterling again to endeavor to protect my district with 382 recruits, not in the service of the United States, against Humphrey Marshall's horsemen. Marshall, with his train and artillery, and such of his infantry as did not desert, has easily escaped, without any pursuit except such as I have detailed, through Prestonburg and on his way to Abingdon, Va. I should say 1,000 or 1,200 of his men had deserted him. I captured 150 and 50 horses, besides muskets, pistols, &c. His horsemen remain behind in Kentucky to plunder and ruin the people. On Saturday I heard of 600 under Witcher and 400 under Camron in Morgan and Bath Counties, and 150 in Powell, beyond Staunton, under Gay, Bradshaw, and other thugs, murdering, plundering, and burning.

General, my district has sent six infantry regiments to the Federal Army, and in addition the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry was principally raised in that district. The Government has never sent us the least assistance except the Twenty-second Michigan, ordered away before it could serve us an hour. After our whole State was evacuated, except Covington and Louisville, you ordered away the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry from this place, just raised and mounted hereabouts, and left us naked to bands of mounted rebels. These bands yonder around and beyond Mount Sterling still ruin the people. Smith, Bragg, and Marshall retreat beyond pursuit and no help comes.

Unless you order a force of mounted men, supported by some infantry, to clear out the region beyond Mount Sterling and Owingsville all this part of the State will be infested and plundered all fall and winter.

I find here Colonel Lucy and part of the One hundred and fifteenth Ohio. There are 400 cavalry at Ripley. The balance of the One hundred and fifteenth is at Cincinnati. Colonel Lucy is anxious to go on this duty. We have no use for a soldier at this point now, not one. I beg you will send him with these forces at once to Mount Sterling, with orders to clear away these rebel robbers. I do hope you will also support him with some of the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry or some other mounted force. They should also have some pieces of mountain howitzers. Troops at Mount Sterling, Owingsville, and West Liberty will protect and relieve a third of this State.

General, if you could see my ruined people and their desolate homes you would move up the brigades under your command and excuse the feeling I show in their behalf. I have done all I could for them without help from State or nation, and will not give it up. The President has shown himself friendly toward me, and I will beg him for protection against the damned villains.

Respectfully, your obedient, &c.,

W. H. WADSWORTH.

No. 1.

Report of Maj. Gen. Horatio G. Wright, U. S. Army, commanding Department of the Ohio.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 19, 1862—12.5 a. m.

John Morgan took Lexington yesterday morning (18th) and captured some of the Fourth Ohio Cavalry (report says 500 strong). General Granger's command is moving in two columns, one by the Lexington pike, and is to-night not far from Big Eagle; the other by the road near the railroad, and has one regiment of infantry, 300 cavalry, and a section of artillery at Paris; two regiments at Cynthiana, and the rest at Falmouth. Both columns are being pushed forward as fast as transportation will permit, and the division you suggest will be in Lexington as soon as it can be got there. Remember they are all raw troops. Bridge at Cynthiana and Paris safe. Falmouth Bridge completed by Tuesday night.

No. 2.

Report of Maj. Charles B. Seidel, Third Ohio Cavalry, of skirmish near Lexington.

DANVILLE, October 19, 1862.

SIR: In compliance to orders I received from your headquarters to go to Camp Dick Robinson and take charge of the provisions left there by the rebel forces I left camp on the 16th of October at 2 p. m. and arrived at Camp Dick Robinson at 5 p. m., finding Colonel Hoskins in charge of those stores, consisting of 2,600 barrels of pork and 2,000 bushels of wheat. Went into camp at Dick Robinson with intention to return the following morning to Danville. At 11 o'clock of same night I received a message from Colonel Hoskins of the approach of General Morgan with 500 men strong toward Hickman Bridge with intention to burn said bridge, and recommending one battalion of my forces to be immediately dispatched to Hickman Bridge to prevent it from being burned by General Morgan's forces. This I complied with, by sending one battalion of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry under command of Captain Robie.

The next morning (October 17) at 5 o'clock I started with the balance of my command, consisting of one battalion Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, to join Captain Robie at said bridge. On my arrival here I learned that Captain Gotwald, commanding four companies of Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, had left Nicholasville for Lexington to drive a portion of Morgan's cavalry forces from that vicinity to prevent their pillage and burning of bridges. I then, knowing that Captain Gotwald could not accomplish his object with the force under his command, went with all the force under my command, numbering in all 260 men, to re-enforce him, which I accomplished by 3 o'clock of same day. Finding Captain Gotwald with his force stationed in town, I then went into camp $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Lexington on the Richmond pike.

At 1 o'clock the same night two citizens living about 7 miles from Lexington came in with the following statement, viz: Morgan's forces of about 500 or 600 men were advancing on the Richmond pike. I immediately sent out a scouting party of 22 men, under command of Lieutenant Hall, Company K, Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, to procure all possible information. At about 3 o'clock 1 corporal and 2 privates returned with 2 rebel prisoners in charge, captured about 5 miles from Lexington on the Richmond pike. The balance of the scouting party marched on. On questioning said prisoners I became satisfied that a heavy force was coming upon us. I therefore called out my command immediately and formed in line, when we were attacked by General Morgan's forces of about 3,000 strong and six pieces of artillery pouring in most deadly volleys of musketry and grape on all sides. My command most manfully and gallantly returned their fire and fought them hand to hand until overpowered by an overwhelming force, when we were compelled to surrender. Our loss was 4 killed and 24 wounded.

The loss of the enemy I was unable to ascertain, but saw 3 wagons of killed and wounded leave the battle ground. Major Morgan, of General Morgan's cavalry, was mortally wounded. The scouting party have not been heard from. As a large rebel force left the scene of action in pursuit of them fears are entertained that all have been captured.

Much credit is due to Captain Robie, of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, for his cool and gallant behavior during the fight. Capt. P. H. Warner, Company D; Lieut. H. Hamilton, Company A, and Lieut. W. E. Crane, Company C, [Fourth] Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, having left the command on the evening previous without permission and remained in town all night, and have not reported themselves yet.

The greatest credit is due to all officers and men.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. B. SEIDEL,

Major, Commanding Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

Colonel ZAHM.

[Indorsement.]

Respectfully forwarded, with the addition that the four companies of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry stationed at Lexington, under command of Captain Gotwald, have surrendered likewise. Have had no official reports from him.

November 17, 1862.

COLONEL: I herewith inclose reports of Brigadier-General Smith, of Brigadier-General Cruft, of Colonel Enyart, of Colonel Hanson, and of Lieutenant-Colonel Spencer of the destruction of the Goose Creek Salt-Works, in obedience to the order of Major-General Buell. These reports are exceedingly intelligent and complete, and do great credit to the authors of them.

I commend this matter to the prompt attention of the general commanding, and earnestly and urgently entreat that some plan be adopted to afford prompt and adequate compensation to the good and loyal citizens who have suffered.

Report of Brig. Gen. William Sooy Smith, U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS FOURTH DIVISION,
Silver Spring, Tenn., November 16, 1862.

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 21st ultimo, a copy of which is hereto appended, marked A, I directed the Twenty-second Brigade, Brig. Gen. Charles Cruft commanding, to proceed to the Goose Creek Salt-Works and destroy them. This was as fully done as the time allowed by subsequent orders, directing the return of the brigade, would permit. The manner in which it was accomplished and the extent of the damage done are fully set forth in the accompanying reports of General Cruft and the board of officers appointed by him to look to the destruction of the works and to report their action in full. The want of familiarity with salt manufacture experienced by the officers constituting this board has deterred them from fixing any money value upon the damages done, present and prospective; and I concur in the recommendation contained in General Cruft's report that a competent commission be appointed immediately to take the necessary testimony and assess the damages.

The Salt-Works are situated in the midst of a population whose loyalty and patriotism are not excelled in any portion of our country. Much suffering must result to the poor people of the surrounding region from lack of the salt they have heretofore obtained at the works destroyed, and the length of time during which the proprietors should be required to suspend operations, leaving the works in their present crippled condition, is a matter that deserves careful consideration. This, of course, will depend very much upon the plan of the campaign and the movements of the United States troops in Southeastern Kentucky, and hence no direction could be given except that the manufacture of salt should be discontinued until further orders.

The noble conduct of some of those interested in the works, especially of Mrs. Garrard, who expressed her entire willingness that not only that valuable property, but all else that she and her husband (a colonel in our service) owned, might be destroyed if such destruction would help to restore the Union, constrains an earnest recommendation that prompt restitution be made for the damage done.

HDQRS. TWENTY-SECOND BRIGADE, FOURTH DIVISION,

Rockcastle Ford, October 25, 1862.

CAPTAIN: On the morning of the 22d instant, in pursuance of a written order from Brigadier-General Smith, commanding division (a copy of which is hereto attached,*) I marched this brigade from camp at Mershon's Cross-Roads to the Salt-Works, five in number, situated upon Goose Creek (see plat hereto appended), near Manchester, Ky., a distance of 26 miles.

On the 23d and 24th instant these Salt-Works were so far destroyed as to render them ineffective for the future manufacture of salt, without the lapse of considerable time, large expense, and most probably the boring of new wells. The manufactured salt on hand at the various works was destroyed as effectually as possible. The manner in which the works and salt were destroyed is set forth in the written report of Colonel Enyart (First Kentucky Volunteers), Lieutenant-Colonel Hanson (Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers), and Lieutenant-Colonel Spencer (Second Kentucky Volunteers), acting as a commission under Special Orders, No. 3, from headquarters of this brigade. A copy of this report and the special order on which it is based are hereto appended.†

The time allowed me (by subsequent communication from General Smith) for the destruction of the works was too limited to thoroughly complete the job. Over 1,000 men were worked in details for one night and a day and a half in handling the salt and dismantling the works.

I recommend that a special commission or commissioners be appointed by the Government of the United States to repair to the works and take evidence as to the quantity and price of the salt destroyed, the permanent damage to the works, and the amount of any remote or consequential damage that may ensue to the owners or lessees from the stoppage of their manufactories. This appears to be the only proper means to do even-handed justice between the parties interested and the Government.

In regard to the propriety of the destruction of these works as a military necessity, a matter that is, I am aware, the special province of my superiors to decide, I may still be pardoned to remark that everything conspired to show its wisdom. An army sufficient to protect them could not be subsisted from the country in the vicinity of the works. The condition of the mountain roads and the usual severity of the winter thereabouts would have rendered it nearly impossible to supply rations by hauling from the rear. At least as a matter of economy the destruction of the works seemed a wise movement. The Confederates had carried away not exceeding perhaps from 3,500 to 4,000 bushels of manufactured salt, but every circumstance led to the belief that the quantity on hand would have been shortly taken, as soon as their means of transportation would permit, and that the leaders of the rebellion calculated on their supply of salt to come from these works. In addition to the destruction of the Salt-Works my expedition to Manchester threatened a body of 2,100 Confederate cavalry lying in camp at Paine's farm, 12 miles beyond the town, in direction of Cumberland Gap; so much so that it broke camp and left in great confusion during the night of my arrival. The country about the Salt-Works was thoroughly patrolled and reconnoitered. Fifty-six straggling prisoners were captured and sent back to the cross-roads and there paroled. There were 35 beef cattle captured from the enemy, which were driven in and used to subsist my command. There is a considerable amount of Government property scattered about in the hands of the citizens in vicinity of the Salt-Works. As many as 20 or 30 Government wagons, only slightly injured by fire, were seen by my patrols, and the number of such could have been increased to one hundred and more (if the statement of apparently credible men could be relied on) in that neighborhood. Government harness, mules, horses, and boots of various kinds were heard of constantly. This property was a portion of trains partially destroyed and abandoned by General Morgan (U. S. Volunteers) on his retreat from Cumberland Gap. I had no time to hunt up the property and no means to transport it away, and can simply make report of it as being there. While at the Salt-Works and en route there many of the members of Home Guard associations had interviews with me, and were stimulated to watch the mountain roads and tracks for stragglers and to complete and render effective their associations. At the time of my leaving they had already begun to spread terror among stragglers and to make it dangerous for small bodies of the enemy's cavalry to attempt incursions into their neighborhoods. The people in the mountain districts in direction of Manchester are loyal and true to the Government. They have been robbed by the rebel army of nearly all of their available personal property—cattle, horses, and crops—and are left generally in a destitute condition.

I am, captain, very truly, yours, &c.,

CHARLES CRUFT,

SPECIAL ORDERS, } HDQRS. TWENTY-SECOND BRIGADE,
No. 3. } Goose Creek Salt-Works, Ky., October 23, 1862.

Colonel Enyart, First Kentucky Volunteers; Lieutenant-Colonel Hanson, Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers, and Lieutenant-Colonel Spencer, Second Kentucky Volunteers, are hereby appointed a board to destroy the Salt-Works near Manchester, Ky., and the manufactured salt on hand as speedily as practicable. They will take such measures as will most effectively destroy the works and prevent the future manufacture of salt and prevent that on hand from falling into the hands of the enemy. For this purpose they will use the force of their own commands as may be necessary, but if insufficient, details will be made from other regiments of this brigade.

They will make a full report in writing to these headquarters of their action under this order.

By order of Brigadier-General Cruft:

W. H. FAIRBANKS,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General.

No. 4.

Report of the Board of Officers.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST KENTUCKY VOLUNTEERS,
Camp near Columbia, Ky., November 1, 1862.

CAPTAIN: In obedience to Special Orders, No. —, that issued from the headquarters of the Twenty-second Brigade of the Army of the Ohio on the 23d day of October last (a copy of which order is here inclosed), directing the undersigned to destroy the Salt-Works near Manchester, Ky., including the product on hand, and to report to you our proceedings under said order, availing ourselves of the first opportunity, we tender the following statement of what we did in carrying out said order:

The works, consisting of five in number, are situated and are owned and occupied as follows:

The first, owned and occupied by Col. T. T. Garrard, is situated about 2 miles from Manchester, on the main fork of Goose Creek. The second, third, and fourth are situated on Collins' Fork of that creek, within 3 miles of Manchester, and are owned and occupied as follows: The second one, by Mrs. J. T. Woodward and her daughter, Mrs. Mollie Shackelford, and rented by James W. Reid for the years 1862 and 1863, and were occupied by him. The third, owned by A. T. White, Michael Horton, and Daniel Gara, sr. The fourth, owned by Alexander White and Mrs. J. T. Woodward and her daughter, Mrs. Mollie Shackelford, and was occupied by Stephen Gibson and A. Chastain. The fifth works, owned and occupied by J. and D. White, situated on the east fork of Goose Creek, 5 miles from Manchester.

These works were furnished with water from bored wells from 500 to 600 feet deep, and were in complete order and full operation, making from 50 to 100 bushels of salt a day each.

We proceeded to render these works useless and unfit for service by destroying the pumps and wells and the pipes conveying the water also. In each case the pumps, or portions of them where they all could not be gotten out, were taken out of the wells, broken to pieces, and the pieces forced back into the wells into and upon the pipes; and in the case of those of White, Horton, and Gara a piece of iron grate was driven into that portion of the pump which could not be gotten out of the well; and in the case of Chastain and Gibson an iron bar was forced down into the well and into the well pipe, and 300 feet of the surface pipe and all the wood work of the pans were destroyed. The pumps used by J. and D. White, except small portions of them, could not be drawn out of the well. Therefore, after forcing back into the well portions of the pump, we forced into them cannon balls and in that way rendered the wells useless. We also destroyed the scaffolding and a large portion of the wood work of the pans and all the surface pipe.

We found at all these works large quantities of salt. The amount at the several works, in our judgment, from a hasty examination, without the means of measuring it, and from the statements of the persons using them respectively, were about as follows :

At Works No. 1 (Garrard), 5,840 bushels; at Works No. 2 (Reid), 5,000 bushels; at Works No. 3 (White, Horton and Gara), 2,000 bushels; at Works No. 4 (Gibson and Chastain), 8,000 bushels; at Works No. 5 (J. and D. White), 9,000 bushels.

This estimate of the salt may be very inaccurate. We had no experience in estimating salt, and had to guess at it and take the statement of the parties interested and such persons as happened to be present. The true amount can be obtained when necessary from the testimony of those experienced in such matters and familiar with the works and competent to judge of such matters.

By the verbal permission of Brigadier-General Cruft we permitted the loyal citizens around and in the neighborhood of the works to remove enough salt to supply the neighborhood and country around, binding them by oath not to permit any of it to go to the benefit of the Southern Confederacy. This privilege was necessary in order to prevent great suffering among the citizens. In this way a considerable quantity of salt was appropriated, and the remainder we destroyed by turning the water from the cisterns upon it and as far as practicable throwing the remainder into the pools and streams of water convenient.

This destruction of these works and their products was not as complete as we desired, but was as thorough as practicable, considering the time allowed and the want of facilities for doing the work. We worked 500 men—as many as could be employed at it—continuously for thirty-six hours, doing in that time a vast deal of work. The wells and pumps upon which the works depended for supplies of water to manufacture the salt, although not entirely destroyed, were rendered useless and totally unfit for service and the most of them damaged beyond repair, and if any of them can be repaired it will be at nearly as heavy an expense of time and labor as boring a new well.

The salt was so effectually appropriated by the neighbors and destroyed and scattered as stated that no considerable amount of it can ever fall into the hands of the enemies of the country.

The buildings and other machinery not referred to were very common and of little value and could have been easily replaced if destroyed, and having no way of effectually destroying them, and believing that the works were already rendered useless for making salt, and, further, not being willing to commit any wanton waste of private property, they were all left untouched as we found them.

We regret delay in sending in this report, but owing to having been constantly engaged in heavy marches we could not present it at an earlier hour.

Very respectfully submitted.

D. A. ENYART,

Colonel First Kentucky Regiment.

CHARLES S. HANSON,

Lieutenant-Colonel Twentieth Kentucky Regiment.

OCTOBER 8, 1862.—Battle of Perryville, or Chaplin Hills, Ky.

Report of Col. John C. Starkweather, First Wisconsin Infantry, commanding Twenty-eighth Brigade, Third Division.

ON BATTLE-FIELD,
Chaplin Hills, October 11, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the Twenty-eighth Brigade, composed of the Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Twenty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, First and Twenty-first Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, commanded, respectively, by Col. H. A. Hambright, Captain [August] Mauff (Colonel Mihalotzy being absent, sick), Lieut. Col. George B. Bingham, and Col. Benjamin J. Sweet; First Kentucky Artillery, Capt. D. C. Stone, and Fourth Indiana Artillery, Capt. A. K. Bush, left Maxville [Mackville], under orders, on the 8th instant, the Twenty-first Wisconsin marching in the rear as guard to the division ammunition train, the Seventeenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, Col. John H. McHenry, jr., having been sent to Springfield as guard to division supply train, and arrived on the field of battle at about 1.30 p. m., having marched 12 miles, about 3 miles thereof being through fields, woods, &c. Finding the troops already engaged well on the right, center, and left, and thinking the extreme left position most accessible, and, from appearances, one that should be held at all hazards, I placed my command at once in position facing the enemy's right (countermarching a portion of my brigade for such purpose), the Twenty-fourth Illinois and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania forming the right wing, to be supported by the First Wisconsin and Twenty-first Wisconsin, when the last-mentioned regiment should arrive, and holding my two batteries to act as the disposition of the enemy might require. General [D. S.] Donelson's brigade at this moment engaged the Twenty-fourth Illinois and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania on the right, but were driven from the field, after most desperate fighting. While this engagement was progressing, I placed, by your order, Bush's battery on the extreme left, Stone's battery next on its right, the First Wisconsin to the rear of Bush, to support him, and the Twenty-first Wisconsin, which had arrived (excepting two companies acting as flankers to the ammunition train), to the front of the two batteries, in a corn-field at the foot of the hill, upon which artillery was placed, forming it at once in line of battle. This disposition of my forces was hardly complete before General Maney's brigade attacked me in front, assisted by a battery, and General Donelson's brigade again attacked on the extreme right, the enemy at the same time placing a battery on my extreme left, upon a well-chosen position, to flank me. The flank movement on the left was prevented by Stone's battery shelling the position chosen, and Donelson's brigade was again forced to retire by the well-directed and continuous fire of the Twenty-fourth Illinois and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania. I then ordered the Twenty-first Wisconsin to fire and charge the front, but, being a new regiment, their colonel being severely wounded and their major killed at about the time such order was given, no field officer was left to carry the command into execution, although several companies, hearing the order, attempted to obey it, but being sorely pressed by the brigade and battery in front, it retired in some disorder and confusion. I immediately advanced the First Wisconsin to the front, supported by an oblique fire from the Seventy-ninth and with canister from my artillery, and held such position until many of the artillery horses were killed and the balance became unmanageable, creating such confusion that proper discharges could not be continued. Other regiments on my right at this time were retiring, and being unable to obtain any support from them, I ordered the Seventy-ninth, Twenty-fourth, and First to hold their positions, while Stone's battery, of four guns, and Bush's battery, of two (all that was manageable), were retired to a new and safer position. The retirement was made in good order, and the fire from the artillery again opened. A part of the First Wisconsin then charged to the front, capturing the colors of the First Tennessee. The fire from the Seventy-ninth and Twenty-fourth held the enemy in check, while the balance of the First Wisconsin took by hand every remaining gun and caisson from the field. The enemy by this time was completely routed, the firing ceased on our front and flank, and the regiments were retired to the support of the batteries in their new position, which was occupied until 12 o'clock at night, when a change was made by your order.

My loss in officers and men was terrible indeed.

Where all did so nobly and well, one cannot be mentioned without doing injustice to others; but I must acknowledge the great service rendered me by my staff officers, Lieutenants Franklin, Searles, and Bingham, in carrying orders to and fro in the midst of the terrible fire surrounding them.

Trusting that the brigade will receive at your hands the proper mention which it deserves for its bravery, good conduct, and magnificent fighting, I subscribe myself, yours, to command,

JOHN C. STARKWEATHER,

Colonel First Wisconsin, Commanding Twenty-eighth Brigade.

Capt. W. P. McDOWELL,

Assistant Adjutant-General, Third Division.

Report of Lieut. William B. Turner, Smith's (Mississippi) Battery.

IN CAMP NEAR BRYANTSVILLE,

October 12, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, on the afternoon of the 8th instant, while accompanying the Third Brigade, which was advancing on the enemy, I received orders from General Maney, through Lieutenant [James M.] Keeble, to halt on the ascent of the hill, which the brigade had ascended, and immediately afterward I received orders from General Maney, through Captain [E.] Cockrill, to advance. I had not reached the top of the hill, when orders were brought to me from General Cheatham, by Capt. M. Smith, chief of artillery, to advance rapidly, and was conducted by the latter to a position on the hill to the extreme right, and overlooking the enemy, who was then in a fighting attitude before our forces. I immediately opened an enfilading fire on them, at the distance of 250 or 300 yards, with canister, and continued it with shell and spherical case as the enemy retired. This continued until our forces had so far advanced as to be between our battery and the enemy's infantry, when we commenced replying to a battery of the enemy, which had annoyed us considerably, opening upon us with guns of heavier caliber than ours as soon as we commenced our firing. I continued this until I received orders from General Cheatham to cease firing, and our infantry advanced and took the battery opposing us. I then advanced the battery to a position farther to the front, to open on a battery which was firing on Captain Carnes' battery, when I received orders from General Cheatham to withdraw my battery to the rear.

After night, I received orders from Capt. M. Smith to send my horses and limbers to the front, and withdraw some of the enemy's guns which had been captured, the enemy having taken off most of their limbers with their horses. I brought off all I could find (excepting two caissons, which were disabled), amounting to five 12-pounder Napoleon guns (brass), one 12-pounder howitzer gun (brass), and one 6-pounder Parrott gun (steel), with two limbers and two caissons, without limbers, filled with ammunition for the Napoleon guns. During the night, I exchanged my two 6-pounder guns for two of the Napoleon guns, together with the ammunition, and the next morning, on our leaving for Harrodsburg, my men, by order of Capt. M. Smith, dismantled the guns which we were unable to take with us.

Our casualties consisted of 4 men wounded and 1 missing, and 1 horse killed and 3 wounded.

I take pleasure in bearing testimony to the zeal and gallantry displayed by the officers and men of the battery on the occasion.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. TURNER,
First Lieutenant, Commanding Battery.

Capt. T. H. MALONE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Report of Brig. Gen. St. John R. Liddell, C. S. Army, commanding First Brigade, Third Division.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE, THIRD DIVISION,
Knoxville, Tenn., October 24, 1862.

COLONEL: In obedience to the order of Major-General Hardee, on the morning of the 7th instant, I placed my brigade 1 mile in advance of our lines, on the right of the Springfield road leading from Perryville, on the crest of a hill, covered with some open woods, with ground rapidly sloping to the front and facing a skirt of woods on the opposite hill, beyond which the enemy were actively engaged with Colonel Wheeler's cavalry, and at the same time taking position. The interval between the woodlands of these hills was hardly exceeding 200 yards, with a small corn-field next to the road opposite my left and open ground on my right. At the base of the hills was a dry bed of a branch of Doctor's Fork. During the day the cavalry were skirmishing with the enemy, and the shells fell constantly within and beyond my lines.

Perceiving the necessity of holding the woodland in front, to make my own position tenable, I threw forward, as skirmishers, the Seventh Arkansas Regiment, then under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel [Peter] Snyder, who occupied the position in my advance with but little interruption for the rest of the day and the night following. At nightfall Colonel Wheeler fell back on the road past my lines, after contesting his ground most obstinately until dusk. As my left flank rested on the Springfield road, all on that side, having no support, was exposed to a flank movement of the enemy; but feeling satisfied that he must be in need of water, and that he would push for that point whence it could be obtained from pools lower down on Doctor's Fork, on my right, I separated my battery, and placed one section on a high hill on my right, commanding the woods opposite and open valley below. The other section I retained in advance of my left, as it commanded the field before us, and, to some extent, the fields to the left of the Springfield road. Early on the following morning (8th instant), the enemy began a brisk fire upon my advanced line of skirmishers, and with superior numbers drove them from the woods. Colonel [D. A.] Gillespie having assumed command of his regiment, the Seventh Arkansas, I directed him to try to regain the position; and for that purpose I ordered forward the second line of skirmishers, Fifth Arkansas Regiment, Colonel [L.] Featherston commanding, with Lieutenant-Colonel [John E.] Murray and Major [P. V.] Green, of the same, gallantly assisting. The attempt was promptly and cheerfully made, but the force of the enemy had been increased so largely and suddenly as to force back both lines, the officers and men contesting the ground with resolute determination, unwilling to yield it to even the great odds against them. Whilst this was going on, the enemy pushed a regiment of cavalry around the point of woods and down the valley of Doctor's Fork in front of my right, against which I had directed a few shots from the section of artillery on the hill, causing it to retire under cover of the woods in great confusion. Both sections of artillery now began firing upon the moving lines in the woods from which my skirmishers had been driven, whilst, with rapidly increasing numbers, the enemy was fast nearing my line of battle. All this time his artillery was assuming new positions, and throwing grape and shell among us from many points. Fearing the effect upon my artillery, the sharpshooters now getting in close proximity, I ordered both sections to withdraw from their advanced position, and to unite upon the right of my line of battle. This was done with the loss of but one horse, and I now became interested in getting in my skirmishers, when an order came to me from Major-General Buckner to withdraw my brigade in good order to the rear. This was done without confusion across the Chaplin Fork, about 11 a. m. In this morning occurred my principal loss, being chiefly confined to the lines of skirmishers, of which the Fifth Arkansas suffered most. In this action Captain [H. W.] Robinson, of the Fifth, fell, bravely doing his duty. The gallantry of officers and men was conspicuous, rendering comment superfluous. The loss of the enemy must have been great, as they were exposed in double lines to a well-directed fire from both sections of artillery at short range, as well as the heavy firing of the Seventh and Fifth Regiments as skirmishers. I was now ordered to hold my command in reserve, and for that purpose was directed by Major-General Buckner to recross the Chaplin Fork at a point some half a mile lower down, and take position on an eminence about 1 mile from the field of battle and nearly in rear of the center. Whilst in this place a shell from the enemy's extreme left fatally wounded Adjutant [S.] Harris and a private of the Sixth Arkansas. The fight was going on vigorously in our front and on the right of the advanced position I held in the morning, and almost at right angles to it. About 5 p. m. I received an order from Major-General Hardee to move forward to the crest of the hills surrounding, amphitheater-like, the field of battle, where the action was progressing in full view in the valley and on the lower ranges of hills below us. While here, a shell fell in the ranks of the Second and Eighth Arkansas Regiments, disabling 6 privates in the former and killing 1 in the latter. About 5.30 p. m., Colonel [S. H.] Perkins, of General Hardee's staff, directed me to follow him with my brigade to the valley, and after reaching Doctor's Fork said to me, "General Hardee wishes you now to move upon the enemy where the firing is hottest." Some latitude being here given me, which was fully appreciated, I thought proper to continue my movement toward the enemy's extreme left, as indicated by the heavy firing apparently moving in that direction on the Nashville road. As soon as I had reached the place where I desired to form my line of battle, I moved forward at once. Here I met with Major-General Cheatham, who urged me anxiously to push on and relieve his troops from the heavy pressure upon them. In pressing on, I caused the battery to open fire from high points upon the enemy beyond our lines as chance offered. After passing through and overlapping the right of Major-General Cheatham's lines, I soon found myself in the immediate presence of the enemy. I commenced firing. It being twilight, however, with a bright full moon shining, and dress not clearly distinguishable, my men mistook the enemy for friends; at the same time the cry came from the enemy's lines, "You are killing your friends," which serving to strengthen the impression, I gave the signal to cease firing, intending to push up the line; but at this moment Major-General Polk, who had joined me a few moments before, ordered the ranks to be opened for him to pass, and riding hastily up to the lines in front of us, distant not more than 25 paces, quickly returned, exclaiming, "They are enemies; fire upon them." Heavy volleys were at once rapidly poured into this mass of men, and after the lapse of some ten minutes I again ordered the firing to cease, and when the smoke had cleared away nothing was visible of the enemy but their wounded, dying, and dead. It was at this place that the brave young Captain [W. H.] Grissom, of the Second Arkansas, fell, regretted by all the command. I now forthwith ordered my battery to the top of the hill, in advance of our forces, and placed it in position to fire upon the woods, some 200 yards distant and directly opposite. When I felt satisfied that the enemy had hastily retired in confusion, I was about to recommence firing, fully intending to follow up without delay our success, when General Polk ordered me to desist, and to keep my command near by to await further instructions. Meanwhile some skirmishers, pushing forward to the edge of these woods, reported a battery of the enemy there, under protection of some cavalry; but my orders to remain stationary being imperative, I could do nothing toward its capture, and in a short time it was heard rapidly moving away. My time was now taken up in receiving and disposing of the prisoners who were being constantly brought in. Two fine ambulances, now in possession of General Bragg, were captured by the Second Arkansas Regiment and by the battery, one of which contained the personal baggage of General McCook; the other was supposed to belong to General Rosecrans, both of which officers were reported by the prisoners to have been near by at the close of the action. Two flags are now in my possession, taken by the Second Arkansas Regiment. Two others were taken by this regiment and one by the Sixth, but, not being valued by the captors, were torn to pieces, and the fragments retained as trophies of the day's work. The fields and woods in front and around us on every side were strewn with the enemy's dead and wounded; their loss could hardly have been less than 500 killed and wounded in the space of four to five acres. My own wounded having been cared for, I directed a detail to assist the infirmiry corps in removing the wounded of the enemy to a white house not far off on our left, which was soon filled with them, leaving large numbers unprovided for. Though this occupied our attention up to the moment of leaving, I also ordered the arms to be collected; but after attempting to get together those immediately around the position occupied by my battery, and finding the task greater than I expected, I ordered the men to desist, and to take some rest. There must have been several thousand stand lying closely around us. This place seemed to have been selected by the commanding general of the enemy, as it overlooked the field from his side, and was easily accessible to his reserves from the Springfield and Mackville roads, to be thrown on any desired part during the action. This, possibly, may account for the accumulation of the dead and arms at this place. I held my place here, as ordered by General Polk, until about midnight, when I withdrew my command, by order of Major-General Buckner, beyond the Chaplin Fork, in our rear. This was done in silence, with manifest surprise and regret by the whole command. Colonel [John H.] Kelly, of the Sixth [Eighth] Arkansas, personally captured Colonel Goode, of the Twenty-third Indiana [Colonel Gooding, Twenty-second Indiana], commanding brigade. This regiment was said to have caused great havoc in Arkansas, and it seems as if retributive justice had at last been meted out to it by the very men most injured by it. I take the greatest pleasure in stating that not a single instance of lack of gallantry amongst officers or privates came under my personal observation throughout the day; on the contrary, all were fearless in doing their duty, and obeyed orders with alacrity. Captain [George A.] Williams, adjutant-general; Lieutenant [J. L.] Bostick, aide-de-camp, and Lieutenant [J. M.] Dulin, brigade inspector, cheerfully and fearlessly assisted me in the conveyance of all necessary instructions, regardless of all exposure. In forming my line of battle, just before passing through General Cheatham's lines, I discovered that Colonel Kelly's regiment, Sixth [Eighth] Arkansas, which held the left wing, was not in its place. I forthwith sent my aide-de-camp, Lieutenant Bostick, to look after it, and in his absence the adjutant of his regiment reported to me, by order of his colonel, that Major [W. K.] Beard, of General Bragg's staff, some distance back, had ordered the regiment detached, and moved directly forward. Having no time to lose, I moved on in line of battle without it, and, on reaching the front of the enemy, I was gratified to find that the colonel had, by a rapid right-oblique movement, rejoined the brigade at the very time needed. I afterward understood that the order was intended for the whole brigade, but luckily it did not reach me, as its execution would not have enabled me to flank the enemy, and results not so fortunate might have followed. In the entire day's work, the total loss of my brigade, in killed, wounded, and missing, was 71. For names and particulars, I refer to adjutant-general's report.

I humbly thank God for our preservation, and that we have been the means in His hands of destroying so many of the enemies of our country with so little fatality to ourselves.

I am, colonel, respectfully, your obedient,

ST. JOHN R. LIDDELL,

Brigadier-General.

Report of Maj. Frederick Townsend, Eighteenth U. S. Infantry.

HDQRS. DETACHMENT EIGHTEENTH U. S. INFANTRY,
Camp near Crab Orchard, Ky., October 17, 1862.

Brig. Gen. JAMES B. STEEDMAN,

Comdg. Third Brigade, First Division, Third Army Corps :

GENERAL: I have the honor, pursuant to Special Orders, No. 13, of October 17, 1862, Headquarters Third Brigade, First Division, to report that on the evening of the 8th instant, about 6 o'clock, this detachment, at the head of the brigade, was ordered to re-enforce Major-General McCook, took position on the right of Lieutenant Smith's battery, and was under severe fire, without the opportunity of replying, for perhaps an hour and a half, during which time 3 men were wounded—one private (Isaac Linn) in Capt. Robert Hull's company (G), First Battalion, slightly in the breast, and Corpl. Bernard [C.] Connelly and Private Dennis Brannon, of Capt. Henry Belknap's company (D), Third Battalion, attached to Second Battalion; the first severely in the leg by a shell, whose leg has since been amputated, and the second slightly in the leg.

I take great pleasure in stating that all the officers and men of the detachment, in the performance of their duties, met my fullest expectation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRED. TOWNSEND,

Major Eighteenth U. S. Infantry, Commanding.

AUGUST 30, 1862.—Battle of Richmond, Ky.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to General E. Kirby Smith for the signal victory achieved by him in the battle of Richmond, Ky., on the 30th of August, 1861 [1862], and to all the officers and soldiers of his command engaged in that battle, and especially to General Churchill, General Cleburne, and Col. Preston Smith, of whom he says, "I almost fear to particularize, lest I do not full justice to all. But I cannot close without expressing my admiration at the promptness and intelligence with which Generals Churchill, Cleburne, and Col. Preston Smith executed the orders given to them."

SEC. 2. Resolved, That special acknowledgments and commendation are declared for that highest order of generalship with which this victory was followed up, utterly annihilating with 5,000 an army of 10,000, of whom full 5,000 were actually captured, besides the slain in battle; and for the brilliant campaign, in which the speed, vigor, and constancy of a rapid advance resulted in planting the Confederate flag upon the capitol of Kentucky, and upon the shores of the Ohio River, in front of the great city of Cincinnati.

SEC. 3. Resolved, That the superior generalship displayed in rapidly gathering the immediate fruits of a victory, and in following it promptly with a campaign of activity, enterprise, and unwearied constancy, renders it worthy of the applause of the Government and the emulation of the army.

SEC. 4. Resolved, That the President is requested, in appropriate general orders, to make public the sense of Congress in the premises, and to cause the same to be communicated to General E. Kirby Smith and the officers named, and to be read at the head of each regiment engaged in that battle.

Approved February 17, 1864.
